'DAVID,' PECK, HAYWARD TOP '51

Good Quota of 'New Faces' Among Top H'wood Directors, Scripters

Hollywood got those "new faces" in 1951. Not only did recent arrivals figure largely among players, but there was a surprisingly generous sprinkling of up-and-comers among directors and screenwriters.

That's made evident by VARIETY's annual roundup of top-grossing films and the players, producers, directors and writers who were responsible for them. List 1951 films which promise a domestic gross of $1,000,000 or more indicates that public and trade demand for "new faces" was being met.

Actually, personnel-wise, the year was one of transition in Hollywood. A great many of the older stars—mainstays of the b.o. for years—were entirely missing from the 131 best-grossers of 1951. Many another, such as Gary Cooper, Cary Grant, Joel McCrea, Ray Milland, Fred MacMurray, Melvyn Douglas, Joan Crawford, Bette Davis, Loretta Young, Irene Dunne, Claudette Colbert, Ginger Rogers and Marlene Dietrich, was represented by a picture or two, but not one of them near the head of the list.

In their place is another much smaller group of players who have established themselves in the past five or six years. With the wane of the star system, however, none of these names holds the secure position that the old-line players formerly had. Among this group are such people as Gregory Peck, Burt Lancaster, Gene Kelly, Kirk Douglas, Dean Martin & Jerry Lewis, Clifton Webb, Red Skelton, Robert Mitchum, Montgomery Clift, Jane Russell, Esther Williams, Susan Hayward, Jeanne Crain, Virginia

Westinghouse to Plug Elections on CBS' AM-TV In $4,000,000 Spread

By BOB STAHL

CBS wrapped up what was probably the biggest single deal in broadcasting over the weekend by tagging Westinghouse as sponsor for both radio and television coverage of both political conventions next summer, the Presidential election returns and a 13-week series of half-hour programs between the conventions and election, which will be designed to get out the vote.

Complete package, including time charges on both AM and TV, program costs and the cost of preempting regularly scheduled network shows, is expected to cost the bankroller well over $4,000,000. Agency is Ketchum, McLeod & Grove, of Pittsburgh. Same agency repped Westinghouse in its deal last fall to sponsor the National Collegiate Athletic Assn. football games on NBC-TV, for which the bankroller paid over $1,000,000.

Top industry brass has predicted a circulation of over 18,000,000 video receivers by election time and Westinghouse veepee M. J. McKibbin expressed the hope, in

Kirk Douglas Stumps For UN in Youth Talks

Following an indoctrination course at Lake Success, Kirk Douglas, who arrived in New York last week, will leave on a tour of seven foreign countries on behalf of the United Nations. Douglas plans to spend four months addressing youth group audiences in Sweden, Denmark, Western Germany, France, Italy and Israel.

Actor had been approached to undertake the mission some time ago by Benjamin Cohen, UN's director of information, whom he had met to discuss a proposed film about the world organization.

See WB Bd.'s OK Of Hefty Buy Of Its Own Common

Board of directors of Warner Bros. at its next meeting will approve purchase by the corporation of an additional hefty block of its own common stock, probably at over $16 per share, according to Wall St. sources. Move would be in line with the WB policy of shrinking the capitalization.

WB now has about 5,620,000 shares of common stock outstanding. Last summer 1,015,900 shares were bought up for cancellation at a total cost of $15,000,000, following the board invitation to holders to tender their stock at up to $15 per share. WB paid out an average of $14.70 per share in the mammoth purchase. Families of the three Warner brothers offered 100,000 shares for purchase by the company, and of these 50,650 were taken.

WB is said to be in an especially strong cash position at present, indicating that the next stock buy might be equally as extensive. With the issue currently trading at about $14.75, probability is that the tender price will be up to over $16.

WB aim primarily is to maintain the dividend rate at $1 per share. This can be done if the outstanding shares are reduced commensurately with the dropoff in earnings.

Paul-Ford or De Haven After ABC's WW-Marlene

ABC program chiefs are dickering with Les Paul-Mary Ford and Gloria De Haven and expects to schedule either the husband-wife team or the pic star at 9:45 p. m. Sundays. Idea is to follow the parlay of Walter Winchell and Marlene Dietrich in "Cafe Istanbul" with a name musical airer.

NEXT: 'SHOWBOAT,' 'PARIS,' 'CARUSO'

By HERB GOLDEN

"David and Bathsheba" led the boxoffice parade in 1951. VARIETY's annual roundup of the year's top-grossing films discloses that the 20th-Fox entry will garner an estimated $7,000,000 in U. S. and Canadian film rental.

Runners-up for the b.o. sweepstakes award are a trio of Metro entries. They are "Showboat" with $5,200,000; "An American in Paris" with $4,500,000, and "The Great Caruso" with $4,500,000. Complete lineup of top pix, stars, etc., is on Pages 70-71.

Gregory Peck, in three pictures that grossed a total of $11,750,000, proved the top money star of the year. Susan Hayward, with four films that grabbed an aggregate of $12,525,000, headed the femme and overall money list, but she was second-billed in several of the pix.

Peck and Miss Hayward were given a mighty shove, of course, by their appearance in "David and Bathsheba," as were the money winners in the direction and screenplay categories below.

Curiously, the male star seen by more theatregoers than anyone except Peck was a comparative newcomer at Warner Bros., Steve Cochran. Similarly, Virginia Mayo—also via WB efforts—was gandered by more stubholders than any femme but Miss Hayward. Cochran and Miss Mayo made the runner-up positions by dint of appearing in five pix each. Cochran's quintet snared a total of $7,600,000, while Miss Mayo's grabbed $9,650,000.

As in the past, the contribution of stars to any film's success proved almost impossible to figure. Despite the varied trade and public popularity polls which regularly get much ballyhooing, the success of a picture involves considerably more than a star's draw. It takes a good script and a complex of other factors to get results.

Top money producer of 1951 was Metro's Arthur Freed. He accounted for $12,300,000 in film rentals via "Showboat," "American in Paris" and "Royal Wedding." Universal's Leonard Goldstein was runner-up by reining five pix for a total of $10,075,000. In third position was Darryl F. Zanuck, who personally produced 20th's "D&B" and "People Will Talk." They'll stash away a total of $9,100,000.

In the director category, "D&B" was again a factor. Henry King, who megged that pic and "I'd Climb the Highest Mountain," came out on top with $9,150,000 for the pair. Metro's Vincent Minelli was second with $7,600,000 for "American in Paris" and "Father's Little Dividend." In show

Show Biz—Uncle Sam's Economic Stepchild

By MORRIS L. ERNST

Morris L.

In the main the VARIETY family of Show Biz are the economic stepchildren of the Congress of the United States. It strikes me as odd that the people who are contributing most to the culture of the nation—whether authors, actors, directors, musicians or even baseball stars—have been unmindful of the tax ghetto in which they have been placed by the Congress. One would imagine that the top creative people of the nation were unconcerned with "take-home pay" and that their egos were satisfied merely by receiving large checks even though deep down they must know that in many cases they are merely tax collectors for Uncle Sam at 20 or 30c on the dollar.

Only last year Congress, without any real protest from the creative groups, pegged an additional discrimination against writers, musical composers, etc. If you buy stocks or bonds you can take advantage of capital gains tax provisions, but such relief in a wide area of situations is now denied to those creative individuals or organizations which deal in copyrights. Congress, in fact, cut out such relief for copyright transactions but not for patent transactions although the two types of monopoly protections are analogous in many respects.

People who buy securities often find it wise, if they reach high income brackets, to give securities to a child or to a dependent. This often creates vast savings in "take-home pay for the family" since the child's tax rate is usually below that of the parent. Although authors may still properly make gifts of manuscripts to their dependents they meet with discriminations not

DeMille Wins Air Waiver To Plug 'Greatest Show'

Cecil B. DeMille, who is under a performers' union ban that has kept him off the air the last few years, was granted a special waiver last week by the American Federation of Radio Actors and Television Authority. He may go on the air, however, solely to plug his new pic, "The Greatest Show on Earth" (reviewed in this issue).

DeMille may not appear in the role of a performer, but solely as an interviewee. He's due in New lineup of appearances on top shows, arranged by Paramount radio contact Burt Champion after the waiver had been won.

Radio-TV Enters 1952 in High Gear, Sez Frank Folsom

RCA prexy Frank M. Folsom declared in his year-end statement this week that the radio-television industry will enter the New Year with an all-time peak production capacity, which will enable it to handle in stride both the ever-increasing military production, as well as domestic goods.

Folsom cited the multi-million-dollar plant expansion undertaken by RCA during 1951 as being indicative of the industry's growth. New RCA manufacturing facilities completed in 1951, together with earlier expansion undertaken postwar under the impetus of TV, give the company its greatest production potential to date, he said. He predicted RCA's Government orders would almost quadruple in 1952 those for the past year, adding that this year's military output will probably equal in dollar volume the 1942 rate, when RCA plants were turned over 100% to war production.

During 1951, Folsom said, RCA and the rest of the industry maintained "relatively high" levels of production of radio and TV receivers, with the public having bought

Show Biz Accountants Alerting Their Clients On 'Go Easy' Tax Returns

Some theatrical accountants have been warning their clients not to expect the sizable deductions of former years. The current investigations into tax fraud collusion are making various internal revenue offices wary of allowing "too many" deductions.

It's anticipated that income tax returns of prior years will be scrutinized more carefully, after March 15. Accountants feel that there will be lots more zeal i o.o.ing tax statements and many items will undoubtedly be subject to questioning.

There have been some inquiries from tax collectors about show biz personalities. More are believed on the way.

Shades of Hollywood's Film Pioneers: Short Bankrolls Invade Telepix Prod.

By WALT GREENE

Hollywood.

Thirtyeight years ago Jesse L. Lasky, Samuel Goldwyn and Cecil B. DeMille landed in Hollywood to produce their first feature film, "The Squaw Man." Renting a barn just off Hollywood and Vine, they were key factors in establishing Hollywood as the film capital of the world.

Numerous other film producers soon moved into the Hollywood area, setting up a clap-trap office building adjacent to open stages on vacant lots or amidst orange groves, with the cast and crew painting and moving the canvas flats required.

Today those days are recalled because for the past 18 months, Hollywood has been invaded by another horde of ambitious producers—producers of television pix. Most of them have short bankrolls and various degrees of know-how in film production, all determined to get aboard the gravy train of the new medium. Some are putting up their own savings to crack the market, while others are struggling along hoping that they can uncover an" angel" to back their enterprise or idea "that will make a fortune."

As a result, although there are no more stables or barns available in the Hollywood sector, the expectant TV producers having grabbed nearly all the vacant super-markets and garages available in the area to set up headquarters. On most of the main thoroughfares aside from Hollywood Blvd., signs are continuing to sprout over former markets and garages disclosing new TV film headquarters.

In contrast to the early days of pictures, when a small office and outdoor stage was required to get into business, the present TV enterprise requires a much larger coin outlay and greater overhead due to the changing times. A 30-by-40 foot stage can be acceptable for the present purposes, and with a makeshift office and dressing rooms set up via panelboards it can adequately suffice for turning out a video pilot film or series.

Ingenuity

The newcomers who have taken over most of the abandoned garages around town are particularly ingenious in devising methods of laying out the several sets required for a half-hour TV show. In the contracted space available, they generally telescope the two wall sets outward from the rear walls to save time on the two-or-three-day shooting schedules available. Corners flange out in rotation as required by the script, so that when one set is completed, it is moved out with the next right behind. Only delay between scenes is moving in the desk, furniture and other props for the new setup.

This method is possible because of the requirements of TV film shooting, which precludes the use of long shots to concentrate on closeup and near shots. One converted garage studio in the rear of an apartment is able to bring the cost down on regular video films to a price about half of that in one of the bigger plants.

As Jimmy Durante so aptly says, "Everybody's getting into the act." Experienced filmites, such as actors, producers, directors, cameramen, film editors and others are continually probing for ideas that might be sold to TV agencies and sponsors for a series. Few have been able to make the grade. Most of the cameramen are bent on turning out travel series, figuring that the films can be shot between regular studio assignments.

Others who have part time available have rented an office, installed a telephone and gone on the prowl for a backer or ad agency who has sponsor connections. But on the whole, it's the boys with connections who grab off the lush contracts for TV series.

David Lewis to Package Greene Book for Major

Hollywood.

Producer David Lewis, who recently purchased Graham Greene's bestseller, "End of the Affair," will package it with John Beck of the William Morris office and submit it to a major. He definitely doesn't plan to make it as an indie.

Greene is currently in Indo-China, but is due here for a fortnight to huddle with Lewis about scripting. Under deal with Lewis he will participate in the profits.

PARIS MAKES MERRY IN YULETIDE SEASON

Paris.

Despite harassing economic conditions currently prevailing here, escape-seeking Parisians, spearheaded by an unusually high number of tourists during Yuletide, made merry and proved free spenders. Restaurants and nitery prices on the average were advanced about 30 to 40% over last year. Legiters gave the usual tilted-scale extra shows.

Some of the well-heeled crowd remained absent, finding they could get for their money as much fun by spending the holidays in resorts, either in France, on the Riviera, or abroad.

Show Biz—1952

Last year VARIETY's 45th anniversary editorial discussed color TV, theatre TV, TV vs. the b.o., or just TV. Little new has been added outside of the coaxial cable, and that was discounted last year.

However, there still can't be any forgetting the imminent show biz showdown between pix and TV.

Next to boy-meets-girl, TV and radio, pix is the greatest and cheapest form of mass entertainment. Hence the boxoffice barometer must be Hollywood. Film showmen reprise with authority and statistics the fact that a good show will make the public desert the fireside and TV screens. But it takes more than just another "A" picture to make 'em brave the parking hassle, the overall bother and the cost.

Since every entertainment—be it film or round actor—can't be a blockbuster, the evolution of the industry forecasts more and more a mating of the two mass media—pix and TV. However, give 'em good shows in theatres and nothing will keep them home this side of a honeymoon. The coaxial cable, of course, has further dramatized the film studios' inevitability of "joining 'em if you can't fight 'em."

One thing remains certain—no other nation is so keyed to entertainment and showmanship as is America. It's now cliche that every American has his own business—and show business. First it was Hollywood that gave the world mass entertainment of a calibre never before experienced. Radio carried it still further. The Hollywood and Broadway gossip columns grew with and helped develop the upsurge of soundpix and radio, and now that TV has brought the greats from all the crossroads of the Lively Arts into the home, every Main St. is as privy as the Broadway first-nighter.

It is this show-wise public that creates a constant challenge for quality. The tradition and nostalgia impact of a veteran star personality becomes accepted as a matter of course. Just as quickly, however, some young "upstart" becomes a household legend. That's the magic of this electronic form of show business.

Talents may be magically projected with jet propulsion, but one fundamental need remains and that's showmanship. If it's a showmanship that has been created accidentally without benefit of talent, it usually evaporates as quickly as some fleeting vogue for deep-V glam femmes on TV. The durables that will always remain are born of quality conception. It is this showmanship which is bringing closer together such divergent media as films and TV, the stage and TV, music and TV—and almost everything else and TV.

This doesn't mean TV is taking over. Far from it. But there is no disputing its quick grip on an already highly sensitized and savvy public. And the more savvy the customers become, the better for show business. It can only excite the need for better entertainment to satisfy that discrimination.

20th Importing Its First Demonstration Unit Of Eidophor for N. Y. Test

Twentieth-Fox will import the first demonstration unit of its Eidophor system of big-screen color television next week, with showings planned for the 20th homeoffice screening room immediately afterwards. Company engineers, who have been working on the model at the U. of Zurich i Switzerland together with the Swiss inventors, are confident that the system has been developed to a point of commercial acceptance, and will fly back with the initial unit.

It was originally planned to stage the demonstrations at the Broadway Roxy, 20th's deluxe New York showcase. Prexy Spyros P. Skouras decided, however, that it would be preferable to hold a series of screenings and, since that would have tied up the Roxy for too long, the 20th screening room was chosen instead. While plans for the actual demonstrations are still indefinite, it's believed almost a certainty that 20th will stage its own programs, since there is no commercial color TV now available from any of the networks.

UA Sales Chief's Pitch for the Care And Feeding of Indie Producers

By WILLIAM J. HEINEMAN

ill Heineman

To Mr. Exhibitor, the man at the payoff end of the biz, I address this question: What are you doing about the care and feeding of the independent producer? And this plea — don't kill the goose that has laid the golden egg!

You know what an independent producer is — independent in spirit, but not always in income. He's the guy who takes a gamble on something a little bit newer, a little bit out of the ordinary, a little bit less backneyed and—in so many cases—a little bit better.

Does the independent producer come through every time? No. Does he come through often enough to pay off? Obviously, yes. (Some of the greatest films of all time—great in boxoffice as well as critics' notices—have been independent productions.) That's why United Artists is in business; if it didn't pay off, we wouldn't have bothered.

The fact is that down through the years the independents have provided the spark which gives a lift to the whole industry. Sam Goldwyn and David O. Selznick are proof enough. But even in the more difficult years since the end of World War II, great new independent producers have come forward as advance scouts for the industry. Stanley Kramer is an outstanding case in point, turning pix

Skiatron Request 'Premature,' Sez Par on Pix Test

Paramount will provide films for test of Skiatron's subscription tele system on the same basis as it did for Zenith's Phonevision, company informed Skiatron prexy Arthur Levey last week. There's a big "but," however, in Par's offer.

For one thing, it informed Levey, it feels his request for pix is "premature" since he hasn't even applied to the Federal Communications Commission yet for permission to make the test. Also, Par declared, it wants a lot more specific information about the trial run, proposed for New York, before it makes its features available.

Al Lichtman, 20th-Fox's director of distribution, previously had stated that his company will not provide pix to Skiatron. That's in keeping with its policy on Phonevision, when it was the only major which refused product to Zenith for the experiments in Chicago from January through March of last year.

Meantime, other companies continued to study the letter from Levey of the previous week. He asked prexies of all majors to provide films for the test. It is believed they'll follow the pattern of

Jan Sterling Doesn't Like 20th to Age Her So Fast

Hollywood.

Jan Sterling bowed out of costarring role opposite her husband, Paul Douglas, in one of six sequences in 20th's "We're Not Married" it's just been disclosed. She nixed part before trekking to Korea and Japan on troop entertainment junket.

She didn't care to undertake unglamorous role of a longtime married suburban wife sinking into middle age, and asked to be relieved. No replacement yet.

Zsa-Zsa Gabor is set for another sequence, leaving only the male star to appear opposite her and Miss Sterling's replacement still to be set.

Bd. Reelects Depinet

Board of directors of RKO Pictures has again elected Ned Depinet to head the corporation. Board also returned to office all the top-policy execs of the company except Walter V. Derham, who is on a leave of absence because of illness.

Named for new terms were Noah Dietrich, chairman of the board; J. Miller Walker, v.p., secretary, and general counsel, William H. Clark, treasurer; Garrett Van Wagner, comptroller; Joseph J. Laub, assistant secretary, and Elwin J. Smith, Jr., assistant treasurer.

Garland-Palace 58G Record Seen

The Judy Garland show at the Palace Theatre, N. Y., was expected to hang up a record $58,000 for the week ending Monday (31). New Year's eve price was hiked to $7.20. There were standees at virtually every performance. Despite the matinee on Christmas Day, regular schedule of 10 shows weekly prevailed inasmuch as the matinee was withdrawn Thursday (27).

For the week previous, Palace did $35,000 which was okay considering that the fierce competition of Christmas shopping gave all Broadway houses slim grosses.

$4,000,000 PROGRAM FOR LIPPERT IN '52

Chicago.

Robert Lippert, at his company's first national convention, told 110 district and division managers that the coming year should up the firm's shooting schedule from around a $2,000,000 production outlay of the past year to more than $4,000,000 in 1952. Present list calls for 22 releases.

He pointed out that "merchandising films" instead of distribution would add more profits to the company and is the only way to combat declining boxoffice.

Lippert claims that new financing is becoming much easier under the new ownership setup of the firm, with stars, writers, and producers eager to join the firm.

Settle $10,000,000 Suit Over Martin-Lewis Pact

Hollywood.

Screen Associates' $10,000,000 breach of contract suit against Dean Martin, Jerry Lewis, Hal Wallis and York Pictures Corp. was settled out of court for an undisclosed sum.

Plaintiffs, as co-producers of the M&L starrer, "At War with the Army," claimed they had options on the services of Martin & Lewis for six more pictures.

Ben Goetz to Coast For Brit. Lensing Huddles

Ben Goetz, managing director of Metro's British Studios, in from London, left N. Y. yesterday (Tues.) for a three-week Coast visit.

This will be Goetz' first huddle with Culver City toppers in a year. Up for consideration will be future lensing in England and probably corporate changes in consequence of theatre divorcement.

Les Bernstein to Rome

Lester Bernstein, film critic for Time mag for the past two years, sails from New York Jan. 30 to join Time & Life's Rome bureau. No replacement for the reviewing post has been chosen.

Bernstein moved to Time three years ago from the N. Y. Times' legit department. He covered theatre and film news for the Luce mag prior to assuming reviewing chores.

UA JUST BUSY DOING REHABILITATION JOB

By ARTHUR B. KRIM

(President, United Artists)

United Artists had to face the test of our faith in the future of motion pictures in a very personal way some 10 months ago. We had to decide whether we would expend our time and our energies and our resources in the task of rehabilitating a motion picture company which was on the verge of disaster. This task made sense only if we, within ourselves, could find an abiding faith in the strength and future health of motion pictures. We had to believe that the sickness of this company was not chronic and that it did not in any sense represent a symptom of the decline of the industry itself from its place at the head of the entertainment world. We had to reach this conclusion at a time when the industry had its too generous quota of pessimists.

We made the decision to invest our future in motion pictures, because we felt then, as we do now more than ever, that the motion picture industry continues to be basically healthy and that there is a place in the industry for a United Artists.

We have been so preoccupied with the day-by-day task of rehabilitation that it would not be appropriate for us to attempt to draw specific conclusions as to the impact of television or of divorcement or of the relative economics of high budget as against low budget pictures or of any of the many other factors which confront the industry over the long range. We feel that with all the ups and downs, the pros and the cons, the balance is still on the right side of the ledger. We are tremendous optimists at United Artists. We feel there is no substitute for motion pictures. Because of our faith in this belief, our plans for the future are very ambitious.

'51 Was 'Upbeat' But '52 Looms As 'Challenge Year'

By BARNEY BALABAN

(President of Paramount Pictures)

Barney Balaban

1951 will be remembered for three significant developments in the motion picture business: (1), The steady decline of recent years leveled off and, in recent months, moved ahead of last year: (2) the fact that good pictures could continue to get a good reception at the boxoffice; and (3), as an industry, we learned to work together for the benefit of all of us.

The big news of 1951 was the end of the decline and the beginnings of new hope for the future. It was an "upbeat" year. We found comfort in repeated evidence that good pictures would hold up well at the boxoffice. Although this presented a challenge to all of us, it was also an assurance that if we produced the right product and merchandised it with showmanship at the distributor and exhibitor levels, we were on solid ground. And, finally there was the encouraging, heart-warming experience of COMPO and "Movietime U.S.A." We learned that by working as a team we could advance the general welfare of every branch of our business.

1952 figures to be challenging, in some respects more so than the

Since $3,000,000,000 in Pix Realty Won't Be Turned Into Parking Lots Theatres Must Pay Prod. Freight

By NED E. DEPINET

(President, RKO Radio Pictures)

Ned Depinet

If the owners of any or all of the 20,000 or more picture theatres in the country thought they could make more money by turning to vaudeville, video, bingo or converting to parking lots, it would be done and there would be nothing unethical or immoral about telling Hollywood to go fly a kite. It would simply be practical business.

By the same code, if the creators of motion pictures are eventually forced by financial malnutrition into an untenable position, and should turn inquiring eyes to what might be greener pastures, it would simply be in the best tradition of our profit motive system.

As it is unlikely that $3,000,000,000 worth of movie theatre real estate could be quickly and profitably converted to other uses it is in the best interests of the owners of this property to keep the production machine oiled and running smoothly. There is only one lubricant that will do this. It is called Profit. The trickle of this essential oil to the production machine is getting smaller and smaller and the hazards of production are getting larger all the time. With the hue and cry for bigger and better pictures, with the public's apathy toward the average film and with television's free distribution of entertainment, poor, mediocre and excellent, we come to the inevitable conclusion that something must be done. The responsibility is not Hollywood's alone.

To appease the insatiable appetite of the public, new and costlier devices must be created to keep it thrilled, amused or merely interested. This is nothing new; it is merely more intense now, due to the whiplash of new and vigorous competition, maturity, and therefore greater selectivity, in public taste and a new and vital force which we can call the "shrunken clock." No longer is there "time to kill." The leisure hour is crowded with things to do. The public's problem is no longer a matter of spending money, but of profitably spending time.

That the cost of making individual motion pictures will grow greater rather than less is inevitable. Each year since their invention they have cost more to make. Each new improvement becomes routine and is taken for granted by a glutinous and somewhat sated public. In the natural evolution of this business we are nearing the point where it is neither profitable to make nor exhibit the average low budget picture. They are doomed along with many other things we have discarded in the march of progress, including the thing that first made us, the great silent picture art itself. Many other things will have to be discarded as we go along, obsolete methods of distribution and exhibition, worn out policies, threadbare and provincial thinking.

There are dire prophecies that thousands of theatres will be forced to close. Undoubtedly those that have served their purpose, outgrown their usefulness, and have become barnacles and parasites on the body of the industry will go, just as they always have. It is no different in production, stars have come and gone, producers and companies vanished. That which cannot pay its fare cannot travel.

Simple Economics

As we go along it is inevitable that there will be fewer but costlier pictures. Their makers will try, as they always have, to make them better pictures, but whether they turn out to be bonanzas or boxoffice busts, they will cost more money to make. Time is the big factor in production, time for writing, creating, preparation, time for polishing and refining and in this business where the bulk of cost is for labor, time is money!

Today, and likely in all the days to come, every picture starts off with the weight of a terrific tax

Rep's $15,000,000 Budget Is Yates' Answer to Video

By HERBERT J. YATES

(President, Republic Pictures)

Herbert J.

Recently I stated that Republic planned to spend $15,000,000 in production for the screens of theatres throughout the world during the next 12 months. This, I believe, more eloquently than anything else I could say or do, reaffirms my faith in the future of our industry.

I have spent over 50 years in business and have been identified with the motion picture industry almost since its inception. If I learned nothing else in my long experience than the fact that ours is a fast-moving business, and that one must constantly be alert to everchanging conditions and new developments, I would have learned the most essential lesson of show business.

In this regard a large new competitor has recently loomed upon the horizon to join in sharing the public's entertainment dollar. I refer of course to television and its ever-increasing influence the American scene. None of us look upon this with any particular delight. Yet TV is something we must learn to live with. It must

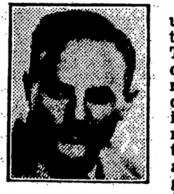
Only Bad Pix (Not TV or Anything Else) Is Hollywood's 'Debbil'

Up From the Count of 9 the Pix Biz Recognizes From Realistic B.O. Performance That There's No Embargo on Good Shows

By DARRYL F. ZANUCK
(Production V.P., 20th Century-Fox)

Hollywood.

Like a fighter who stays on the floor for a nine-count in order to clear his head, Hollywood has climbed to its feet and looks forward to the year 1952 as another and more promising round in the endless battle for the world's amusement title.



Darryl F. Zanuck

There may have been a period of uncertainty—even of gloom—during the year which now draws to a close. To deny that the film industry took it on the chin during this time would be no better than self-delusion. An industry which refuses to face reality is inviting doom, and those of us who make the pictures, those who distribute and those who exhibit them, alike admit the fact that we were groggy for a while.

But, as I have repeatedly observed, ours is an industry founded on optimism. In all the world there is no other industry which stakes such prodigious sums on a product that depends for success on the passing fancy of the public. A play, unless it be a concoction greater than its time, must appeal to the momentary tastes of its time. Whether by accurate foresight or luck, the maker of a film play must anticipate the public's whims at release time, since picture must make both its cost and profit in a comparatively short space of time.

Should a man who manufactures bathtubs find a slackening of consumer demand he can place his surplus in a warehouse and hope to dispose of his excess stock at a future time. But a screenplay is entertainment, and the public conception of entertainment is a matter of moods which are influenced from many directions. Economic conditions, social and world trends, any number of other things exert a pressure on the public's entertainment moods and can change them. This is the risk which the producer, planning his costly pictures a year and sometimes two ahead, has to take. He knows it's "now or never" once his picture is released.

Granting the inevitability of this risk it is not so much a wonder that so many pictures fail to return a profit, but that so many of them do. By the time an idea is translated into story form, the screenplay is filmed, scored, edited and released, the people who would have linked the picture at the time of conception might be chasing a rainbow of an entirely different hue.

It's Happened Before With Radio

Added to this ever-existing hazard was the sudden flare-up of popularity in the past year or so of free television programs. Those of faint heart in our industry quickly envisioned calamity but the majority of us who reeled and floundered under the impact did not lose our determination. We had met somewhat similar competition before in the early ascendancy of radio.

We also knew that our production operations were scaled to the economic flushness of wartime prosperity, a situation which for several years had been dwindling without a commensurate lowering of costs on our part. We flattered ourselves by adopting a streamline policy at a time when real cost-cutting was the real panacea.

So the blow was doubly hard when it came during the early and middle half of the current year. But, like the optimists who founded the industry whose traditions we are maintaining, we made many adjustments, we have kept in there punching, and we are on our way to better times again.

The boxoffice barometer is rising again. But this time the rise owes nothing to an easing of economic forces or anything accidental. It is due to our ability to face reality, to realize that we must make better pictures. And we are making better pictures. As we continue to do this more people will be going to the movie theatres, and oftener.

THE FUTURE IS UP TO US

By N. J. BLUMBERG
(President, Universal Pictures)

Each year presents the same problem:

How can we increase boxoffice receipts?

This is the big question. Most of the others are simple in comparison.

Nate Blumberg

The many technical problems in distribution and production seem to be mountains, but if we are able to make b.o. pictures; if we can continue to ballyhoo them with all our resources; if we can successfully develop new talent and, above all, if we mind our business and work hard, we should improve and move forward.

The future is in our hands. We must plan our business with a keen sense of appreciation for the world problems as well as problems at home.

Our industry, like all others, will reflect the economy of the country. If general business conditions are good, we should get our share.

Now, more than ever, we need a united front. If we could only straighten out our point of view to the point where we work together and realize that all branches of our business are interdependent, then we can surely face the future with confidence. We have the effective instrument in COMPO. Movietime USA has proved what can be accomplished by concerted effort.

Most of my 40 years in this business have been spent in exhibition. I know that the exhibitor needs b.o. pictures. Our company is minded to the problems of all exhibitors, large and small, and our studio is trying to make pictures for the mass audience.

Exhibitors have shown a renewed interest in showmanship which is so important to our good health. The distributor must pave the way in advertising and publicity, but the exhibitor must do the job in the grassroots.

Our company believes that TV eventually will be our ally rather than our competitor.

But TV is only one of our competitors. Our share of the entertainment dollar has decreased. We must get more people back into the habit of going to pictures. This requires more ballyhoo, in addition to more entertaining pictures.

I would like to repeat what I said over two years ago: "Everyone who makes a living in this business has the obligation to appoint himself a committee to dedicate himself to the proposition that ours is a great business and that he will meet every challenge that comes his way."

Yes, the future is in our hands. Let's work more and talk less if we really want to direct our own destiny.

Yeh, Whodunit?

Lee Shubert and I once attended the opening of a mystery play at one of his theatres. It was a pretty bad one. As the first act went along, Lee began to wriggle in his seat and mutter strange sounds. During the second act, which was worse, he leaned over to me and whispered, "You know, John, I left this one entirely to my office. They should never have started it. Let's get out of here."

"Don't you want to know how it comes out?" I asked.

"How it comes out!" Lee echoed, in a whisper heard down to the footlights. "That's no mystery. The mystery is how it ever got in." —John Golden.

Publishers At Loss To Find Authors For Scientific Tomes

'All the Researchers Have Taken the Air!

By BENNETT CERF

The reason why there are practically no new books of scientific research this season is that there are no scientific researchers who can spare the time to write them. This is one shortage, furthermore, that cannot be chalked up against defense preparations. Television is the villain. Of 114 scientific researchers who were polled for this dissertation, 47% were proving that six distinct and different brands of cigarets were freer of coaltar, tabasco sauce and other foreign substances than their rivals, 31% were giving their all for toothpastes that were almost indecently kind to the gums, 11% were up to their Adam's apples in tests designed to establish the health-giving properties of various brands of beer, and the remaining 1% was undergoing general overhauling. Looks like it will be easier to get the graft out of government than the graph out of advertising.

Bennett Cerf

Another drastic shortage that is a direct result of all this research is reported by the manufacturers of white surgical jackets. Obviously, the man who announces that, according to the Umberufen Chemical Co.'s charts, Whatchamacallit Cigarets ruin the digestion only 18 3/17% as much as all competing brands, has to wear a white jacket or listeners are not going to believe him. They'll turn instead to the properly accoutred announcer who follows on the same network 10 minutes later and proves by a new set of charts that the Umberufen's figures are more deceptive than those of the chorus in "Top Banana."

Speaking for myself, all this TV hokus-pokus about laboratory tests and violently contradictory charts and graphs is such an overwhelming bore that I am about to declare a one-man boycott against any product that resorts to same. I realize that this probably means no cigarets, beer, toothpaste, or shaving cream in my life for a few weeks, but what's that to a man willing to suffer something for his principles? Sooner or later some trail-blazing cigaret maker is going to take time on the airwaves to tell the public, "My brand needs no chemical research. And it isn't mild at all. What's so great about mildness? As a matter of fact, my cigaret is just pure Virginia tobacco, bought from the same farmers who sell all the other manufacturers, and it's so darn strong it may knock your back teeth out." That'll be the boy for me. Furthermore, I bet he'll sell so many million cigarets in the following week he'll be able to afford a whole month—with his family in Miami Beach.

As far as those mysterious dentifrice analyses are concerned, the only person in our family who doesn't turn the knob the second day they come onto the screen is my Aunt Minnie, and she's had false teeth for the past 16 years. Not that she's ever gotten a pair to fit. She took her latest set back to Dr. Pullman for regrinding only last Tuesday. "I'll do it again—for the sixth time," he told her resignedly, "but I assure you they won't possibly fit in your mouth as well as they do now." "Who said anything about my mouth?" inquired Aunt Minnie angrily. "They don't fit in my glass."

Dear Hollywood Script-Writer:

By BOB CONSIDINE

For your possible guidance here are some do's and don'ts that may guide you in the future creation of newspaper characters in your films——

Bob Considine

Dress him some time in something beside a trench coat. I distinctly remember seeing a reporter once who didn't have on a trench coat. I realize this may seem preposterous to you but please take my word. Forget what this fellow's name was, but I remember he had on a form-fitting black cashmere job with a mink collar. Had a name something like Phoebe, or Beebe.

Write one some time about reporter who doesn't Solve The Crime. Honest, we're like Bugs Baer's classic description of the bungling Hawkshaw who couldn't track an elephant across a field of snow even though the elephant had a nose bleed. Every time you make a reporter into a successful sleuth who brings to bay some scoundrel who has baffled the F.B.I., Scotland Yard, and the NKVD you cause the pros an epidemic of headaches. Police reporters, who believe everything they see in the movies, immediately start getting ideas about how to find the guy who basted Judge Crater with cement and dunked him somewhere, and they worry the cops into assorted dead ends.

Never have a newspaper bloke identify himself as a journalist. A journalist, once said Walter Winchell, is a newspaperman out of work. Even the products of our most distinguished Schools of Journalism never call themselves journalists. We feel that "newspaperman" is enough. In fact we'd rather be newspapermen than either President or right.

Stop your boy from stopping presses. About the only newspaperman I ever knew who stopped a press was an old friend named Barney Gluttz of the Washington Sun. He got drunk one night and fell into a press, stopping it. And himself. About the only time the presses stop in the middle of a run is to add the results of the fifth at Jamaica.

Let him cut down on the grog. There are newspapermen in this land who don't get plastered more than two or three times a year. There are—gasp—newspapermen in this land who don't even drink. And some who haven't the faintest idea of what to order when they step up to a bar. Once, I swear, I saw one order a Scotch and Coca-Cola.

Typed—But Artistic

I'll say this much for you, pal, you sure put your boys in comfortable looking restaurants. I like that set that somebody built in 1923 and Hollywood has been using ever ince: you know, the one with the booth, where the reporter takes the girl to tell her 1) he is about to blow The Big Case even though she is Bugsy's moll; 2) he will Take Her Out of It; 3) he is quitting the newspaper "racket" to write a book. Just then the fatherly waiter appears, beams, and calls our hero by his first name.

Nice set, all right, but not many working newspapermen could afford to eat there. Lot of them bring their own lunch to work, or send the copy kid for coffee in a paper cup and a sandwich created by some sinister soul behind the counter of a neighborhood Quick 'n' Dirty. And, mainly, the only babes in their lives are their wives —who live in the suburbs with the kids and never get around to understanding why a big murder or fire or arrival home of Frankie and Ava needs writing, especially if the writing interferes with the bloke's catching the 6:25 out of Grand Central.

Surest way to starve a movie reporter to death is to write a script which makes him quit—after bawling out the publisher, managing editor, head of the copy desk and other principals—to write a book. The average advance on a first book is about $500. Only one in umpteen ever pays royalties after the down payment. Only one in about 20 ever gets even reviewed. Only one in about every thousand written ever gets accepted. The average newspaperman who chucked his job to write a book would 1) forfeit his severance pay, and 2) have his brains knocked out by his irate wife.

Most of us are pretty dull, if the dreadful truth were known. We're more thrilled to meet interesting people than they are to meet us. But mainly we see press agents, and they're even duller than we are. We can't answer the waiter in French, or, if we can, we can't afford restaurants that have French waiters. Most of the sportswriters and other employees of the Toy Department of papers are frustrated athletes who, like A.A.U. officials, can't tear themselves away from the aroma of liniment. Most theatre critics are defeated playwrights. Most pundits have ulcers. Most film reviewers are lucky they're not picked up as vagrants.

But, as we always say, it's better than working for a living.

Any questions?

Big Broughtdown

T. E. B. Clark, scripter of "Passport to Pimlico," was on his way back to England last year, after having attended the Venice Film Festival. He had won a medal in the Selznick Golden Laurel competition for his film. At Customs, he was asked if he had anything to declare. "Only a medal I had just won," he declared. The Customs man demanded to know if it was gold. "Sure," was the reply, as he handed it over.

Customs man: "You know that gold cannot be brought into the country! What did you win it for? Oh, I see—'Passport to Pimlico.' They say it's a film which takes a crack at customs practices."

Clark really got panicky for he had not declared his wife's nylons. After a pause, the Customs man threw back the medal. "All right, go on, this isn't gold anyway."

Exhibition and Production Totally Inter-Dependent

Harnessing Big-Screen Color TV One Answer To Home Video's Inroads

By SPYROS P. SKOURAS
(President, 20th Century-Fox Films)

In my opinion, the interests of the exhibition and production branches of our business are totally inter-dependent. Prosperous exhibition means prosperous production and, conversely, declining exhibition will mean declining production. If we lose our theatres, we lose everything and we will merely become a branch of a communications system that will dictate the cost of pictures and stifle creativeness, artistry and the other ingredients of showmanship that re the lifeblood of our business.

Production costs still have to be reduced substantially. The industry has made substantial progress in reducing costs, but considering the decline in attendance, particularly in TV areas, our production costs—in spite of this substantial reduction—are still very high in comparison to the boxoffice levels. Reduction of costs is our only salvation and the industry must face this task with the greatest earnestness, if we are to stay in business.

The salaries of industry personnel, particularly in the brackets exceeding $500 weekly, should be reduced. Salaries of our executives and creative talent, and this includes stars, producers, directors, writers, cameramen and others, must come down to the levels of other businesses. These salaries are admittedly high, though it must be borne in mind that our artistic personnel are all specialists in their respective fields and are in great demand and can easily get what they ask.

In my opinion, a good plan for the industry to adopt in this respect, especially in view of the high taxes, would be to lower the salaries of these people but to give them a profit-sharing plan so that they will be amply compensated in a manner that will be commensurate with their contribution.

Profit-Sharing

As a matter of fact, 20th Century-Fox did offer a plan whereby a voluntary reduction in salaries was asked for in all branches, which would be recouped by participation in profits, but unfortunately only our executives accepted it and I was happy to announce that after first six months that this plan was in operation, they received full recovery through participation in profits.

While we were able to halt the decline of attendance somewhat in the television areas, and business is as good as last year in the non-television areas, nevertheless, in the heavily saturated areas such as Los Angeles, New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, business is lower than it was last year. Over a long period of time it has been my personal conviction that the exhibition business could be saved from the devastating affects of free and convenient home entertainment by the development of large screen color television for theatre use.

We have put our hopes and efforts in Eidophor. Eidophor, with its color refinements and projection, will assure the presentation of the type of entertainment that will attract large new, discriminating audiences.

I think that theatre television will eventually be the key to the preservation of theatres. Free home television caters to audiences who for the sake of convenience accept it with its shortcomings in scope and quality. Theatre television will be so far superior to home television and the entertainment will be so much richer and more imposing that the comparision in the different appeals of home television and theatre television will be the same as the quality of sand lot baseball compared to professional baseball.

Exhibition still has a difficult road to follow in meeting the devastating competition of TV. In addition to this, exhibition faces the necessity of keeping up with modern trends in the physical appearance of their theatres, to make them more attractive than the home.

Above all, bookings must be arranged to meet public tastes. Today, theatre bookings is a serious problem because there are 50,000,000 people who can see entertainment in their homes and even though it may be mediocre and even poor, it is still free and convenient. Therefore, it is the most formidable competition the motion picture theatres of America ever had.

Free B's on TV

Double-billing today also presents a serious problem, because the second picture is the type of picture that people can see on their television sets at home, free. This makes double-billing injurious to our business rather than an inducement, and even though the double program is still necessary in certain areas, great care must be taken by the exhibitors to book them in such a manner that they will be attractive enough to successfully meet the competition of television, which I repeat is free and convenient.

Aggressive activity to create interest in the motion picture theatre is today more important than ever before. All our ingenuity and every showmanship technique that has been established in the past must be put to use and applied to present-day audience tastes in order to help find a solution to the difficulties facing us. Exhibitors can no longer take theatre patronage for granted.

As far as the future of production is concerned, I see the necessity of further reductions in production costs, in keeping with present boxoffice levels. At the same time, the quality of the pictures must be improved and more pictures must be produced by all the studios to meet the ever-changing tastes of the public.

In particular, all our stars today, no matter who they are, must be cast in good, strong pictures in order to maintain their boxoffice value.

We must also create new stars and glamorize them.

Solid and unusual stories, with ideas behind them, are necessary to attract the people into the theatres..

I do not agree that only the big pictures are capable of outstanding business. A picture with good subject-matter, well made, regardless of size, can do very well. It is the industry's responsibility today to provide pictures for all types of theatres and not only for the few metropolitan first-runs, even though they contribute a major part of the film rentals.

Conditions as a result of the anti-trust suit have become worse. There is more litigation; there is no backlog of pictures for the theatres; zoning and clearances are chaotic; and the orderly liquidation of product has disappeared. The expenses of the film companies have increased tremendously. To illustrate one item alone—275 prints were all the prints required to serve the United States before the anti-trust suit; now we need over 400 as, after the picture plays first run, practically all the exhibitors play it at the same time, and we cannot service all our customers properly. This has affected business and the attendance at the theatres, because at one time the scale of admissions went as low as 15c as a picture was played off in a territory, run by run. Today a majority of subsequent-run theatres charge practically the same admissions because they want the pictures simultaneously.

In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, Los Angeles and other large cities, before the anti-trust suit, a picture was played off in an orderly pattern over a period of at least five months, and it gave an opportunity to customers to attend the theatres according to the size of their pocketbooks. Also, the stagger system of exhibition gave an opportunity to those who had heard about a certain picture to see it. Now a picture is played off within a few weeks and it is practically forgotten. This is a detriment to both the exhibitor and the distributor.

In the midst of this chaotic condition created by the anti-trust suit, we were also hit by television, and it found us totally unprepared to meet this formidable competitor. The defendant companies lost the profits from their theatres (two companies have already lost them, and three companies will lose them in the very near future).

Only superior entertainment can arrest the downward trend of grosses in television areas. In non-television areas we are generating greater interest in motion pictures through such projects as COMPO's "Movietime U.S.A." and similar programs in which the industry as a whole is cooperating. While these projects have contributed to the general improvement, a great deal more work remains to be done to rekindle interest in pictures. We must continue to go directly to the great family of millions of moviegoers and tell them of the quality and appeal at this time of their favorite form of entertainment.

No Fan Has Yet Stopt to Ask a Mgr., 'How Much Did This Film Cost?'

Blockbusters Are OK But the Main Thing Is 'Is It a Good Show?'

By HAL WALLIS

Hollywood.

Undoubtedly, the so-called "blockbusters," colossi like "Quo Vadis," "Samson and Delilah," "David and Bathsheba" and "Greatest Show on Earth" are great for the business. They attract customers who haven't been around for years and their very exploitation is a stiumulant for our industry, which thrives on excitement.

Hal Wallis

However, I do not subscribe to a full program of multi-million-dollar negative costs. For one, too frequent repetition of this type picure would very quickly sate the public. Then consider the type of grosses rolled up by any Martin & Lewis picture (see VARIETY, July, 1951) and you see why there is still profit possible in films that are brought in for a million or less. Personally, I have never included so-called secondary or "B" pictures on my program. However, it is my feeling that there will always be a market for this type, if they are soundly and economically produced and preferably if they introduce new talent. Whether these are to be turned out by the majors, or made independently remains to be seen.

It is becoming increasingly difficult for major distributing companies to profitably handle "B's," but so long as there are double-bill situations, they are definitely required. I think the need in this field is for improvement, not elimination. In more than 20 years in this business I have never heard a paying patron at a theatre ask, "How much did this picture cost to make?"

It is my feeling that TV can be used as an ally to exploit our product and as a training ground for new actors, writers and directors. I think it is incumbent upon all of us in the motion picture industry to devise new and different stories, dig out fresh personalities and work out methods of presentation that are sufficiently unique to attract attention away from the novelty which is television. I think the two entertainment forms can exist profitably side by side.

Just as the medical profession never relaxes in its fight against virulent diseases, the motion picture industry must be prepared to carry on the battle against rising costs. The struggle must go on every minute of every working day. Results can be accomplished best by the elimination of waste, brought about by a determination on the part of every member of every crew to be thoroughly prepared—in advance—for the day's work plus the sensible application of economies in sets and the principle of cutting in script rather than in film. Costs have been cut in recent years and dramatic effects frequently enhanced by shooting large portions of pictures in their natural settings away from the studio.

Consider another aspect, if you will. Tremendous savings can be effected by discarding projects that on paper, in advance of production, are doomed to failure. A courageous and definite stand must be taken to rule out such drains on the economy of the industry.

The competition between the theatre and television to me, is not a matter of cost but one of quality. If we can find intriguing subjects that are off the beaten path and fresh personalities to present thei we can more than hold our ow against television or any other tertainment medium.

TV Is Now a Real Big Kid With Muscles But By No Means a Deadly Assassin

By DORE SCHARY
(Production V.P. of Metro)

Culver City.

The last year, to some of us, affirmed the confidence that we felt concerning the good health of the industry. There were a number of high grossing films, a greater number than the previous year, and the 12 months of 1952 will have even a larger number of high grossing pictures. The quality of films did get better and is continuing to improve and the pool of creative talent is bubbling with inspiration and hope.

Dore Schary

The bogey man, television, has taken on substance and shape, but he no longer is a bogey man. While he is a competitor with muscle, it develops that he is not nearly as deadly an assassin as some thought he would be. At the moment, he's a nice, simple fellow who has set up a business of his own on another corner, but the customers will still patronize our store because we happen to be in a different business. It's very likely that this new competitor and ourselves will develop allied interests that may be good for everyone concerned.

In the last year we've survived a number of scandals and embarrassments, and undoubtedly will have to survive others in the next 12 months.

We've also reached that time of year when awards of all kinds are being handed out. We're delighted if we get them, and we say they are unimportant if we don't win them, and we look forward eagerly to next year, when we hope we are considered for them again.

FADE IN:

INT. BOARD ROOM OF THE CHEMICAL BANK—N. Y. C.—DAY—MEDIUM FULL SHOT—THE MEMBERS OF THE BOARD AND PRESIDENT ZORAB.

(The latter presiding. Zorab Salmon P. Zorab to be exact, wears an iron-grey, crew cut, is Princeton '08, and the scion of a fine old Wall Streetfaring family.)

ZORAB

Then it is generally agreed, gentlemen, that we finance the Doctor's mission knowing full well the risks?

(There are grave, white-haired nods of agreement.)

ZORAB

(into intercom speaker)

Send in the Doctor——

(Zorab presses a concealed button and the thick doors open to permit DOCTOR SIGISMUND SPACE to enter. He wears a Rocket Suit, smog helmet, ray and Flit guns in his belt, an electric blanket strapped to his back. He slides open the glass panel in his smog helmet permitting him to speak. He has the slightest trace of a Brooklyn accent, but it is charming.)

DR. SPACE

Gentlemen, everything is in readiness. I only hope that you have all agreed——

ZORAB

We have, Doctor, (the Doctor beams). And we feel that the Space Ship you have built could reach its destination. BUT, once there, can you exist long enough to complete your mission?

DR. SPACE

I've taken that all into account. We know there is some life there different from ours. We also have reason to believe that somehow the inhabitants exist in an atmosphere dense with a substance called smog. This will not, as you see, catch us unprepared. (taps his helmet proudly. It echoes hollowly.)

ZORAB

That answers that question. Who are you taking with you beside The Thing? You'll only have room for two more and, in all fairness, of the thousands of scientists who have begged to go, I hope you have chosen the two that'll be the most use to you.

DR. SPACE

I have. (speaking into radar phone mouthpiece attached to helmet.)

Send in Doctor O'Day.

(The doors open, admitting beautiful lady scientist, measuring 38-23-36. She wears the regulation lady scientist's rocket attire, tight satin blouse, short skirt, 4-inch heels and an ankle bracelet inscribed with scientific calculations. The board sits up and collectively straightens its tie. One or two arteries are heard softly snapping.)

ZORAB

(frowning at Dr. Space)

This lady is a scientist?

DR. SPACE

One of the greatest, Doctor Dawn O'Day. The most notable living authority on oxygen——

DR. O'DAY

(deadpan—automatically)

Oxygen OK.

DR. SPACE

(sotto voce)

Not yet, dear. (to Zorab) Her experiments with lung expansion are enormous——

ZORAB

And your other teammate?

DR. SPACE

Send in Dr. Latour.

(The doors open and the second beautiful lady scientist enters—36-25-38—attired in the same costume as her sister scientist. The board gapes.)

DR. SPACE

Doctor Taffy Latour, gentlemen, greatest living authority on elevation and guided missiles.

DR. LATOUR

(solemnly, efficiently)

Raise the elevators!

DR. SPACE

Doctor Latour is also the daughter of Professor Latour at Columbia, helping to finance her aged father's experiments in the effects of hot air by dancing at the Copa along with Doctor O'Day.

ZORAB

Well, you seem to have chosen wisely. After all, it is your rocket and it is a long tedious trip——

DR. LATOUR

Raise the elevators.

(redfaced)

Not yet, Doctor. (to Zorab) And now, sir, any last minute instructions? I've already read my sealed orders. I thought you wouldn't mind. I had to know which way to point the rocket—they can be balky things——

ZORAB

Yes—well then you know that you are to try to reach the West Coast with The Thing intact.

DR. O'DAY

Huh?

DR. SPACE

Never mind, Doctor——

ZORAB

The last two men we sent on this vital mission never reached there by rail. We have reports, unconfirmed, that they got off at Phoenix by mistake and are now selling Indian blankets.

DR. SPACE

Poor devils!

ZORAB

And, remember, DeMille couldn't even find the place at first, and has never returned or been heard of since!

DR. SPACE

Don't worry, Chief—we'll be back.

ZORAB

One more thing.

(He rises, goes to a wall graph charting the rise and fall of the various motion picture stocks.)

ZORAB

Whether these go up or whether these go down depends on your successful carrying out of secret plan RW.

DR. SPACE

We won't fail the Chemical Bank, And now I believe we'll take off——

DR. O'DAY

Oxygen O.K.

Not yet—not till we get in the rocket.

DR. O'DAY

Oh, I haven't even seen your old rocket anyway! I'll bet you don't even have one— (The board laughs good-naturedly.)

ZORAB

Have the girls—I mean Doctors—everything they need? Are those flying suits going to be—er—adequate?

DR. SPACE

Oh, these just their launching skirts. Their flight attire is more practical for fooling around at the controls. (Doctors O'Day and Latour, demonstrating, step out of their launching skirts to stand revealed in black lace rocket flight pants. The bank's President Emeritus faints dead away.)

ZORAB

(to Dr. Space enviously)

Godspeed!

DISSOLVE

EXT. ROCKET LAUNCHING GROUNDS—NIGHT—FULL SHOT—THE SPACE SHIP—THE BOARD IN F. G.

(Zorab and the Board wave goodbye as the three Doctors enter the ship, Dr. Space stopping at the fuselage door to wave back.)

DR. SPACE

And away we go!

(Zorab breaks a roll of quarters over the nose of the rocket, the explosive gas bursts into flame at the tail, and the ship takes off. SOUND EFFECT: SWISH!)

DISSOLVE

EXT. STRATOSPHERE—LONG SHOT—NEAR SATURN

(The space ship is skyrocketing through the heavens.)

INT. SPACE SHIP—MEDIUM SHOT—THE THREE DOCTORS

(It is two light years and some three days later. The three Doctors lie at the controls exhausted. A giant packing crate takes up the bulk of the interior stenciled: "THE THING—this end up." Doors lead off to three restrooms, their signs reading "LADY SCIENTISTS"—"GENTLEMEN SCIENTISTS"—"THINGS.")

DR. O'DAY

Where the hell do you think we are now?

DR. SPACE

(peering out irritably)

I told that engineer to wipe the windshield!

DR. LATOUR

I don't get it. Isn't this going around Hogan's Alley just to get to the West Coast?

DR. SPACE

(studying radar compass)

I wanted to approach from the Pacific Ocean side by an indirect route, hoping that the ocean breezes would blow away the smog allowing us to find some landmark, and if my calculations are correct——

DR. O'DAY

They're not—we're lost, bud!

DR. LATOUR

Hey! What's that big fat thing? It's coming right at us.

DR. SPACE

(leaping to controls)

Right rudder!

DR. LATOUR

Right rudder.

DR. O'DAY

Oxygen OK. (They miss Saturn by an inch.)

DR. SPACE

Whew! That was a close one. (pleased with himself.) You have to be pretty nimble where a nimbus is concerned!

(But his joke is lost on both his colleagues.)

DR. O'DAY

I'm getting sick of this! You said I'd have a future in Hollywood and we can't even find it!

DR. LATOUR

Me, too. Let's turn back. This is strictly for the birds!

DR. SPACE

Let's take a vote on it. I say keep And you, Doctor Dawn?

DR. O'DAY

Go back!

DR. SPACE

And you, Doctor Taffy?

DR. LATOUR

Go back but def!

DR. SPACE

There you are; that makes three in all—we go ahead.

(The lady scientists frown and start counting on their fingers.)

DR. SPACE

Wait! Look in the Terra Detector! That black smoky mass—that's smog. Hollywood should be directly south or north of us! Down rudders!

DR. LATOUR

(taking her station)

Down rudders.

DR. SPACE

Oxygen OK? (no answer) I said Oxygen OK?

DR. O'DAY

Oh—yeah—Oxygen OK.

DR. SPACE

Stabilize neutralizers.

DR. LATOUR

Stabilize neutralizers.

DR. SPACE

Neutralize stabilizers.

DR. LATOUR

Neutralize stabilizers.

DR. SPACE

Wait! There's something on the Visibility Screen—lettering on a water tower—L—A—S—V—E—G—A—S. Fasten money belts!

DR. LATOUR

Fasten money belts!

DR. O'DAY

Oxygen OK.

DR. SPACE

Full speed—North North East.

DR. LATOUR

Full speed—North North East.

(A few moments of silence as they straighten out and zoom over the California countryside.)

DR. SPACE

(looking out, jubilantly)

We're passing over Burbank. What does that sign read? W—A—R—N—E—R—B—R—O—S. Punch time clocks!

DR. LATOUR

Punch time clocks.

DR. SPACE

I see a clearing in the fog! Here goes—Don crash helmets!

DR. O'DAY

Oxygen OK.

(They brace themselves as the ship descends.)

EXT. A HOLLYWOOD CLEARING—FULLSHOT.

(As the rocket ship taxis onto the greensward a waiting group of press agents and newspaper photographers run to it excitedly.)

GROUP (ad lib)

It's King Gable! No, it's Coop! He said he was gonna buy a helicopter to shoot ducks from! Maybe it's MacMurray bringing back some more Black Angus for his ranch—or Bing and his boys!

(The fuselage door swings open and the three Doctors alight, and start blinking and coughing.)

DR. SPACE

Don smog helmets! (to group) Where's everybody?

PRESS AGENTS AND PHOTOGRAPHERS

(disgustedly)

Aw—they're not anybody.

(They start to turn away.)

DR. SPACE

But wait—we're from another world.

A PRESS AGENT

Good for you.

(getting sore)

Now, listen, I want to talk to all the executive heads of the studios—the fate of the industry hangs on it!

(The Group laughs but their spokesman, a more serious type, steps forward!)

SPOKESMAN

None of them are here, anyway. Most of them are out of town receiving plaques. Hartman is in New York baking out a virus he got in Palm Springs, and Zanuck is tied up on the Riviera putting out the place cards for Elsa Maxwell.

2ND SPOKESMAN

He did however leave Jessel as his deputy but he had to fly to Erie, Pa., and bury the mayor, a former staunch worker for the Democratic Party and a pretty good soft-shoe dancer.

DR. SPACE

I'm afraid you do not comprehend the gravity of my mis- . If I cannot convince you with words, well I have terrible power——

(The newshawks jeer, hurling taunts: "You have terrible power, ha, ha, that's rich!" "The Kid's from another world all right. A fugitive from Menninger's!")

(with a grave sigh)

I don't want to do it but I'm afraid I'll have to. It will happen at the stroke of four!

QUICK DISSOLVE:

MONTAGE OF SHOTS SHOWING IN SEQUENCE

(Interiors of studio steam rooms—and semi-nude executives disgusted when the steam is turned off, then panicked . . .

The lights going out over the pastry table at Romanoff's—six exhibitors' wives from Dubuque trampling eclairs underfoot as they run out screaming "I can't see! I've got rich food poisoning—I'm going blind" . . .

The studio generators stopping and every sound stage going dark. "Another jurisdictional union dispute," sigh the actors, huddling against the actresses for simple animal comfort.)

THEN INTO: CLOSE SHOT OF NEWS COMMENTATOR AT MICROPHONE.

NEWS COMMENTATOR

—and everything is at a standstill. The electric horse Mario Lanza was riding has stopped, the refrigerating unit at Grauman's Chinese has ceased to function, and a steady stream of chocolate-coated icecream is flowing down the centre aisle. The antique and student lamp factories are idle, and many an executive croquet playing field will be empty this weekend for the production of wickets has been completely halted. What dreadful power do these strangers possess?

DISSOLVE

EXT. THE CLEARING—NIGHT-FULL SHOT OUTSIDE THE SPACE SHIP.

(The heads of all the studios stand in solemn assembly as Doctor Space addresses them.)

DR. SPACE

Executives, producers, gentlemen—I am an emissary from the Chemical Bank in the faraway world of New York—and our bank is a heavy investor in motion picture stocks . . . (the executives are restless and frightened) Now recently a mechanical monster has threateneed to smash our world to bits—a monster named TV! And what steps have you taken to combat it?

ONE EXECUTIVE

We've trimmed our sails.

Pleased to Meet You!

By EDDIE CANTOR

Hollywood.

I am? Then I must be an awful liar. For instance, I'm dining in a restaurant—have a piece of boiled beef nicely dipped in horseradish at the end of my fork — I'm about to— "Yes, I'm Eddie Cantor. Pleased to meet you. Would I what? Would I meet some friends at your table? They're fans of mine? Don't mind at all— No, not at all?"

Eddie Cantor

So, you drop your fork—the boiled beef nicely dipped in horseradish—and trek over to this man's table, always at the other end of the room, and meet some fans. They saw me in the "Follies of 1905." They don't know that I know this was two years before the "Follies" was born. They remember the song I sang with Nora Bayes, "Shine on Harvest Moon." How can I tell them it was Jack Norworth? So I say "Thank you," and I'm ready to leave, but no, I must sit down and have a drink. "Come on, Eddie, be a regular fellow—don't be stuck up!" I tell them I have nothing to be stuck up about, and it kills me when they agree.

I return to my table, and there's that hunk of boiled beef, limp, but still nicely dipped in horseradish. It's cold, uninviting, so you order some hot coffee, say to yourself, "Well, you wanted to be an actor!"

While waiting for the check, you give out with "pleased to meet you" to a woman who introduces herself to you. She wants your autograph. Oh, not for her! They never want it for themselves. She has a niece who adores you. You and Jimmy Durante. "Funny," she says, "my niece is just crazy about homely men!" Should I sock her? How dare I think of such a thing? This is my public. I hand her the autograph—she shakes my hand—the one with the pen in it. I get ink all over my new sport coat, and a great big laugh from the woman. She's almost hysterical. "Wait till I tell this to my niece, Gwendolyn. She'll have something to tell all her friends. Imagine me getting ink all over Eddie Cantor's sport coat!" Pleased to meet you! My foot!

There's always one guy who has a relative. Most of the times he has a son who's coming to Hollywood. "Eddie Cantor," he says, casually, getting out his notebook and pencil, "what's your phone number at home? I want to give it to my boy, George. He'll be coming to Hollywood in a few weeks and he'd love to meet you."

"But," you protest, "I may be tied up. I'm a pretty busy man." He pats your arm reassuringly, "Oh, George doesn't want to live at your house. Just take him out one or two nights, and have him meet the girls." I start to think maybe he wants his boy to meet my unmarried daughter. He's thinking the same thing. "Y'know, Betty Grable, Lana Turner, or Rita Hayworth." You tell him, "I don't know these girls myself." He laughs uproariously, "Oh, you're such a card! You don't know them! You're such a liar!" And he's so right. I started lying the minute I said, "Pleased to meet you."

I would take any, or all, of these preference to ambitious mother with "talented" child. You have as much chance of eluding one of these gals as Kefauver would have in a crap game with the boys he investigated.

Better 'n' Judy or Deanna

In Boston recently, woman bribed or cajoled the doorman into allowing her to come to my dressing room. She modestly introduced herself with, "I'm the mother of this star," and pointed to a six-year-old moppet who smiled and gave me a big wink. "I'm pleased to meet you," I said to them both. I was going to wink back, but, with my eyes, it makes too much of a draft. "Eileen," she told me, "has been studying all her life. (Six years.) "She has a voice that's better than Judy Garland's or Deanna Durbi ' Hear her sing once and you'll never forget it." How right she was! The child sang like Tallulah with tonsillitis. Never did such sounds emanate from a human throat. I waited politely until she finished. "Lady, if you're spending your money on vocal lessons for this child; stop immediately. Save your money. Let her play with her dolls and skates. Give her a normal childhood. This little girl has no talent whatsoever. Some day you'll thank me for telling you the truth." Without a word, the mother grabbed the child by the wrist—yanked her towards the door, but before she went out, wheeled around, pointed her finger at me, and said, "You stink, too!"

Here are a few more who help me make a living, but who will eventually be the death of me.

The bird who sells insurance and because you're a celebrity, he has some unusual policies, just for you. For only $1,900 a year, his company will pay you $200,000 in the event you are bitten by an eagle while riding a bicycle, providing you're wearing a tuxedo. For a premium of $2,200 a year, the company will pay you $175,000 if you are hit by a submarine while driving your car through any public park.

I love the boy who shakes my hands and says, "All right, Cantor, who am I? What's my name?"

You're in a hurry, but he wants to play games! You guess for a while. No luck. Finally he tells you. But this doesn't end it. "Where did you meet me?" He wants to know.

"Boston?" No.

"Toledo?" No.

"Alaska?" No. "I've never been there in my life," he tells you. "Neither have I," you answer.

"So what made you think of Alaska?"

It's too cowardly to kill yourself —you'd like to give him—but you can't—maybe he's one of the public who buys what you sell on television.

I've no sooner said, "pleased to meet you" to the type, than he starts his spiel. "Cantor, you can't be performing forever. Have you thought about the future? Do you realize if you had invested $1,500 with Henry Ford when he started in business, that your worth today would be in the neighborhood of $6,000,000?"

Nice neighborhood, you think.

"If you had handed John D. Rockefeller $1,000 and said, 'John invest this for me in oil,' do you know where you'd be right now?"

"Yes," you tell him, "I'd be home in bed, with a good book, and if you'll excuse me, that's where I'm going." So you leave him before he can tell you of his proposition: a new type of sugar which, when sprinkled on doughnuts, keeps flies away, except during the months that don't have an "R" in them.

If you are filling a theatrical engagement in any city, there's the 'Come-ona-my House" guy who has told his guests that you're an old friend. You must have supper at his home! He's so persistent that you finally give in and go. Well, after an hour drive, you arrive and meet the gang. Your host mixes a drink that tastes like vodka, benzedrine, cactus juice tabasco sauce and machine oil. You make a face, but you're a good sport, and swallow this internal hot-foot. You're not expected to entertai . This is what your host assured you on the way out, but, coincidentally, they have all your music on the piano and a home-town Carmen Cavallaro, who evidently has been rehearsing all day because he knows all your keys. After an hour free entertainment, you're hungry. You make a big joke: you say, "Is there a dentist in the house?" Someone asks, "why?" You say, "I must get my teeth filled tonight." Several of them play straight. "Your teeth filled!" Now comes the big yak, "Yes," I tell them, "filled with steak, potatoes, salad ."

By this time, they get it. Your host escorts you into the dining room. You get a whiff of the one thing you've never eaten in your life—can't stand the sight of it! You guessed it! They had it! Spare ribs and sauerkraut. You grab a plateful, make a pretense of eating, and later, when nobody's looking, you drop it in a handy flowerpot. Two hours later, srtaved, tired, disgusted, in the lovely privacy of your hotel room, the waiter brings up your order of scrambled eggs, toast and coffee. You embrace him, and really mean it when you say, "pleased to meet you."

UA's Subsid On Pix It Finances

United Artists has set up a new subsidiary, United Artists Production Corp., which will concern ithelf with pix in which the distrib has an ownership participation. Indication is that in the future UA will take a percentage in a growing number of its releases via partial production financing on its own or arranging for the availability of coin.

First film to be carried on the new subsid's books will be "Planter's Wife," Claudette Colbert starrer which Ken Annakin will produce.

Recall Hectic Early Years Of United Artists

By GENE ARNEEL

The life of United Artists has been a stormy one, and its 1951 embarking on what may be a new era for the company serves to recall the hectic early years of its existence.

Some hitherto untapped sources have provided a further insight on the firm's early years. It's especially apropos in view of the anticipated switch in half-ownership to a syndicate headed by Arthur B. Krim, UA's new president.

Then—Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo put the outfit together corporately in the spring of 1919. Outsiders immediately wanted in. The corporation included such stellar names as Mary Pickford (Gladys Mary Moore on the official record), Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., William S. Hart, Charles Chaplin and David Wark Griffith, all out to buck the combines of the day. The new outfit attracted the attention of William Randolph Hearst, who was out to expand his empire.

M. F. Ihmsen, head of Hearst's Los Angeles Examiner, received a telegram from "the boss": "We have no interest in this matter (UA's formation) from a small viewpoint. We are the biggest institution of publicity and promotion in the world with all our magazines and newspaper services, news films, features services, etc." It was clear that Hearst was bent on taking over distribution of the independent group's output, and instructed Ihmsen to make the pitch. The proposal, to split the gross on a 50-50 basis, was turned down.

UA principals at the same time had differences among themselves. Hart bowed out before any contracts were signed.

But the others were determined to counter what they felt was a "threatened combination of motion picture stars and producers which would tend to force upon the theatre-going public mediocre productions and machine-made entertainment and would defeat competition in the motion picture industry."

While their determination to produce and distribute their own films was commendable, there was strong resistance within the trade. Also some threats.

1st National Exhibs Into Act

The powerful First National Exhibitors Circuit implied there could be no prospect of success unless it, too, was in the act. John Fairbanks, acting as business counsel for brother Douglas, heard from J. D. Williams, manager of the First National outfit, who boasted that his chain "controls the market."

"It would be inadvisable and extremely costly (wrote Williams) for United Artists—to antagonize or attempt to combat the circuit in any definite issue born of the advice or counsel of men who have neither the experience, influence or intimate knowledge of the industry necessary to satisfy them that it is not a plaything, or a means to advance their personal aspirations without regard for their associates. Attempts to form your own releasing organization will not be successful."

First National's offer was to take over distribution for the UA-ites at actual cost, plus 5% of the gross This proposition also nixed.

Contracts, when finalized, called upon the artists to provide capital through the purchase of 1,000 shares of preferred stock at $100 per share. Also, each was to collect 1,000 common shares in retur for delivery of nine "special photoplays which unfold an entertaining story" over a three-year period. Chaplin's first film for UA handling came in 1923, four years later. McAdoo, serving as general counsel, was voted 1,000 common shares.

Oscar Price Was 1st Prez

Company got underway with Oscar Price as first president. He had been McAdoo's chief publicist in the Liberty Loan drive. Installed as general manager was Hiram Abrams, whose deal gave him 3¼% of all coin taken in on each film up to $300,000, 1½% o the next $200,000, 3¾% on the next $100,000, and 1½% on all over $600,000. The owners were to receive 80%, the company, 20%, of gross on their respective pix.

Ensuing months pointed up the never-a-dull-moment nature of UA's career. By September, dissension had developed among the toppers themselves. Griffith and Chaplin expressed the fear that Miss Pickford and Fairbanks would prosper personally, but at the expense of the corporation. December of 1919 brought a hassle with Abrams, who insisted on revision of his contract. He wanted a straight 2% cut on the gross, and threatened to resign unless it was

Int'l, Domestic Sales Heads at 20th-Fox In Joint Meet for 1st Time

Annual sales confab of 20th-Fox will be started at the homeoffice next Monday (7), with territorial heads of the company's international organization sitting in with the domestic reps for the first time in 20th's history.

Talks will revolve around the 12 pix which 20th has skedded for release during the first four months of 1952, including the general release of "David and Bathsheba."

According to Al Lichtman, director of distribution, long-range plans and policies also will be set at the five-day conclave. Personnel attending will include company execs, 31 domestic branch managers, seven division chiefs, reps of the international organization and members of the advertising, exploitation and publicity department.

Prexy Spyros P. Skouras will participate in all sessions of the convention, while veepee Charles Einfeld will outline promotional plans for forthcoming product. BILLY ECKSTINE

Mostly About An American

By FRED ALLEN

"An American in Paris" originally was a musical masterpiece composed by the late George Gershwin. Recently, on cinema marquees, "An American in Paris" has appeared as the title of an M-G-M picture.

In Mr. Gershwin's stirring composition the instruments involved—the violins, the horns and piccolos—enjoy a melodic gambol. Throughout the film Gene Kelly, and the other members of the Screen Actors' Guild, revel in a Technicolor junket.

In music and in the movie all is tres gay. The "American in Paris" struts mythical Champs-Elysees swinging a harpoon, instead of a cane, for he is having a whale of a time.

But what about the average American? The little man with the travelers' checks who is lured to Paris by a color picture of a flaming crepes suzette or a "Folies Bergere" poster. What happens to this "American in Paris"? A recent survey conducted on a sightseeing bus shows that his days are crammed with confusion and his nights fraught with havoc. The American is frustrated at every turn. The first hazard to which he is exposed is—

The Language

The American arrives in Paris with a few French phrases he has culled from a conversational guide or picked up from a friend who owns a beret. He speaks the sort of French that is readily understood by another American who, also, has just arrived in Paris. The minute, however, the American attempts to make linguistic contact with a native verbal bedlam ensues. The Frenchman talks as though his nouns and verbs are red hot and he has to get the words out of his mouth before they blister his tongue.

The American can never make himself understood, he can't get the proper intonation.

The Frenchman talks through his nose and sounds as though he has a violin string up one nostril.

As the American gains confidence he will occasionally risk a cluster of French consonants and vowels in public. This often proves embarrassing. One American who had planned to buy a set of andirons found, when he left the antique shop, that he had bought two old ladies, one of whom was in poor condition. Another tourist speaking import French rattled off something to a waiter at Maxim's. When translated he found that he had said, "Who is playing the trombone under my potato salad?" As the American "ouis" and "mercis" his way in and out of shops and cafes he finds that to get what he wants he invariably has to point. The "American in Paris" finally learns that to speak French he doesn't require a tongue—all he needs is a finger.

When he has become resigned to his language dilemma the American finds that his next problem is—

The Money

Accustomed to his green, sound dollar, when he changes his first traveler's check, the American is panic-stricken. His pockets stuffed with those thin paper francs he feels like a man going to a masquerade as a wastebasket. To the American, French money appears to be jumbo confetti or tissue paper with murals. He catches himself servicing his nose with a 1,000-franc note and trying to spend his Kleenex.

French money serves a double purpose. If you don't want to spend it, you can wrap something in it.

"All the world's a stage" and France has the money to prove it. Unable to hurriedly determine the value of the franc in terms of dollars the American is completely bewildered in the presence of the French shopkeeper. He employs the technic he uses back home with the tax collector. He holds out all of his money and the shopkeeper, like the tax collector, helps himself. After one joust the American knows why the French tradesman wears a long apron. The tradesman doesn't need trousers. He always has his hands in the Americans' pockets.

The American notices an odd thing about the small metal coins—a magnet will not pick them up but a Frenchman will. The "American in Paris" often looks forward to the day of his departure when he knows he can get his francs changed back into money.

When he has learned to speak well enough to spend his money the American finds that the next difficulty he encounters is—

The Food

The two largest industries in Paris are shrugging and eating. The Frenchman shrugs—the American eats. In all cafes fish and meats are served smothered in sauce or gravy. In Paris what is sauce for the goose is not sauce for the gander. The gander has his own sauce.

Foods that aren't decked in a mantle of goo are served in a sheet of flame. For the first time the "American in Paris" enjoys eating food he can read by. He also sees many a nearsighted chef with a barbecued hand.

The streets of Paris are cluttered with sidewalk cafes. The Frenchman is generous. He likes to eat out of doors so the flies can have some.

There are hundreds of cafes and every cafe has a wine cellar. In Paris there are so many rodent dipsomaniacs Alcoholics Anonymous may have to open a branch for mice. When the American is told that the specialty of the house is pressed duck he knows that the chef is also a tailor. When he sees the maitre d' walking around in his bare feet, the American knows that wine is made to order on the premises. If wine is requested the maitre d' selects a bunch of grapes and steps into a closet. A little muffled squishing is heard and in practically no time at all the maitre d' steps nimbly out of the closet with red feet brandishing a carafe of vin rouge. On occasion, when the American tastes wool in the wine he knows that winter has come and the maitre d' has been stomping on the grapes in his stockinged feet.

A popular French dish is the il, which is sort of an inner-door shrimp. As a chef gets older he prefers to cook snails. A snail is the only type of food the chef can overtake while he is sitting down.

The American who eats three meals a day in cafes soon becomes a gourmet. (A French word meaning glutton.) During sundry nightmares induced by too much rich food the American sees himself spending the rest of his life running a small business—renting stomachs to "Americans in Paris."

The Traffic

The American is impressed by the number of churches in Paris. There is a church on every corner and it has been put there for a purpose. It enables the American to stop in and pray that he will be able to safely cross the street in traffic.

Traffic in Paris cannot be described—words would have to be invented. It is a symphony of tumult rendered by taxis, cars and bicycles all striving to attain a crescendo of chaos.

The French taxidriver is a frustrated pilot. He zooms through the streets cursing because he cannot get his cab to go fast enough to take off. The private cars are shrunken coupes whose hunched-over occupants look like human snails who have been crossed with greyhounds.

Scooting in and out of traffic are bicycles carrying optimists, both old and young, who think they are going to get home alive.

Most French automobiles have no breaks. The driver keeps his foot on the gas and his hand on the horn. High over the montage of din, at intervals, the piping tone of the policeman's whistle is heard. Instead of the regulation pea in his whistle the Paris traffic cop uses a petit pois.

The American cannot be too cautious. A street should be named for the Unknown Pedestrian who tries to cross in traffic. A street called "Rue the Day."

As the American, his vacation over, prepares to leave for home he jots in his diary some—

Random Obesrvations

The Flea Market in Montmartre is not run by a flea.

Three million frogs legs are served in Paris daily. Nobody knows what becomes of the rest of the frogs.

The Marshall Plan is overdoing it. They have pinball machines in Paris.

No American is ever held up and robbed at night. The tradesmen get all of his money during the day.

The average Frenchman is inventive, frugal and industrious. Give him a carroway seed and enough room and he is in business.

The men who formerly sold postcards are now busy trying to lure tourists into doorways to change their American money.

People in Paris point with pride to the old churches, the old museums and the old houses. All of the work in France was done yesterday. If you wonder what the Frenchman of today is doing—he is out strolling along the boulevards looking for the "American in Paris."

The French cow thinks she is giving milk, but she is only giving lait. (It loses something in the translation.)

Every pretty woman has a dog. A man who leads a dog's life in Paris is to be envied.

Humor History of 1951

By HY GARDNER

(N.Y. Herald Tribune Columnist)

America, as usual, drew its heartiest chuckles from the situations that troubled it most. We kidded ourselves about dirty politicians; a grim, undeclared war; scandals, investigations, inflation, taxes, matrimony, alimony, television and all the other subjects that become natural targets to a nation whose most precious asset, next to freedom, is its sense of humor.

This, then, is a capsule digest of some of the sayings some of us thought funny in '51.

When Denise Darcel was voted the "Antique Queen of 1951" radio commentator Jack Sterling flipped: "What antique does she represent—a break-front?"

Bob Hope suggested a method of keeping basketball honest; put more than two guards on each team.

Morey Amsterdam met bookie who's gotten 30 days so often they're naming a month after him.

Studying a closeup photograph of Russia's Andrei Vishinsky and noting that he only has seven upper teeth, the opinion was ventured that his bark must be worse than his bite.

Dorothy Sarnoff, worried about so many members of the younger generation going to college, wondered who'd be around to hire college graduates if nobody left school in the eighth grade.

Mary McCarty said she simply won't go out wth an internal revenue agent—she's allergic to milk.

And Jack Carter said he doesn't mind paying his income tax—he's just confused as to which jail to address it to.

About inflation it was reported that the price of kissing the Blarney Stone has gone up from 14c to 21c . . . That the only money that goes as far today as it did 10 years ago is the nickel that rolls under the bed . . . An 8th Avenue lunchroom got yaks with a sign that read: "Come in and get an estimate on a sirloin steak. Time payments arranged."

Last war, it was observed, the Gremlins bothered us; this time out it's the Kremlins.

Senator McCarthy was given a rib when somebody said he wanted to investigate a certain Government worker whom he heard telephone from a party line.

One item in Pravda—that's the Russian house organ that's always out of tune—bragged about a peasant having reached his 151st birthday—which is quite an accomplishment for a person who's never lived.

The Kefauver probe practically supported the nation's gag writers. About Frank Costello, who refused to permit anything but his hands to be televised, this was said: "Costello is the first television actor who uses a manicurist instead of a makeup man."

Herb Shriner thought it was logical for the Government to remove automobile trailers from the restricted list. After all, he reasoned, a motorist needs a trailer to live in while he's finding a place to park.

London Opinion described England as an island entirely surrounded by hot water.

With so many Congressmen and Senators making free junkets overseas, it was suggested that the old Navy enlistment slogan be changed to read: "Join the Congress and See the World."

When Commie Gus Hall's trial for jumping bail came up his lawyers tried to stall the case by arguing about a mole on his neck. As usual, the comrades made a mountain out of a mole.

In summation, let's welcome '52 with courage, faith and a smile; this time last year we weren't even sure there would be a New Year.

AAAH, WHAT'SA USE? I GIVE UP!

By ARTHUR KOBER

Julie, I beg you, I implore you. Please, Julie! I'm a dead horse, I'm so tired. I can collapse ommy two feet without I gotta stand there, listenin' to ya go on an' on. The poverbal brook, that's you, an' I mean it. . . Please, Julie! It's late an' I gotta geddup firs' cracka dawn. . . Yeah, yeah, ya're right. Absolutely! I'm no good, I'm terrible, I'm simply awful, I stinkin ice. Grantid! . . . Look, I'm admitti ' it, so, please, as a persinil favor, willya kiney park the chatter an' lemme gedda bed? Please! I'm so exhaustid, I. . . . Aw, fa the love a Pete, willya kiney leddup a minute!

Arthur Kober

Boy, talk about Chinee torcha, that gallopin' tongue a yours keeps beatin' me over the head worse like a sletchhamma, an' I mean it! . . . O.K., lease ya could do, ya could at lease sing a diffrint tune. Oh, no! Same damn song over an' over again till a guy could. . . Yeah, yeah, I know thoroughly howya feel! Believe me, ya tole me enough times tonight, I could repeat you the whole thing without me skipin' single word. . .

Aw, right, Julie, so fa the twenny zilliont time I apologize. I apologize why I did show up fa suppa tonight. I apoligize I din have the common courtesy a dime phone call to letch know I wasn't comin' home. I apoligize I got no consideration hommuch ya slaved all day over the hot stove, cookin' me up the suppa. In fack, I apoligize the whole damn thing! Now are ya saddified?

Aha, I knew it! There go the waterworks. Go ahead, cry, flood up the place. . . Certainly I gotta heart, but if you think I get one ounce pleasure standin' here, a dead horse ommy two feet, while you go blubberin' away like a ninfant child, ya got another. . . . Yeah, an' what about me? Minute I come inna house—bang!—World War number three, with me right inna mist! Million-one questions ya fire at me, an' on toppa that, wouldja lemme get a word in edgewise? No! Wouldja gimme a chance to explain? No! Wouldja let a guy——

Well, to begin with, Mr. Patch di show up thi mornin'. Right away one the guys onna floor—Harris, I think—or maybe was it Bennett? Anyways, somebody onna floor says, "I betcha the new baby came is why Mr. Patch's not aroun' this morni '." Anyways, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon in breeze Mr. Patch—great big smile onnis face, and he commence passin' aroun' cigars from his pockit. Sure enough, around', oh, 'bout semn o'clock early this mornin' his wife gave birth to an eight-poun' baby boy it was, an' right away evveybody onna floor, they begin rushin' over, congrajilatin' him, Mr. Patch. Anyways, there was so much excitement inna store, nobody waited on the customers hardly.

Gotta Celebrate

Anyways aroun' awmost five o'clock this was, Mr. Patch tells evveybody they could knock off the resta the day—you know, kinda to celibrate his new baby. Right away up speaks the blow-mouth, Wally Sherman. "Hey, fellas," he says to us, "bein' the boss is got a brannew baby son, hozz 'bout we should take him out, Mr. Patch, and buy him a drink?" . . .

How can I, when ya keep innaruptin' me? . . O.K., so we go to Mike's bar onna corner, an' Mr. Blow-mouth, Wally Sherman, he's the firs' one to buy the drinks. Natchelly I'm not gonna let that smart guy put nothin' over, so comes the nex' roun', I grab the check. So before ya know it, we're all feelin' a li'l high, not much. . . .

Anyways, by this time Mr. Patch says he's gotta rush back to see his wife an' the brannew baby—I mean at the hospital, and I'm all set to go home, see, when Wally Sherman, the wise guy, the big brai , he gets an idear. "Look, fellas," he says, "there's five us guys here, jess enough fa a li'l poker game. So hozz about it?" . . .

Waddeya mean, "Of course you acceptid?" Listen, I argied and I argied with the fellas, but they insisted without I play, it's oney four-handid, and nobody—well, they simply refused to play four-handid. "Listen," I says to them, "the lease I gotta do, I gotta lease make a phone call home an' inform my wife, she's expectin' me fa suppa." Right away they started in kiddin' me— That stinker, Wally Sherman an' his cracks! It's a wonder I din haul off an' him have it, which I shoulda. . . .

Please, Julie, willya pipe down a minute an' listen? I'm tryin' to explain you why. 'Cause the minute I started goin' to the phone, they all grabbed hole my arm and they started in yellin' how I shouldn't hole up the game, they're all anxious to get started. . . .

No Character

O.K., so I got no character! I guess you're the oney one aroun' here with character. . . When? Doong the game I shoulda' phoned? Listen, in the firs' place, I was way ahead doong the game, lease the early part, an' if I'da made one move to get away from the table, they'da bustid my arm, 'specially that Wally Sherman who kep' cryin' alla time hommuch dough he's out. Then alluva sudden, I get a runna bad luck. Nothin' I got held up, not one hand even! If I got two big pairs, somebody's come along, draw one card, an' he'd fill a straight. Lousy luck is all! I couldn't make a single hand stan' up without somebody. . . .

Please, Julie, don't ast me hommuch I lost. I feel so terrible, I don't even wanna think about it. Here I sit a whole night long, worryin' my head off why I din show up fa suppa, an' you home prolly aggravatin' yesself to death, wonderi ' what's happened to me, an' then on toppa that Mr. Wally Sherman wines up the big winner, most my dough.

Believe me, honey, I'm sickin disgusted with myself. An' how I'm disgustid! I guarantee you I din have a good time. I guarantee you I din enjoy myself the lease li'l bit. In fack, jess the opposite. I feel simply awful, Julie, and that's the honess truth. Ha? . . . Aw, never again, an' I mean it! Absolutely!

Hmm? . . . Hommuch I lost? I—I'll tellya, honey, but firs' ya gotta promise me ya won't get mad. Promise? . . . Semny-eight bucks. Believe me, Julie, I . . .

Aw, fa cryin' out loud! Ya jess gayme ya word ya wouldn't get sore, an' now. . . . Hoddeya like that? Firs, she promises she's not gonna say a word, an' now listen to her yaddedda, yaddedda, yaddedda! . . . Aaah, what'sa use? I give up!

Hollywood 300 Years from Now

Just As the Elizabethans Were Contemptuous Because of Their Familiarity With Shakespeare, Marlowe, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, Maybe It Will Take Centuries for the Hollywood Greats to Achieve True Recognition

By RUPERT HUGHES

Hollywood.

Since history keeps repeating itself, the best way to make a prophecy is to ride a cycle and imagine the return of something that happened before.

I did this once with sad results in a speech I made that scored one of the worst flops even I have ever flipped. Yet it seems to me that what I was trying to say was worth saying, especially at that time when young Hollywood was running away with Los Angeles, and horrifying all really respectable people—none more than the good people of Los Angeles who admitted that they were the aristocracy out here.

Rupert Hughes

Nowadays the motion pictures have their own artistocracy and their classics. It is already hard for us to remember or realize how they were looked down upon in the pioneer days when the great creators of the world-shaking art were still not far above their humble origins in the kinetoscopic peepshow and the plebian nickelodeon.

I did not get to Hollywood until 1922; but the curse was still upon the pictures and their people. Previously my writings had been treated with kindness or severity according to their supposed merits or faults in each case. The moment Sam Goldwyn brought me out as one of his so-called "Eminent Authors," most of the eastern reviewers began to treat me as a fugitive from respectability and an unmasked Philistine.

Novels that could not possibly be made into movies were damned as "plainly written for the screen," and I was denounced for having sold for filthy lucre what had passed for my soul.

As a result of my experiences I wrote a novel about Hollywood. It was not a glorification, not even a defense of the movies, merely a description of what went on here in turning personalities into world-merchandise by teaching men and women how to act, photographing them doing so, and vending the result. Hence the title, "Souls for Sale." It was accepted in the east as meaning "Bodies for Sale," and not being a downright attack on the pictures, it stirred the eastern reviewers to frenzies of rage.

Perhaps the best of all the wonderful reviews my novels have ever had—and some of them have been really wonderful—was this one in a New York paper:

"Some novels make me so mad I want to bite somebody. 'Souls for Sale' makes me so mad I want to run down Broadway and bite everybody I meet."

Surely, few other authors can boast of as good a proof of their inspirational influence and power to stimulate the emotions. I am quite proud of that review.

But all this is leading up to a speech I made about the picture business here in their own home-town. It had a positively hydrophobic effect.

The Untouchables

Soon after I got to Hollywood, I was more or less dragooned into joining a swagger golf club. A few days later William De Mille stopped me on the street and said:

"You must resign from that club. They don't allow motion picture people to belong."

The golf people had not even known of my cinemaffiliation when they invited me in. Not long after that I rented a furnished house for three months. After the lease was signed, the owner called on me and I chanced to mention the fact that I was one of Sam Goldwyn's little white slaves.

My new landlord fell to sweating and trembling and wanted to cancel the lease. It seems that some of the early movie stars, having made a sudden leap in salary from $80 a month to a thousand or more a week, had rented mansions and made themselves at home by swinging from the chandeliers and feeding their horses in the dining room. I assured the owner that I was house-broken and would not break bronchos in his living room. And he let me stay.

A little later I was invited to speak on a very picturesque occasion, a most beautiful occasion. My speech was one of the worst failures in history, even in my history. I quote it only because it illustrates what a change has come over the Los Angelesian people in their attitude toward motion picture people. Indeed, the whole world has changed its attitude, especially since radio and television came along to give the motion pictures a feeling of antiquity and classicism.

This occasion was the opening in what is now MacArthur Park of a Shakespeare Garden. Gentlemen and ladies of literary and floricultural tastes had gathered together at least one example of every flower ever mentioned in Shakespeare's immortal works.

The Mayor and other dignitaries were invited to make speeches, and somebody, ignorant of my interest in the motion picture slums, asked me to close the meeting with a few remarks. I closed them with a bang. Some imp led me to say what I did, to the resentment and horror of a number of unfortunate guests who had to stand and listen, to what you don't even have to set and read. In any case, this is the gist of a speech that still seems to me to have a certain truth in it as the basis for a crazy prophecy. What I said ran something like this:

"It is over 300 years since Shakespeare died, and now his works are placed next to the Bible in the esteem of scholars and people in general. His plays and poems are considered the sublimest utterances of all writers not divinely inspired.

"Yet, in his own day, his professions of actor, author, and producer were so despised in London that theatres were not even allowed on the right side of the Thames. They were permitted only on the wrong side of the railroad tracks among the bawdy houses.

"Actors were vagabonds unless taken under the wing of some nobleman who was licensed to keep a company of trained players. The swells and personages of title sometimes visited the playhouses, just as swells and dukes nowadays sometimes marry chorus girls, or visit gambling hells and dives.

"The dramas we now cherish as golden classics were also condemned. When the wealthy Sir Thomas Bodley founded the great Bodleian Library at Oxford and endowed it lavishly, he could have loaded it with the first editions of Shakespeare's plays—those folios for which thousands of dollars are demanded nowadays. He could have picked up for nothing original manuscripts of all the plays of Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Marlowe, Beaumont and Fletcher, Ford, Wemster, and the rest. The authors would have been proud to contribute them.

"But do you know what Sir Thomas Bodley did? He sternly forbade the library even to spend any of his endowment on such evil trash things as books or manuscripts of plays! Shakespeare's works would have contaminated the very shelves!

"And indeed the actors and authors of those plays were very human. They drank and wenched and were financially unreliable. The great Marlowe was murdered, and we have documents showing that even gentle Will Shakespeare was put under heavy bonds to keep him from carrying out his promise to cut the throats of couple of gentlemen who had promised to cut his.

"Now imagine, if you can, a lady or gentleman of respectable London society in Shakespeare's time being privileged to come back to this earth and visit this paradise of Los Angeles.

"America had been discovered, of course, and Santa Monica beach had been noticed as a place where many little Indian fires were burning, even as they burn there now when bathing parties go swimming at night. But Shakespeare and his people could never have dreamed of such a city as Los Angeles. And yet here we meet to pay tribute to his almost sacred name.

"So you can imagine, if you strain hard enough, the utter amazement of a Londoner and a Londoness of Shakespeare's day if he and she could be set down among us and learn what we are doing today. They would gasp:

Ghastly!

"'My God, of all the people in our great city, you pick out an actor, and a theatre manager to memorialize! We wouldn't permit his pernicious plays to be acted on the reputable side of the river, or included in our libraries.

"'But you strange people plant a garden and put in it every flower that vagabond villager even so much as mentioned. As if his mere naming of a flower gave it a new glory! As if he gilded the lily and gave the rose a recognition that ennobled it!'

"That is the sort of thing the Londoners of 300 years ago would say of us who stand here today.

"Now let us suppost that some of us could have a similar experience. Suppose that you yourselves should be brought back to this scene 300 years from now. The changes would dumbfound us, but none I think would be so amazing, so appalling to some of you, as the change in what the centuries may have done to the motion pictures.

"If Los Angeles had a real river running through it, the wrong side of the river would be called Hollywood; and to that bank would be consigned all the 'disreputables,' such as the motion picture studios and people whose activities give so much pain and shame to your truly respectable Los Angelesians.

"The good people here go to see the pictures and even meet the actors now and then; but it is much as they go to the Zoo to see the animals, or sneak off to a rowdy night club to see how the lower elements behave—and misbehave.

"In the newspapers here, they have what they call Society Pages. No motion picture people are ever mentioned or pictured there. As a concession to them, some of the papers devote a certain amount of space to what they ironically dub Motion Picture Society. None of the more dignified people here would think of inviting motion picture people to their formal dinners or select receptions.

"When I was brought out here, few people knew that I had any motion picture ideas. So a golf club in its innocence of my low purposes invited me to join. In my innocence I did. The prominent playwright and director, William DeMille told me I ought to resign because that golf club did not admit motion picture people to its clubhouse.

"A man who rented me a house went into a panic when he learned that I was actually associated with the studios.

"I could give other instances, but you all know how motion picture people stand here in this town, which Hollywood is making world-famous and prosperous beyond its wildest dreams.

A Look Into the Future

"What I'm leading up to is this: Suppose that some of you ladies and gentlemen here were brought back to Los Angeles 300 years from now.

"Imagine your stupefaction if you should find just what I think you would find here. Hollywood would be a sort of mecca of almost religious significance. A studio would be regarded as a shrine. You would find that Wilshire and the other boulevards and the parks would have had their names changed to those of motion picture actors, authors, directors—even producers! There would be museums housing costumes, programs, scripts as revered treasures.

"Remember how indignantly Sir Thomas Bodley forbade anyone to soil the Bodleian Library with a play? Well, you have a big public library here, and many university libraries. It is safe to say that not one of them would admit a motion picture scenario to its sacred archives.

"Three hundred years from now, students will be writing doctorate theses on the early history of the world-shaking creation of the motion picture, which had its capital here. Will they find in our libraries the priceless manuscripts that are now despised? The thought horrifies you, doesn't it? But so it would horrify the people of Elizabethen England could they come here and take part in this tribute so well deserved by that great, that sublime genius who came to London from a small town and helped to build up the glorious drama of England, and a name that is recognized as supreme by every civilized nation on earth.

"Shakespeare's plays were reviled while he lived. Later the Puritans closed all the theatres for years because the theatre was called "the vestibule of hell," the enemy of virtue, the corrupter of youth.

but the motion pictures are shown to millions every day and night. They speak a universal language. They bind all mankind together in one race. They enrich the poorest lives with pictures of beauty, drama, sympathy, pity, laughter, luxury, love, tragedy, farce. They make all people know that we all suffer and enjoy the same things.

"The motion picture is a mighty force, a marvelous thing. Its people are doing a noble, a glorious work such as never was dreamed of before.

"Shakespeare deserves the homage you are paying him beautifully today. But don't forget your neighbors out Hollywood way. Don't look down upon their tremendous achievements, lest posterity look down upon you, and marvel at your contempt for what should be your chief cause of pride. Immortal work is being done in Hollywood by geniuses who deserve not only your encouragement but your profoundest homage——"

Somewhere along there I stopped speaking at last. When I finished a few motion picture people who chanced to be there smiled at me as they patted me on the back for my mischievous impudence.

But most of the ladies and gentlemen treated me with aversion, contempt and cold indignation.

And yet I feel that what I said, however inept and untimely its expression, conveyed a truth that ought not to be overlooked or forgotten. The worst of it is that the motion picture people themselves are so damnably meek and shamefaced about the magnificent work they are doing.

TALENT INCUBATOR

By OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2d

"Where are our great comedians going to come from, now that we no longer have burlesque and vaudeville?" This is a question you often hear and read. It is a favorite question among those who, instead of flying flags for show business, prefer to hang crepe. It's an impressive and a frightening question—unless you take the trouble to look for an answer. You don't have to look far—a few miles north to the Catskills and the Adirondacks, a few miles west to the Poconos. In these borscht-tinted hills, many a belly laugh has budded and bloomed, and many of our funniest men have sharpened their jokes on summer campers. Danny Kaye, Sid Caesar, Sam Levenson, Jerry Lester, Red Buttons, Henny Youngman, (Miss) Jean Carroll and Julie Oshins all owe at least a part of their development to the Mountain Time. This is also true of Larry Storch, Jackie Miles, Gene Baylos, Phil Foster, Dave Barry and Myron Cohen.

O. Hammerstein 2d

A few of these have had the benefit of some training in burlesque and vaudeville, but these two mediums can certainly not be regarded as their principal developing ground. The same can be said of Milton Berle and Phil Silvers, who, in addition to burlesque, have performed in night clubs and picture houses and Broadway revues. The night club cradled (Dean) Martin & (Jerry) Lewis, who then zoomed into stardom in pictures and television. The night club was also the springboard for Wally Cox and Eddie Mayehoff, each of whom has developed his own very original drolleries and taken them into television and Broadway entertainments.

So if two of our old meadows lie fallow, we have found fresh fields that are producing promising crops of comics—TV, radio, pictures, niteries, the "Borscht Circuit"—that is where our new funny men are coming from.

This simple answer should be enough for the lachrymose head-shakers, hand-wringers and shoulder-shruggers. But it won't be. If the imminent demise of the comic is taken away from them, many of them will find something else to quench their thirst for misery. There are too many of these premature mourners i the theatre and around its outskirts. Unwilling to wait for the predicted death of the entertainment world, they would bury it alive.

It may well be true that burlesque is dead (and as far as I am concerned, it lasted too long). There is very little left of vaudeville as we know it. (I was brought up on it, and I miss it). But the ingredients that flavored these mediums are showing up in other mediums, and so it will always be.

The world changes. Style and method change, but the substance of life remains the same. As long as there are people with the talent and the ambition to provide entertainment, there will be people eager to receive their bounty. This will be true as long as there are people on the earth. How long there will be people on the earth is quite another question. If you want a real worry, worry about that.

Need Prod. Flexibility To Swing With Public's Tastes

By JACK L. WARNER

(V. P., Warner Bros. Pictures)

Burbank.

There is nothing easier than making a rosy forecast.

Combine high-sounding phrases with a surge of optimism and the future will look bright for any enterprise.

Jack L. Warner

The truth is that forecasts are as problematical as the weather. For years the aerological experts have been perfecting instruments that measure the velocity, size and direction of air masses. They can call the dew point to the final tenth and tell you the milibar reading anywhere on the globe. There are weather stations everywhere to plot the movements of storms. And yet, the weatherman is often wrong. His calculations are correct, but - foreseen situations develop over which he has no control. That means that you get caught in the rain, or you wear your coat and the sun shines.

The same differentials occur in the forecasting of business cycles. It may be that the steelmakers can consult their charts and graphs and accurately predict the tonnage they will sell in any coming year but personally I have yet to uncover a way that will tell me how many people are going to buy tickets to a Warner Bros. picture any-body's picture.

The vagaries of the motion picture public, therefore, preclude the making of a forecast because we are not positive today, nor have we ever been since this business first began, of exactly what kind of motion picture is going to be successful with the ticket buyers. We only experiment and use trial and error, exactly as my brothers and I did when we tried making one of the first factual film, "My Four Years in Germany," strictly on a hunch that the public might accept the film version of a topselling book.

One thing we can predict, however, and that is what we believe we will do with our end of the business. The exact effect that this, in turn, will have upon the populace I leave to more astute crystal gazers.

We do not feel that carefully plotting a schedule of films and release dates many months in advance, or preparing dozens of scripts and letting them gather dust until the schedule calls for their activation necessarily insures boxoffice. The public taste changes as often as the weather. Overnight the boxoffice trend reverse itself. In the span of a single month films doing big business can become passe.

The film-maker who expects to stay in business must be prepared to meet these challenges and come up with a product that will attract new customers.

Day to day study of our boxoffice receipts, assaying from them what type of pictures draw in certain situations is important. We can plan from this—to a degree—what to prepare in the future. We believe in a diversified program of screen fare; I know of no restaurant, for example, that has made a financial success over the years of selling lamb chops only.

Our program is geared to include musicals, modern dramas, outdoor adventure stories, comedies, top stage hits and the lives of great Americans. How many of each of these we will make next year I cannot say because today I do not know. If the balance swings to a different demand we will try to level it again with the proper product. I think that our player roster is a perfect compliment to this program. It includes many of the greatest names the motion picture industry has produced, coupled with fresh new personalities we are building into the stars of tomorrow.

I am a firm believer in the fact that entertainment can only be produced by enthusiasm. Ours is a tough business. It has long hours, setbacks, discouragements, and yet it is filled with people whose enthusiasm for it grows with the years. An organization with such drive will always have the jump over the listless competitor because it is alert to every directional change in the public taste.

I am confident of the future of the industry and of Warner Bros. studios. I do not need a forecast to tell me both are going to succeed. I do not need a vision into the coming months to tell me that we will have problems, that the boxoffice picture will fluctuate constantly, but that we are on the upswing and that we will continue to stay on the upswing.

That is all the forecast I need.

Lesser-Known Filmers Boon to Talent-Starved GIs, Say Curtis-Leigh

Even the lesser-known performers get a rousing cheer when entertaining servicemen abroad, it was reported this week by Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis, back the States from England, Germany and France. But there's still too few show world personalities on tour, they feel.

Curtis and Miss Leigh (Mrs. Curtis) related there appears a lack of organization in getting performers off to the far-flung service installations. They told VARIETY a number of actors and actresses of their acquaintance would be willing to join in traveling troupes. But the big difficulty lies the official arranging.

Curtis said it's a foregone conclusion that the Hopes and Bennys will go over big before the men in uniform. He added: "But Janet and I are not nearly so well known, not known at all to many of the boys, and still got a sock reception.

"Also, I had the feeling a man in long hair and a nice civilian suit might be resented. Instead, they really were glad to see me. Main thing was that we had just come from the States, and I guess we were like link with home for the GIs. Many of them told us they hadn't seen any U. S. shows in six months."

Curtis, under contract to Universal, and Miss Leigh, on the Metro roster, first participated in a benefit for the Duke of Edinburgh-staged festival for Britain's National Playing Fields. They toured Western Germany, then went to Paris before hopping to N. Y.

So 25 Years Ago It Was: 'What We Gonna Do About Radio?'

By ROBERT M. WEITMAN

(V.P. of United Paramount Theatres, Inc. and Managing Director of N. Y. and Brooklyn Paramounts)

Before VARIETY asked me questions pertaining to the future, I had been asking a few myself.

I look back over the years in this business—25—and everything we are hearing today I used to hear in those days when I first started. The cry for more showmanship; the blues singers wanting more of everything except work; the "what are we gonna do about radio" crowd—and now; "What are we gonna do about television?"

There is only one thing we ought to do about our business and that is to think about it and work at it.

The N.Y. Paramount Theatre has just finished one of the biggest years in its history. We don't think this is any accident because all of us connected with the theatre worked very hard to if we couldn't make it a big year.

When the picture didn't look too good, we booked strong show with it. When the picture looked good, we booked a strong show just to make sure. In other words, we tried in the last year to give the public more than their money's worth and we think it paid off.

Now as to the future of Exhibitor vis-a-vis Television, I merely want to repeat what I said previously, and that is I think we can do a lot with television as far as selling our shows in the theatres.

As to the talk about fewer theatres in the future, that's anybody's guess. My guess is that as long as there are good pictures there will be a lot of theatres. Undoubtedly new theatres in the next five years will get the benefit of modern designing and modern equipment and will attract more attention than old theatres.

We at the Paramount try to keep our theatre modern by making it newsworthy. We try to get the right pictures and we try to get the right shows (acts). In the final analysis, people don't come to see a theatre; they come to see a show.

COMPO is the one answer to industry public relations and the industry means to improve the boxoffice. "Movietime U.S.A." proved that we can do it if we put our shoulders to the wheel. I see nothing to be pessimistic about. To the contrary I am more optimistic than ever—and how are you?

No People Like Show People

(Embarrassing Moments With the Stars)

By MAURICE ZOLOTOW

The propinquity to great stars and theatrical personalities that writing about them makes necessary is something I usually find extremely stimulating. There are, like I say in my current book, No People Like Show People, and hobnobbing with them is a vibrant experience as they are exciting, amusing, delightful persons. But now and then, in the course of this hobnobbing, there have come incidents and brief moments which have brought a deep shade of magenta to my ears.

There was the time I was profiling Ray Bolger for the Satevepost when he was starring in "Where's Charley? at the St. James Theatre. Bolger played the double role of both Charley and his Aunt from Brazil. This necessitated, as I recall it, 24 changes from men's clothes into women's clothes and back into men's clothes; many of the changes were extremely quick, being done in two or three seconds. Since Bolger often exited from stage l. and entered from stage r. (and vice versa) he had suitable costumes and dressing tables on both sides of the stage and spent a good deal of time racing around backstage in order to make his changes. Many of the scenes were played on a full stage and Bolger, followed by his dresser, had to squeeze along between a backdrop and the brick wall of the theatre as he ran from one side to the other. During one matinee, I stayed with Bolger and followed him back and forth to see at first hand how quickly and efficiently he changed.

Surge of Tittering

Remember that all this was being done in almost complete darkness backstage. Well, Bolger would lope along from one side of the stage to the other, getting in and out of the Aunt's costume, and his dresser would be right on his heels, and I was tagging along behind the dresser. Came a quick change in Act II. Bolger had exited from the left, stopped to take a sip of orange juice, signalled me to follow him, and off he went behind a piece of scenery, with his dresser on his tail. I took off in the direction of the dresser, but I got lost in the darkness. I was racing along when I was suddenly conscious of a surge of tittering. I turned. To my horror, a burst of light from the borders hit me—and I realized I had made an entrance on stage. The ingenue and juvenile were doing a duet. I had no conceivable business there. I stood frozen in my position for what seemed like hours. I didn't know whether to continue running forward or to turn around and go back. Finally, I sort of edged back slowly until I was out of view. Once, outside, I literally crumpled, being bathed in perspiration from head to foot.

A different type of awkward situation took place with the late Al Jolson. Among Jolson's less endearing characteristics was a colossal megalomania that expressed itself in a tight control of even the most petty aspects concerning those around him. I, Jolson, his batman Eppy and his accompanist Martin Fried had gone into Hackney's, a famous seafood emporium in Atlantic City, for dinner one night. Joley took a long look at the menu and without consulting me, Eppy or Fried, he told the waitress, "Four orders of cherrystone clams." I said I didn't like cherrystone clams on the half-shell and wanted clam chowder. Al repeated—ignoring me—"Four orders of clams."

Psyched Into Silence

We began arguing back and forth until I won my point. The same thing happened with the main course. Al wanted to order Alaska King Crab for me and I wanted broiled lobster. He raised his voice. I raised mine. Customers at other tables began to look at us. It looked like Al was going to tell me to get the hell out of there, go back to New York, and never write a word about him as long as I lived, when he suddenly weakened and let me have my lobster.

The most disconcerting interview in my 10-year career was Oscar Levant. Levant took an almost small-boy pleasure in refusing to reply to my questions or telling me anything significant about himself. When I'd ask him something pointed about his early life, his family, his career difficulties, his marriages, he'd quickly reply—with a nasty twinkle in his eye—"I spent thousands of dollars with psychoanalysts to forget all about that. Go ahead. Ask me something else. I won't answer it either."

I was doing a piece on Dick Himber, the maestro and practical joker par excellence, when we had lunch in Toots Shor's. I was hardly aware of Himber absently crumbling a piece of what seemed like red tissue paper and depositing it in the ashtray. A few seconds later I crushed a cigaret out. When the burning tip touched the paper—I later learned it was something known to the fraternity of practical jokers as flash paper — the whole table seemed to be enveloped in a tremendous burst of flame that scared me out of my wits and brought two busboys, three waiters, maitre d' Joe Harrison and Toots Shor running to our table to put out the fire.

After I had written a series on Tallulah Bankhead, I and Mrs. Zolotow visited Tallulah at her pied a terre in the Elysee, strictly a social evening. When we opened the door, Taloo leaped at me, embraced me in the most passionate embrace, told my wife how much she missed me, and kissed me fondly. This surprised me nearly as much as it shocked my wife.

"So," she murmured sarcastically, "this is research, eh?"

I tried to convince her that Taloo is just an affectionate person and that kisses and endearing expressions are fairly usual among show people and do not mean anything serious. Taloo gave such a great performance that I doubt if I ever convinced her.

Latin America Shifts Made of Sales Aides

Shifts in Latin American personnel of Universal International Films, U's foreign subsidiary, have been made by Alfred E. Daff, global sales topper, and Americo Aboaf, foreign sales chief.

Cecil Marks, formerly managing director in Indonesia and more recently on special assignment in England, has been named manager in Trinidad. Robert Ferber, formerly in Trinidad, becomes rep in Venezuela. James Alexander, N.Y. rep for Central America, will assume a similar post in Uruguay with headquarters in Montevideo.

How Writers Are Born; Or From Here to Maternity

By JIM CARHARTT and NICKY WINTER

Cannes.

As far back as we can remember, scarcely a day has gone by without our receiving no requests whatsoever for our advice to other young writers. This negligence can be traced to two causes, neither of which is printable in a family newspaper. But we would be more than lax in our duty to our fellow-writers if we failed to point out to them a few of the pits they should only fall into, competition being what it is. So, here are some of the questions young writers need to have answered, together with the kind of answers that have helped us achieve a record of failure absolutely unparalleled in literary and theatrical history. The first and most important question is always:

With today's cost of living soaring, with taxes at an all-time high and mounting almost daily, with world economy in its most hopeless tangle, with even the simplest pleasures vanishing from the lives of the average citizens, do you still believe it is possible for me to earn a living as a writer?

No.

Suppose I earn money as a writer . . how will I be taxed? (b) How can I avoid paying these taxes?

(a) Writers who earn money fall into two categories, according to the Bureau of Internal Revenue. There is Ernest Hemingway, who earns a six-figure income from four-letter words. And there are all other writers who should be earning that much, so let's tax them as if they were. (b) Don't earn any money. Don't spend any money. Marry Barbara Hutton.

What about agents . are they any help to a writer? I said, what about agents . . . are they any help to a writer?

Don't rush us. We'll think of something. In our own case, at one time it took seven different agents to keep us unemployed 365 days a year. No other writing team can make that statement. But let's look the question right in the eye, which is more than the average agent does. They do serve several useful purposes. Without agents, the Bell Telephone Co. would founder, Sardi's would close its doors, and Hollywood would be given back to the Indians who would promptly start making a movie about the true life of the white man.

Does this apply to ALL agents?

To all agents over the age of 93, yes.

But won't I need a lawyer to draw up my contracts?

There are two kinds of writers' contracts . . . the unfavorable kind, and the kind you never get anyway. In an unfavorable contract, the most you can hope for is a clause stating that only under extreme circumstances are you required to pay anybody any money. Once that clause is in, your worries are over. Everything else is a matter of realizing that whatever is given to you in big print is taken away from you in small print. So, why hire a lawyer to tell you that?

How to Compete With 456,789 Tuners

I have written a musical comedy. How do I get it produced?

At last reports, there were 456,789 musical comedies making the rounds and half that many making the squares. But let's throw reason right out the window and say you've done the impossible. You've written a musical that is so great it will come within that much of being produced. It is so terrific, it will be given the highest accolade of all time; at auditions backers will refuse to put money in it by saying, "It ain't another 'Guys and Dolls,' sorry." This entitles you to commit hara-kiri at midnight at Sardi's. But even so, with failure almost within your grasp, there are some snares which the wise writer will avoid. For instance, let's take producers, which in itself is quite a switch. The minute you meet a prospective producer, don't look at his bankbook. The chances are that only Gerald Chapman had a greater feeling for double-entry bookkeeping, so what good will it do you anyway? No, when you meet the man your heart tells you will be your producer, look at his shoes. A cursory glance will tell you whether his shoestrings are strong enough to produce a show on. After that, look at his shirt. Is it tattered, worn to a nub from being constantly given off his back? Then he ain't no producer. Last of all, look at his face. Go on. Steel yourself. Look! Is it kindly, gentlemanly, the kind of face your mother hoped to find on your father? Then your show will play Vermont, Nebraska, and the upper tip of North Dakota . . . those being the only places where he isn't wanted by the law.

Now, let's look at backers. Let's say you've just finished your first audition, the Broadway term for a form of torture that, oddly enough, has escaped the Russian secret police as the ideal resistance-breaker. The composer has agreed that none of his music can compare in fineness and melodic line with "Melancholy Baby." You, as writer, have admitted that Toscanini last week was funnier than your book will ever be. Now you want to hear some favorable reactions, so you concentrate on one guy. The one who began laughing when you read, "Act One, Scene One" and didn't stop for 10 minutes after you read: " . . . and the curtain falls on the two lovers.' The one with $1.50 cigar, the $200 suit, and the tie that ine artists went blind handpainting. You want to know who he . . He's your producer's brother-in-law, and the bum is still yelling for the comeback of the nickel phone call. But see that other guy over there . . . the little mousey gent in the dark coat, the one you told to empty the ashtrays and keep the drinks going—you know who he is? He's a waiter, naturally . . . you didn't think we'd be that corny, did you?

But you still haven't told me how to get my show produced.

So change your name to Rodgers & Hammerstein.

Should I write for television, then?

The TV writer today occupies about the same position in the history hierarchy as the writer for the New York Graphic in the '20s.

Can you give me some hints about writing for TV?

First, always be your script has plenty of noise in it. Remember, every TV show has to be heard above the crunching of pretzels in saloons. Then, do not have any children in your scripts. Not only will they not be allowed in the bars, but on TV the average six-year-old girl looks like Gloria Swanson in "Sunset Boulevard." On the other hand, on TV Gloria Swanson looks like Glori Swanson, which shows that time brings all things. Finally, many people will tell you that no TV show can succeed unless it contains at least seven corpses. This is a vicious rumor started by theatre owners to get people back to the movies again. It has been clearly proved that two or three corpses disposed of in a sufficiently gruesome manner can turn more stomachs in a half an hour than twice that number that are merely shot or stabbed.

What is the future of TV as you see it?

Radio.

Then what is the future of radio?

Tallullah Bankhead, although we are quite certain that she herself would be the first to admit it.

Tribulations in Tandem

I have been asked to collaborate with another writer. Is this a good idea?

Yes. Two heads are better than one. And if you're stupid enough to collaborate with another writer, unquestionably your two heads will be better than his one. What sort of thing are you going to work on?

I thought I was supposed to be asking the questions here . . . However, we had in mind sort of a general revolt against. . . . .

Okay, okay. We get it. You want to revolt. Well, why not? For years people have been saying that writers are pretty revolting, and this is a downright lie! Writers are not pretty, whether they're revolting or doing anything else. But if you team up with another writer, better face one thing. You'll never get any work done. You'll spend all your time answering one question: "Say, how do you two work together, anyway?" Only writers get asked this question. People don't make side-trips to Vassar to ask the daisy-chain girls how they work together. Very few people have ever asked a horse how he works with his jockey, and still fewer have had occasion to ask Lee & J. J. how they work together. But you'll be asked the question so often it will come to react on you like saying "Josephine Baker" to Winchell. In fact, having people ask them this question so often may be one reason why so many writing teams are driven to the analyst's couch. (Personally, we've always had to walk there). Other woes of tandem writing get settled easily comparison. The matter of which of you gets top billing, for instance. Since writers usually come in assorted sizes, the smaller member of the team can usually be persuaded to let his name come last. Or, if you are evenly matched, a standard size, single blade fire axe always comes in handy to settle the most heated argument. Again, there may arise the question of which of you is to do the typing. (It should have been understood from the beginning that this was being addressed to the one-typewriter class of collaborators.) This question can be decided by determining which of you can spell c-a-t; or, in the case of extremely literate teams, let it be understood that whichever of you carries the typewriter to and from the hockshop, the other does the typing. In short, any question or dispute that arises between the members of a writing team can be settled, in some such intelligent manner as indicated above except what to say to people who ask how you work together.

We ourselves have tried many different answers to this question. There is The Reply Cryptic: "How do we work together? Ah, you may well ask." (This is fine, if you want people to think they've been asking Gabriel Heatter how he works together.) There is the Snide Retort: "We toss the typewriter up in the air and throw pencils at it." And there is the Rude Riposte: "Do we ask you how you embalm people?" (Excellent, if you happen to know lot of embalmers.) Also, we have tried replying with merely a smile, a sneer, a snarl, or by loudly grinding our teeth and allowing flecks of foam to appear at the corners of our mouths. (This last being the ideal way to get background material for a novel about the alcoholic ward.) But, all in all. . . .

Yes, well, I don't want to keep you gentlemen from your work any longer, so I'll just ask you one more question. What was the biggest day in your writing lives?

The day we learned how to write home for money.

Give Me a Crofts With My Somerset

By ALAN JACKSON

As everyone knows, every trade has a language of its own. Steel men and railroad men have an arcane lingo of their own; the jargon of aviators is unintelligible to the laity. The same is true of motion picture story departments, that weird and bewildered handful of individuals who try to funnel novels and plays into cinematic production.

Alan Jackson

I have noted a few of their words and expressions together with their meanings here, but, of course, the list is far from complete. Several story editors, however, have offered their help in compiling a definitive lexicon, and eventually it is proposed to offer it for publication to The Hollywood Quarterly for a microfilm-time capsule edition. Its value to future archeologists is self-evident: Thus (and not yet alphabetically):

Intellectual—A person who has read the original material as well as the synopsis.

Outside Reader—One who complains of insufficient pay.

Inside Reader—One who complains of insufficient salary.

Wonderful Show—A 180-minute Technicolor extravaganza.

Costly Bore—Someone else's 180-minute Technicolor extravaganza.

Big Prop (for "Property")—The story someone else bought. A story you cannot find.

Art Linkletter—Eric Linklater.

Price Ceiling—This is something you have unjustifiably "punctured" when you buy story another company wanted but not enough to meet or approximate the asking price. An excuse, e.g., a story editor will say, "We could have had it as well, but I was unwilling to puncture the price ceiling." This makes him sound like a good businessman though it doesn't give his company the property.

Crofts—An extra dividend, an increment, added value. From Appleton-Century-Crofts. Like "Young" in Farrar, Straus & Young.

Gethsemane—Story conference.

Somerset—A drink of gin and water, or "gin on the rocks." The name was established by an assistant story editor who felt that asking for gin and water tended to make him sound like a candidate for a Hogarth drawing. The name was given in honor of Mr. Maugham who, alone, could be expected to order such a drink with utmost aplomb and impeccable grace.

Christmas—The season we write this kind of thing for VARIETY.

FULL SCALE WAR

By JERRY D. LEWIS

(Writer, Jerry Devine' "This Is Your FBI")

Hollywood.

The late Damon Runyon once told a young sports writer that the best lead he ever wrote was "Yale beat Harvard today 7 to 6."

"Tell 'em what the story's about," he said, and so with that in mind—because I was the young sports writer—this piece for VARIETY'S anniversary issue is about my wife, her family, our new baby, and a serious problem of mine.

Let's take my wife first. Her name is Louise. Shortly before she was born, her mother suffered a bad accident. She was scared by a Mr. Fairbanks. Not Douglas Fairbanks, but Sam or Morris Fairbanks—whatever the first name was of the man who had the scale business.

Since my mother-in-law was scared, it had its effect on my wife—an effect which takes the form of a hatred for calories. Now if this old phobia had struck only Louise, it wouldn't be so bad, but it spread to her whole family. Not just to her immediate family, but to her entire family.

I don't want to sound like she has such a big family that they sometimes overwhelm a non-voting member, but—well, let me put it this way. She's got relatives i places Rand & McNally barely suspects.

In fact, if Eisenhower had all of them in uniform, Europe would be safe—from everything but her family.

The worst part is they all show plus-four revulsion at the faintest sign of a calory. At the mere sight of a dish of icecream, they positively quiver like so many struck gongs.

Their idea of a picnic is to break open a box of Ry-Krisp, a jar of Blackstrap molasses, and sing "Onward, Gayelord Hauser."

In Comes the Heavy

On the other hand, I'm naturally heavy. (I don't eat any more than the average person, if the average person is Happy Felton or Jack E. Leonard.)

This sometimes leads to subtle allusions being made by Louise. Like when she was having this new baby, she got up from the breakfast table one day and said:

"I'm going downtown for some maternity clothes today. Want me to pick any up for you?"

I laugh at things like that, because as long as they're subtle cracks I can appreciate them.

What I don't like are the little sneaky cracks some women make in a spot like that. The wife of a friend of mine, for instance. Let's be fair. He is getting a little heavy. (I'm currently on a diet, so I notice those things.) Even so, I didn't think his wife should have said when they started toward the car:

"Honey (when they say that, look out!), I'll drive if you think you'll have trouble getting behind the wheel."

Nice Weight for a Baby

Up to now, the weight business has never really posed a serious problem. However, one has reared its head, and I humbly request VARIETY readers to drop me a line and get me out.

You see, Louise had a baby boy in October. That was okay except for one thing. I had expressly told her I would drive her to the hospital if she had the baby between 9 a.m. and midnight. Otherwise, she was to call a hack. I felt this was fair, since it gave her 15 of the 24 hours. That meant she was getting 15 to nine odds on a positively even-money proposition, and all I know is if you keep beating the price that way, you got to wind up rich.

Well, sir, there I was being comfortable about 11 one night when she nudged me and asked me to drive her to the hospital. Of course, she didn't have the baby until after midnight, but she had put in the request before, I had to take her.

Little things like that can drive you crazy. You just have to learn when to put your foot down.

But she did have the baby, and now I've got the problem, which is this:

I called about two dozen people after the event, and each of them asked the same question the minute they heard the news. "How much did he weigh?"

You see—this weight business has spread to our friends, too.

In any event, I reported to each of them that the baby's poundage was six eight. Without exception they all answered: "Six eight, eh? Nice weight for a baby."

They came and looked at Richard Neal, stepped back a pace, tilted their heads and clucked: "Looks fine. I told you six eight was a fine weight for a baby."

Now my problem is that when I made that first report to them I was wrong. I don't know how it happened, or who gave me the bum steer, but it so happens the baby actually weighed six ten. Please, dear readers, let me know:

Should I call everybody agai , and straighten them out, or isn't six ten as nice a weight for a baby?

Positively no collect wires accepted.

Houdini and the Hereafter

Harry Houdini, the great escape artist, was a great trickster, an excellent showman, but abhorred phoneys. He never professed any supernatural powers for his amazing tricks.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle once invited Houdi i to Atlantic City to attend a private seance to be given by Lady Doyle. Both were great believers in and exponents of communications with the dead. Without going into all the details, Lady Doyle went into a semi-trance and wrote for one and one-half hours a "message" to Houdini from his mother, whom he loved very much, and who, incidentally, made wonderful apples pies. After she had finished and handed the message to Houdini, the latter remarked "how wonderful Heaven must be, because my mother—when she died—couldn't speak a word of English—only Hebrew." He added that Heaven wasn't 100% in other respects also. "It was just a little off," he said, "because today happens to be my birthday, and my mother always gave me a white carnation ever since I was five years old." He couldn't understand why she never mentioned his birthday in this long message.

"Goodbye, Lady Doyle. Goodbye, Sir Conan"—and that was the end of the seance.

Chas. Skouras Sees a Big Theatre TV In the Future of the Picture Business

By CHARLES P. SKOURAS
(President, National Theatres Amus. Co.)

Los Angeles.

1952 will be a year of decision for the motion picture industry.

The alertness and aggressiveness with which both exhibitors and producers prepare to meet the competition of its young and growing rival—television—will determine their business future and fate.

The situation calls for strong, drastic action. Politicians have found the public won't vote against Santa Claus and the public won't vote against television—unless movies offer better entertainment in better theatres.

In my opinion the industry to survive must undertake a four-point program.

1. Theatres must prepare for theatre television.

2. Exhibitors must rehabilitate, modernize, and refurnish their theatres to make them more attractive, comfortable, and convenient.

3. Production must concentrate, more than ever before, on showmanship entertainment, whether it be in big special production or in smaller, unusual, off-beat stories.

4. The industry must cease its warring, and present a united front in both intra-industry relations and its public relations to win new friends and lure back the old ones from television.

The keystone of our future, I believe, lies in exhibitors developing theatre television in color. It offers the same opportunity to revive our business that the advent of sound did 25 years ago. Through theatre television we can once again become showmen—providing wonderful timely entertainment of a quality no home television can equal. It may be top sporting events, opera, Broadway shows, or specially created musical productions that we will build and create in special studios. Such entertainment, presented in conjunction with a news, cartoon, and a top picture will prove a magnet that will draw the public from their home television to our boxoffices.

It will be essential that our theatres match in comfort, warmth and convenience the entertainment we are offering on our screens. That means ample parking, wider spaced seats, more luxurious seats, plus perfect sound and projection so the public will find something in a theatre they can't have on their home set.

New Types of Theatres

The answer may lie in a new type of theatre. It may mean more drive-ins. We may find new policies essential for our theatres, such as reserved seat shows, one show only at night; but whatever it is the exhibitor must be flexible and ready for change to meet the public's taste.

As the exhibitor must be alert, so must the producer keep himself abreast of public demand. Today an ordinary picture means nothing in our theatres, particularly on week nights. It takes an extraordinary picture to do business. By that I don't mean it has to be an extraordinarily costly picture. While big pictures like "David and Bathsheba," "An American In Paris," "Show Boat" and "Street Car Named Desire" are packing them in, so have relatively inexpensive showmanship pictures like "The Frogmen," "Steel Helmet" and "FBI Girl" shown boxoffice power.

That's one reason I don't think studios should concentrate only on the colossal pictures. They should make smaller pictures that may develop into hits and at the same time develop new stars and new writers. What the exhibitor needs is an even flow of pictures from the studios so that momentum and the moviegoing habit can be maintained.

It's wishful thinking for a producer to think he can make only 12 big ones and have them all big at the boxoffice. The law of averages is against him. At the same time some of his small pictures may become sleepers and help carry the studio overhead.

Above all, our business needs a moratorium on dissension, wrangling and litigation. If we could stop being lawyers and start becoming showmen, we'd all find ourselves in show business. Let's not let turmoil continue until we are faced with extinction. When our survival depends on harmony, those who are encouraging and inciting the constant agitation must cease or perish.

Arbitration would help bring order out of the present chaos. But it must be an effective system of arbitration—not one dominated by the distributor.

Such a program should be shaped up in 1952. It may not become finalized for several years, but we must start. Television has seemingly made inroads in our business. In the California area, where television flourishes, our business is off about 15%, while in Colorado, where television does not exist, our theatres are ahead of last year.

In certain defense areas the theatre business is booming. It's possible the defense program will finally reach all parts of the country so that we'll have a temporary plenty of spending money and an upsurge in theatre attendance. I look for it.

But we shouldn't be fooled by such a respite. Television in the years to come will send its tentacles into the time of every citizen of the country. We who have developed the film industry to the important position it now holds in the entertainment habits of the country must compete against it with every resource at our command.

We have the opportunity. If we don't take advantage of it, I think 50% of the theatres of the country will close; and if the other 50% don't move fast, a large part of them may also disappear.

Voice From the Stix

By JEFF JEFFERIS

Piedmont, Mo.

I believe that the industry could do much better with fewer pictures, but it does not seem reasonable to assume that the industry is capable of turning out only the super-colossals. There is many a production that has been slated under the super-colossal category, which just did not jell for some reason or other. Artistically, some are fine, but the boxoffice is another story.

If extended runs are Hollywood's thinking for the future, then the smaller companies such as Monogram, Republic and Columbia are going to have a field day. The smaller situations are not too happy about waiting until extended runs are all finished at advanced prices, and even then not getting the picture until a year later. After all, many have found that the bread-and-butter pictures are not the super-colossals, but the product from the smaller companies.

Theatres of the future will cater more and more to the comfort of the patrons. Interior lighting will be greatly improved, and the decorations subdued and restful, instead of glamorous as in the past. I would not be surprised to see many of the city theatres following the plan of the smaller towns in presenting a show and a half each night, starting at 7:30 or 8 p.m. instead of operating continuously as they do at present.

Regarding intra-trade "unity" as a possibility, at the risk of appearing to be a skeptic, I am afraid that is wishful thinking. But I am willing to go along with any idea that will further same. I am certainly not in favor of litigation. I believe that arbitration, as discussed by Allied, is entirely possible and workable.

The writer can speak only for the boxoffice possibilities in the smaller towns, as that is his field. Frankly, I am not too worried about the grosses for the coming year, and we are planning large remodeling and improvements of our theatre.

I am heartily in favor of the complete organization of COMPO. "Movietime U.S.A." has had many errors, mistakes and disappointments, but the idea is basically sound, and I would like to see it really tried out. The problems that now seem so big will be only memories in a short time.

Favors Return to That Publix Theatre 'Service'

By JOHN J. FITZGIBBONS
(Pres., Famous Players-Canadian Corp.)

Toronto.

The circus ringmaster has always intrigued me because he never stops selling his show. Even after the patrons have bought their tickets and have entered the big top the ringmaster still sells his show! Every act is given the same buildup it was given by the advance man's publicity. I feel that we, of the motion picture exhibition field, have, unlike the circus ringmaster, neglected to sell our shows after the patrons have bought their tickets.

John J. Fitzgibbons

The modern motion picture theatre has service to sell. Patrons should be made to feel at home in an atmosphere where everything is done for his comfort and convenience.

The major airline companies have been quick to realize the importance of service to the public. Their advertising has been intriguing and the service of their personnel has lived up to their advertising. We could study, with profit, the methods of these companies.

For many years I was a part of the Publix organization. Publix laid strong emphasis upon service to the patrons of their theatres. Eventually it became fashionable to ridicule the type of service the management of our theatres in those days insisted upon. Perhaps at one stage Publix and its imitators reached a point where they over-emphasized service but I believe that the public really appreciated the type of attention our employees were trained to give them.

Gradually the Publix type of service disappeared from motion picture theatres. The war years finally killed off any attempts to give the public the attention to which I believe it was entitled. Theatres were unable to attract the right type of personnel and service didn't seem to matter much in the war years.

Now, I think, it is time to again thumb through the old service manuals and bring some of the service features up to date for our theatres.

We, in Famous Players, have just concluded a series of meetings across Canada and we have tried to impress upon our managers the importance of concentrating upon the development of manpower in our theatres.

Every patron who enters our theatres is entitled to be treated like a king. When he buys a ticket and crosses our threshold he should enter into a world that is luxurious and safe and where everything humanly possible is done to ensure his comfort and relaxation.

No Sourpusses Tolerated

One sourpuss in the boxoffice, one unpleasant doorman, or one inattentive usher can go a long way toward destroying that happy anticipation of our program our advertising has created.

Foremost, of course, is the type of attractions we are offering in our theatres. Hollywood is giving us those attractions and they seem to be getting better as the months go by. We are spending many hundred of thousands of dollars improving our theatre properties for the complete comfort of our patrons, but the attitude of the employees in our theatres is still among the most important factors in the success of our theatre operation.

On our circuit we have initiated a suggestion box idea in which we offer monthly cash rewards to employees of our theatres who offer the best suggestions for the improvement of our service to the public. Many valuable ideas have poured in—often from the most unexpected sources.

Incentives

Another plan to stimulate the interest of our employees in their jobs and our theatres is the "Staff Week" program. Under thi plan the employees appoint their fellow-employees to various jobs. A projectionist or a doorman may be manager for the week, a candy girl chief usher, a porter assistant manager and so on. We have set up fair quotas and all earnings over the quotas are to be shared by the employees. In each situation the manager is supposed to act in an advisory capacity but in a number of theatres where "Staff Week" has been tried out the manager has volunteered to act as doorman or in some other active capacity.

We have been amazed at the results in the situations where we have experimented with "Staff Weeks." The staff has gone out and secured cooperative advertising, newspaper editors have been intrigued by the idea and have given the staff stories and pictorial layouts and many fine and workable ideas for the improvement of our service have been introduced. We have seen to it that our employees have been given top pictures to sell and their advertising and exploitation ideas have been a revelation.

Everyone likes to see his picture in the local newspaper. In situations where we have tested the "Staff Week" idea the staff members who have been elected to key positions have been photographed and stories about their new assignments have been written. The publication of such pictures and stories has not only helped th theatres but has given our employees a new sense of importance.

Attractive theatres and topflight pictures are our most important consideration, but we feel that we are on the right track in encouraging our service staffs to take an interest in our patrons. Our intensive merchandising efforts which bring patrons to our theatres are, to a large extent, dissipated if our service staffs fail to give the public the type of service to which they are entitled.

'Let's Get Inside-Industry Rows Away From The Courthouse'

Allied's Board Topper Endorses Action by All in Formulating System of Arbitrating Exhib-Distrib Conflicts on Rentals, Trade Practices; Sees Absence of 'Dynamic Leadership' as Possessed by Late S. R. Kent

By ABRAM F. MYERS

Washington.

Two tax campaigns conducted on a national basis showed convincingly that the great majority of industry members are men of good will, ready and willing to serve the common cause. But a far more convincing demonstration of this was the manner in which the industry rallied around Bob O'Donnell in his gallant leadership of the "Movietime" campaign.

Abram F. Myers

With these gratifying experiences behind us, it seems to me the time has come to project our experiments into the field of trade practices where conflicts of interest do exist. These very conflicts, and tensions created thereby, are such that it would be impracticable and probably unlawful to attempt to eliminate them by "unity."

As a necessary first step we must devise a method whereby distributors and exhibitors, through their duly chosen representatives, can discuss and legally adjust their differences. The Supreme Court, it seems to me, has left the road open to accomplish this in a perfectly lawful manner. In the course of his opinion Justice Douglas, speaking of arbitration, pointed out that "the District Court has the power to authorize the maintenance of such a system by those parties who consent and to provide the rules and procedure under which it is to operate." An arbitration system worked out between the distributors and exhibitors, agreed to by the Department of Justice and submitted to and approved by the Court as an amendment to the decree in the Paramount Case, would be legally unassailable.

It should be noted that the Supreme Court placed no limitation on the scope of the arbitration which the District Court, with the consent of the parties, might incorporate in the decree. The desirability of such a system, from the standpoint of the Court, is that it would tend to relieve the Court of the many applications for the interpretation, enforcement and amendment of the decree which otherwise are certain to be made.

In the light of the foregoing, the comprehensive arbitration system approved by the exhibitors in attendance at Allied's 1951 National Convention is entirely consistent with the Court's own proposal and, at most, only a reasonable extension thereof.

Categories of Disputes

Let us consider the disputes which the convention resolution lists as appropriate for arbitration. First comes disputes over "clearance and prints." Surely, no one at this late date will question the propriety of arbitrating clearance disputes. Clearance arbitrations were the only satisfactory proceedings under the consent decree system. I participated in some of those cases and speak from experience. Coupling clearance and prints is entirely logical in view of changes in distribution methods. Prints now are made available to or are withheld from theatres without regard to former practices or contract rights.

The next item is "competitive bidding," and for purposes of the present discussion I will couple it with "runs," although the latter is listed as a separate item. The distributors' only proffered excuse for persisting in competitive bidding after the Supreme Court discredited it as a practice and struck it from the decree is that it is the only method whereby pictures can be sold in competitive situations without risking lawsuits.

Conflicts over run, real or imaginary, provide the claimed justification for bidding. Once it is determined which theatre is entitled to the run, the need for bidding disappears. There was a provision in the consent decree for arbitrating runs, but it was so circumscribed by restrictions and limitations as to be useless. Nevertheless, the consent decree affords a precedent for arbitrating runs. Herein lies our last best hope for ridding the business of its most detested practice.

Assuming that an acceptable plan for arbitrating runs can be devised, an exhibitor staggering under competitive bidding, if so minded, could institute an arbitration seeking pictures on the desired run. Other affected exhibitors could intervene in the case for the protection of their interests. The arbitrators could determine which of the contending exhibitors was entitled to the run, or they might conclude that in fairness the product should be divided among them on an equitable basis. In either event all parties, distributors and exhibitors alike, would be relieved of their joint headache and the distributors would be able to proceed, relieved of the overhanging dread of another lawsuit.

That Ole Debbil—'Rentals'

The third and most controversial item is "film rentals."

The No. 1 problem of most exhibitors today is to buy films at prices which will enable them to meet their overhead and operating expenses and yield a reasonable profit. By far the greater part of the tension and dissension within the industry is attributable to the belief among exhibitors that during the current boxoffice recession the film companies have sought to maintain their own profits by ruthlessly raising film rentals.

As a test of the good faith of the evangels of "unity," Allied poses this question: When an exhibitor and a distributor reach a stalemate in their dealings with each other what is wrong about submitting the problem to the determination of men with fresh, unbiased minds and a background of industry experience?

'Forcing'

The next two items, "forcing of pictures" and "illegal setting of admission prices," relate to acts which, if committed, would constitute violations of the decree. So far as these practices are concerned, the arbitration system, in the language of the Supreme Court, would be "an auxiliary enforcement procedure." When invoked by an exhibitor it would, we hope, lead to a speedy determination of his rights. Lacking such arbitration he would have, first, to persuade the Department of Justice that the contempt was of such a nature to warrant reporting it to the Court; and, second, the Department would have to convince the Court that punishment was in order. The arbitration procedure would afford the distributor practical insurance against a citation for contempt.

President Rembusch has appointed an able committee to put these proposals in proper form for submission to the film companies. Indignation has been expressed in some quarters that Allied is doing this preliminary work by itself and not in collaboration with other industry elements. Allied is following this course because it feels that the work can be done best by a small group of men who have been working in close harmony for many years and understand and trust each other. When they have completed their work and submitted it to the distributors, and the preliminary conferences indicate that the distributors' minds are open to the proposals, then it will be time enough to plan for wider participation in the discussions.

Allied is not so vain as to suppose that a part or even a majority of the exhibitors could impose their will in a matter of such magnitude and importance on others. At some stage everyone will have the opportunity to advance their own proposals and urge their adoption.

It is a great pity that the distributors have not developed a dynamic leadership to carry on in the tradition of the late Sidney R. Kent. How he would have grasped the present golden opportunity to lead them out of the wilderness! But as we all know, the opportunity often makes the man. Certainly there is ample experience and ability in their ranks to supply such leadership if only the right man can be induced to step forward.

In any case 1952 promises to be a great year in the annals of the industry. Whether the industry emerges triumphant from difficulties, or bogs down deeper, will depend upon the faith, the wisdom, the good will and the exertions of its members, from top to bottom, during the next 12 months.

Today's 10 Commandments

By A. J. BALABAN

Invitation by the editor to "write a piece" for the "Bible of Show Business" inspires amusing thoughts of the quandary probably faced by those ancient sages contemplating a contributory "piece" to those more widely known Bibles, the Old and New Testaments, the Koran or Books of Confucius.

Moses reported back to his printers with approximately less than 500 words, which, as the 10 Commandments, have endured as competent advice and guideposts to human progress. VARIETY wants (probably with 'yoks' and 'boffs') some 1,500 words. This vividly indicates the extent of present-day inflation as against 5,000 years ago.

With confronting floods of theatres of World War III, inflation, high taxes, corruption and human apathy, any enterprising Oracle might well advise clients to speed forthwith to their nearest architect. A good new set of plans for another Ark, complete with popcorn and TV, might not be a bad hedge for timid folks, if building materials and labor costs are still surmountable.

Whether or not there is rising flood-water in the stockmarket, or cyclonic inflation blowing against the profit-and-loss sheets, or skyrocketing taxes, our experience and history teaches that it has ever been thus. There has always been some Hell to pay, and probably always will be.

We'll get used to using bigger numerals, that's all. Sixty miles an hour in 1911 has become 600 stratosphere miles in 1951. But still only from Here to There. There's no need to run, even if there were a place to hide.

Smart young folks, spurred by ambition, aided by new techniques and modes, will keep this earth from becoming too dull. The temptation to advise, to pontificate, or do a bit of off-hand curbstone Oracle-ing, is always stronger as the bald-spot spreads. So, with no intention of entering into competition with Moses and The 10 Commandments, or attempting to improve upon them, in view of what are the facts of recent battlefield horrors and immediate-future atomic possibilities, nevertheless I yield and reply, as when asked recently for a present-day success formula for boxoffices. Anyone can make up their own list, but I like these:

1. Don't permit audience boredom.
2. We're, amusement industry. So, amuse! Keep it clean! Inspiring! Swift! Colorful! Imaginative! Human!
3. Give more than the money's worth.
4. Treat customers like royalty.
5. It pays to advertise truthfully and smartly.
6. Keep your accountant and lawyer at hand.
7. Be sure real talent holds every job.
8. Enthusiasm is amusement's lifeblood.
9. Enjoyment, not sorrow, is our merchandise.
10. Accentuate the positive.

Encouragement of writers and "idea" men and women, creating entertainment encompassing the foregoing is vitally needed, now, more than ever before. We must never forget "the play is the thing," which means that someone must first get it all down on manuscript before actors, directors, musicians, labor, management or investors may banquet. We've ignored and starved creative minds, or permitted them to go too far afield on strange, unwanted missions. Our mission is to bring happiness to the people. The people will do the rest. We need more basic talents. Let us find, encourage and develop talented, creative newcomers in all related fields of our industry. It is a lack of these that is a more dangerous threat than anything else that can happen.

What Does The Public Want!

Basic Ingredients Ofttimes Don't Add Up to a Boxoffice Payoff

By WILLIAM GOETZ

(Production V.P., Universal-International)

Of all the problems that plague a producer, the most nagging is one involving the public. Unlike others, this one is always with us—a spectre that haunts us in lush times or lean, at story conferences, budget meetings, informal discussions and during the long reaches of the night when insomnia takes hold.

Ill Goetz

The problem, though posed in many forms, is most often put as a brief and fervid question. "What does the public want?" For best effect, read it with the emphasis in the second word but expressed laconically or forcefully it is almost guaranteed to provoke positive and instantaneous frenzy at any gathering of film makers.

A quick fortune awaits anyone who can come up with any kind of an answer to this one. A lot of people have tried, professionals and amateurs alike. Professional pollsters have taken a fling at it, and so have plain and fancy researchers by the hundreds. Analysts, soothsayers, public relations experts and even producers' wives who claim to read tea leaves, have toyed with it to no avail. They have cost Hollywood enough to finance any number of epics but the Sphinx is still silent.

Oddly enough, we know the basic ingredients that the public wants in its movies. Everyone is in on this act, including our critics and our friends. Once you get your picture finished and show it, everyone is ready to tell you what's good about it and what's bad. The professional critics may love it but it may still register in the "error" column with the public. Or it may be damned and denounced by those who are supposed to know up from down in regard to pictures but the public may latch on to it like a kid to a toy train.

On some things, everyone agrees. Entertainment is one. It's a loose term and loosely used but we know that unless a film entertains, it's going nowhere at all. Under the general heading of entertainment are a good many other of the ingredients that supposedly guarantee public acceptance. There is pace and direction, story and characterization, artistic and production values, star power and a myriad of other things besides. These are all taken for granted.

From there we move into the field of plus values and every producer is forever searching for them. On our own lot, for instance, we have just completed "Red Ball Express." We believe there is a plus factor here because this movie deals with a phase of the war in Europe hitherto untouched by films. Directly and indirectly, hundreds of thousands of our boys were engaged in getting supplies up front and for them this picture should have special appeal.

The same is true of "Bronco Buster," which deals with rodeos. To our surprise, we discovered when the subject came up, that rodeos today rank as one of the largest spectator sports in the nation. That should be reflected at the boxoffice as should the fact that "Steel Town" is the first full-length Technicolor film to give the public a closeup of a great steel mill in operation. There are, we also discovered, more than a million people directly engaged in steel production.

It's in blending these known ingredients, however, that something happens. All the things that have gone into the finished product have been carefully weighed, considered and evaluated. Individually, the elements are there but the picture as a whole creates no more than a ripple as far as the public is concerned.

It happens too often for comfort. Just when you convince yourself that the time is not propitious for a war picture someone makes a war picture, the public jams the boxoffice and the picture makes Fort Knox tremble in fear of sharing its quarters with new tenants.

And then there is the matter of geography. Why should a movie prove a thundering success in Boston and flop dismally in Philadelphia? Why should New York blow its top over some picture and Dallas give it the back of its hand? Swashbuckling adventure stories seem to be coming back into favor but what changed the public's mind? You couldn't give them away not so long ago.

I suspect that this particular enigma will never be solved. Maybe it's better this way. Otherwise, everyone would be producing pictures and the competition would be even tougher than it is now.

Cheers for Movietime, Exit of 'Shot-Gun' Operations, 'Nervous' A's—O'Donnell

By ROBERT J. O'DONNELL
(Executive V. P., Interstate Theatres)

Dallas.

In reference to COMPO and and Movietime USA you can easily excuse me as being biased, as I feel that its importance to all branches of the industry is one of the outstanding obligations of all branches. As the National Campaign Director for Movietime USA, I am delighted with what was accomplished.

Bob O'Donnell

Sure Movietime had "bugs" but only recently I received the most glowing telegram from L. C. Montgomery, chairman of the Movietime in Dixie tour which ended Dec. 8, and was one of those which was organized to take up the slack occasioned by our failure to get enough people on the original tour. There were 17 personalities involved in the Dixie tour, covering Louisiana and Mississippi, and from every indication, the very lack of pressure leads me to believe that staggered tours are the answer to one of our greatest problems, instead of trying to do it all in one week nationwide.

Certainly the Movietime in Dixie tour got into the grassroots and I have since had an opportunity to talk to Robert Fellows, a former Paramount producer, and to get his reaction is really most exciting.

We are very optimistic in Texas as to the boxoffice prospects in 1952. As you know, our 1951 grosses have been comparable with 1950, although our attendance is about 3% off.

Texas, from a commercial standpoint, is in excellent position and is enjoying a great deal of the same war activities in towns like San Antonio which we saw during the second World War.

Arbitration

I personally believe that arbitration versus litigation is the most important single item confronting exhibition. If a solution can be found to the constant threat of law suits with arbitration, there is no one thing that would go so far to release the chaos that exists in our industry today. I am giving you this opinion, despite the fact that there is only one law suit in existence here in Texas; it was filed in 1947 and has not come to trial yet. So this opinion is not one from a territory that is harassed with a multitude of law suits, but I do believe that arbitration can be the salvation of exhibition.

My recent tour of 32 exchange cities leads me to go on record that unity is a real possibility. We must find a solution to eliminate the individual personal conflicts, and I absolutely believe that no one in our industry really believes that divested interests have have any God-given rights that would militate against unity.

We here in Texas do believe that the orthodox or closed theatres of the future should necessarily differ physically from the present. We do believe that we must be alert to the possibility of large screen television but, again, it will be next September before the coaxial cable enters our territory.

We have recently given considerable thought to the type of operation we are running and, frankly, have found no solution that would materially change it. The most drastic change we made was in late 1950 wherein all of our "A" theatres increased matinee prices to night prices and, generally speaking, we have one price all over theatres from opening at noon to closing at midnight. This has been accepted beautifully but, of course, you must take into consideration that our top price is 60c, including tax.

I am of the opinion that the fly-by-night, carelessly operated drive-in theatre has no future, other than its nuisance value.

But we do believe that the fine and beautifully operated drivein, such as our new Oleander in Galveston, which cost almost $400,000 and is beautifully landscaped, will have a very important place in the future of motion picture operation.

Must point out that we are a single-feature territory, and with that policy we are not plagued with the number of shows problem, or the starting-time problem, as we do schedule our feature attractions so that they are shown at convenient hours to our patrons. This must be a heck of a problem in double-feature territory.

TV's Exciting Potentials

Future of exhibition versus television is an exciting one. We have proven here in Texas that television, up to the time we could afford to buy television time, was a splendid theatre stimulant. We realize that television is a tremendous competitor and early last spring, all over Texas, independent theatres, and ourselves, really started Movietime In Texas with the thought of putting our theatres physically beyond criticism in order to successfully be able to combat the competition of television. We have recommended either the elimination of screen advertising or a maximum of one ad, and none in the top A theatres. We came to this decision after witnessing the very obnoxious repetitious advertising on the television shows.

We pioneered in TV advertising but when the cost got up to $70 per minute it priced us out of that sort of ballyhoo.

Unquestionably, whether television is the cause or not, our patrons are becoming more critical in their choice, and we do believe it means the elimination of fringe theatres, particularly the shotgun, converted store-type which primarily exhibited westerns and action pictures.

But it is my personal opinion that the deluge of fine outstanding super-colossals in westerns which all studios have been producing have made, by comparison, the former shotgun type of modest budget western unattractive. Also, the great promise of these types of attractions on television today makes them unattractive in the fringe type of theatre. So, I must agree there will be an elimination of a great many rather unattractive theatres, but do not believe there will be a lessening of the finer type of theatres.

The one disturbing thought that has been advanced, and again referring to the fact that we are a single-feature territory, we do not feel the impact of a dwarfed production schedule in the same relative manner as the double-feature territories. But no matter how hard they try, some of the finest budgeted pictures produced with great thought and care, still find their way into the lowest "nervous" A or B+ brackets. We, frankly, need all of the A pictures which are being made and can stand plenty more. It is the secondary pictures which are the exhibitors' headaches, as well as the producers', but we must keep operating 52 weeks a year, and I agree that it is wishful thinking that Hollywood could produce only super-colossals.

Death of Max Kravetz Seen Delaying $600,000 Suit Vs. UA Principals

Hollywood.

Death of Max M. Kravetz here last week likely will result in some delay in the $600,000 breach-of contract suit which he had brought against various of the principals of United Artists. Kravetz, who was 58, and in ill health for some time, died in Hollywood last Tuesday (25).

Immediate indication is that the action will be pursued by his estate, through Kravetz' N. Y. attorneys. He had claimed to have an option to purchase the UA stock held by Mary Pickford and Charles Chaplin, but this became of no value when the two co-owners entered their management and stock deal with Arthur B. Krim and his associates. Depositions by some of the defendants already have been taken in N. Y.

Kravetz was the key figure in setting up the deal by which Paul V. McNutt took over UA management last year. When McNutt and Frank McNamee, who was installed as president, bowed out they relinquished stock option rights. Kravetz, who became UA's corporate secretary, thereupon claimed that he was entitled to the options in that he was a partner with McNutt and McNamee.

Kravetz previously had been real estate manager for Fox-West Coast Theatres and operated houses in Wyoming.

Scallion 'Oscars' for Industry Knockers

By ARTHUR L. MAYER
(Executive V. P., COMPO)

In this era of awards of prizes, when kudos is bestowed lavishly in all fields of endeavor, it seems odd that no prize is offered for outstanding achievements in what is easily the fiercest and most widespread of competitions. I refer, of course, to the rivalry that exists among motion picture people to see who can inflict the most damage on their own business by means of public statements or interviews.

Arthur L. Mayer

I strongly urge that the Motion Picture Academy take steps to correct this situation. Certainly this industry should give some recognition to those who cry it down, for their public lamentations are attaining the stature of artistry.

No doubt everybody will have his favorite candidates. Let me, however, mention three nominees, whose claims I do not think should be overlooked. The first is an eminently successful writer-producer who recently was quoted by his home town paper as prophesying that 75% of the movie theatres will be closed within five years. Since he probably knows no more about movie theatres than I do about writing and producing pictures, it is obvious that in making this statement he reached heights of recklessness and irresponsibility that few have attained.

My second nominee is another producer—even more eminent—who accompanied his departure from one of Hollywood's leading studios with the intimation that the pictures Hollywood is now producing are unworthy of the American public.

To avoid accusation of partiality, at least one award should be presented to some of the exhibitors, who in a laudable effort to reduce film rentals, have yelled so loudly and frequently about how bad pictures are that their patrons have heard and believed them.

Between these various lads, of course, it's a tossup; one forecasts the industry's early doom, the others do their best to make the first one's prophecy come true. But all are in there pitching, make no mistake. The least they should get is an E for effort.

There are, of course, many people in the business who decry this sort of thing, maintaining that if one must rush into print he might direct his remarks in a more constructive and helpful direction. True, these are only those unprogressive fuddy-duddies who cling to the oldfashioned notion about the folly of fouling one's nest. But there's a lot to be said for their point of view.

What's more, I'm going to say it.

Still 60,000,000 Fans a Week

Firstly, 60,000,000 Americans are still going to the movies every week. Since these people pay cash to get into picture theatres, the pictures they see must be giving them some satisfaction. Reasons for that satisfaction are not hard to discover. Not only have there been pictures appealing to the man in the street and the woman in the home like the Ma and Pa Kettle series and "At War With the Army," but for those of a little higher hairline there have been "A Place in the Sun," "Streetcar Named Desire" and others of high standards.

Moreover, these 60,000,000 people are going to more theatres than ever before existed in this country—more than 23,000 at the last count. Some of these are driveins, that new type of theatre which has been established for those who are hungry for entertainment but cannot endure the discomforts of downtown parking or the search for baby-sitters. But all of them are maintained by men who have grown up in this business and, presumably, know what they are doing.

Just making itself visible over the horizon is a new development that will add new lustre to the movie theatre. This, of course, is theatre-television. Now, for a few theatres, it brings prizefights and other sports events. In the not too distant future, however, it will be drawing crowds to every movie theatre with large-screen TV pickups of such current attractions as "The King and I," while they are still playing on Broadway, the Metropolitan Opera, the New York Philharmonic, big news stories while they are happening, a vast variety of attractions which neither standard motion pictures nor home television can supply. Then watch our business expand.

COMPO's Good Job

And, of course, there is COMPO, if you will pardon the plug. Here is something anybody in the business can shout about, and the more they shout the better off the industry will be. For in COMPO this strife-torn business has at last achieved a formula for unity more far-reaching than any accomplished by any other industry. What other industry in the world can boast that it has combined in one organization every branch of its activity, from producer to retailer to labor unionist? The Council of Motion Picture Organizations has done that, and the fruits of this experiment are already manifest.

Under the sponsorship of COMPO—and it has been in existence only a year—the industry has held its first Round Table at which exhibitors and producers could confront one another and discuss their mutual problems. Under the sponsorship of COMPO there has been inaugurated the Movietime U.S.A. celebration of the movie theatre's golden anniversary, celebration that not only has resulted in a swift improvement of newspapers' attitude toward our business, but also took actors, writers, directors and producers into the grassroots of America, to the immeasurable benefit both of the grassroots and themselves.

Maybe, on further thought, we should not give an Oscar to the crepe hangers, but rather to the industry's boosters — men like Ronald Reagan and George Murphy of Hollywood, Ned Depinet of New York, Bob O'Donnell of Texas, Spyros Skouras of here, there and everywhere. These men do not think their position of eminence in this industry entitles them to disparage it. On the contrary, they persistently emphasize its triumphs of the past and its capacity to meet its problems of the future.

SEASON'S GREETINGS TO ALL MY FRIENDS

There Are No 'Seasons' for Good Pix; Theatres Like Dept. Stores Must Do Business 365 Days a Year

By EDWARD L. HYMAN
(V. P., United Paramount Theatres)

As we write this, the signs of the new spirit of enthusiasm in our industry have become very clear. This new spirit was made very evident by the zeal with which the Movietime USA program was carried out. It was generally agreed that it produced fine results. This was as it should be. However, we do not intend, in this offering, to discuss Movietime USA.

. Hyman

We have spent a great deal of time in these last few years formulating plans to revive the industry and the public interest, and in doing so, we have concentrated mainly upon the need for showmanship. Showmanship is very necessary and I cannot stress too much its importance. However, based on our experience, there is one fundamental fact which emerges. The attraction "at the end of the hall" is our basic stock in trade. Unless we are given the proper product to sell there are very definite limitations on the lengths to which the ingenuity and special techniques of our showmanship will carry us. We must not lose sight of the fact that the primary necessity is a good, steady, continuous supply of product. Sure, we all have, on occasion, taken so-called "sleeper" attractions and by dint of showmanship alone have made such pictures successful at the boxoffice. However, we also know that we cannot continue to hold the public interest with showmanship, unless we combine showmanship with a continuous flow of good product.

During the last several years, the old practice of aiming best pictures for the major holidays in each year has been accented. Thus we have found that Thanksgiving, Christmas, New Year's, Easter and Labor Day are primarily singled out and pointed to for the best product. Now, we would have no quarrel with this practice if the pre-and post-holiday periods were supplied with good product, but such is not the case. Pre- and post-holiday periods and the May-June period have been singled out as times when nothing of any consequence should be released. During these periods we suffer from a serious deficiency in product, both in quality and quantity. The result is that we make feverish efforts to obtain pictures and during those periods our fever rises when we examine the boxoffice reports. The last May and June period brings this problem into very clear focus.

Spreading the Wealth

As we all know, both these months in 1951 were particularly deficient in product and proved to be a very trying period indeed. Lo and behold, comes July and the quality and quantity of pictures began to improve and increased so that over Labor Day it was impossible in many situations to play all of the fine pictures available. If some of these surplus pictures had been released during the May-June period, how different the results would have been. Furthermore, with competition from television slackening because of the summer departure of the better programs what better opportunity could there be to "strike while the iron is hot" and attract the public to our theatres with better pictures.

We are in a 52 weeks a year business. I cannot emphasize this too strongly. Our theatres remain open each day of the year and we have responsibilities to the public through every season. It is a terrible mistake to cut down on the flow of good product and bunch our best releases at certain peaks, especially now when we face constant and alert competition. If we cannot keep the motion picture habit instilled in our patrons, we are in a fair way to lose the battle, and we must face the fact that once the motion picture habit is interrupted by a series of poor pictures at anytime during the year, it takes several weeks to recapture the lost patronage and, in some cases, no recapture is effected.

Dept. Store Technique

We certainly do not want to shift our merchandising methods from a motion picture habit to a spot-attraction basis whereby patrons will come to our theatres only during widely separated intervals of the year. We are in a merchandising business which is similar in many ways to the practices employed by leading department stores. During holiday periods all of us do fine. When the holiday is over, our motion picture theatres have been in the habit of sitting back and taking a beating until business revives again in the next holiday season. The department stores operate on the principle that it is during these pre- and post-holiday periods that extra stimulus is needed to attract patronage. It is during these periods that they increase their advertising and showmanship activities and also through such devices as special sales, give the public a little more than it usually gets at a time when the public is less anxious to buy. By these intelligent practices, department stores have managed to sustain an even flow of business.

This is a lesson that we exhibitors should take to heart. We say that if there are periods during the year when patrons are less anxious to come to our theatres, then those are the periods when we should concentrate on attracting those patrons by making available pictures of merit. By presenting inferior pictures at such a time, we accelerate a tendency which in the long run will be damaging to our industry.

This is nothing which has not been said before many times; furthermore we all agree but just saying these things and agreeing with them is not enough. Something concrete must be done to change this condition. We know how difficult this is; we know that producers and distributors are in business, too, and there is some justification for their attitude that business generally is not too good during the weeks in question; and we know how hard it is to convince producers and distributors to change this attitude. However, the problem is before us and we cannot wink it away.

In the long run, the showmanship displayed in programs like "Movietime U.S.A." will avail us nothing if, during certain periods of the year, it brings the public into our theatres and sends them away in displeasure at the inferior pictures they see. Can we estimate the harm done when innumerable people, during these periods of the year emerge from the theatres scoffing at a slogan such as "Movies Are Better Than Ever?" We must, therefore, all of us, at every level, put forth our every possible effort to correct this condition.

Reinvestment In One's Biz

Some thoughts have occured to us which may offer a partial solution. We feel that in order to convince producers and distributors of the great harm that will result in the long run from the lack of product during the periods of question, the exhibitors should make concessions. The best consession we can think of is an assurance to a distributor that he will be paid a reasonable film rental. Exhibitors should offer to underwrite film rentals for good pictures during these weak periods by giving minimum guarantees until it is shown to the distributors that a continuous supply of good product is good business. In this way, the distributors would not be alone in assuming the total risk of loss and we should be able to make headway. Furthermore, I am sure the result would be gratifying to both the distributors and the exhibitors. Even if the end result for the exhibitor is as bad financially, he still benefits by the ract that the public will be seeing good pictures constantly and will not be given the opportunity to lose the motion picture habit.

The distributor could also be offered additional revenue in another way. The playing time of a good picture offered for release during a holiday period can be extended by opening it the week before the holiday and playing it throughout the holiday period. In this way, the dollar return to the distributor would be higher than if the picture were given a conventional holiday run. From the experience gained on the few occasions we have tried this, we have found it to be mutually satisfactory.

We hope that this effort to impress everyone in our industry with the extreme importance in finding the solution to this problem will bear fruit. As far as we are concerned, if we were asked to select for attention, one problem of the many that confront the industry, we would select this one. We have been working toward a solution for some time and are happy to say that the sales manager of one of the major distributing companies has indicated to us his willingness to go along.

We also intend to circulate this article among all of the leading figures in the industry and we are hoping that some relief will be obtained in time to alleviate the serious product lull now indicated for the Lenten season which begins on Ash Wednesday, Feb. 27 and ends on Easter Sunday, April 13. We will be only too glad to make ourselves available for any discussion or consideration of any program pointed to a solution. However, we must again urge that we cannot do enough and must repeat that it is not enough to merely agree. Something concrete must be done.

Agin' Stylized Pix Advertising

By ROBERT B. WILBY

Atlanta.

Wonder if the type of advertising which the motion picture industry is doing would not stand just a little appraisal as to:

1. Copy.
2. Timing.

As to the first, it would seem that we still use as a base the great dignity of Messrs. Charles Frohman and Belasco in the considerable dependence upon star, cast and title. To that we have added an occasional flamboyant "catch line" and considerable illustration. The net result of it is that we are printing posters in newspapers and magazines.

One would not decry the effectiveness of posters, but the place for a poster, of course, is not in a newspaper or magazine. Presumably there you have a reasonable amount of the reader's interest, and presumably a picture which has cost a million or more bucks could well have more said about it than a blatant catchline and an illustration or two. Of course Coca Cola, Camel and the rest of thei , who have been selling one thing for decades, do not now need to say very much about their product.

But one will observe that when the automobile people bring out a new model there is a very considerable amount said about it; what it is, what it looks like, what it will do. Each picture is a new model. If there be some reason for having produced the picture, there must be some reason to believe that its subject matter, its type of production, and its other elements will interest people. But they aren't going to be very much interested if they aren't told anything about it. And when you confine that newspaper ad just to no more than a poster, you are paying pretty good posting rates, and saying very little.

To put it very briefly, if the picture is worth making, it's worth telling about—interestingly and believably, and reasonably fully.

There has developed a sort of mania, especially with the week-stand houses, of concentrating their advertising before the opening. The net result, of course, is that the theatre is advertising strongly that which it does not have and passing over with a little directory ad that which it does have. Always, it seems, the "big show" is coming; what can be seen now is not worthwhile. From at least one viewpoint, the fallacy of that is too obvious to need an argument.

Theatres' Future Embraces So Many Important Advances in Electronics That It Concerns Every Operation

By HARRY B. FRENCH
(President, Minnesota Amus. Co.)

Minneapolis.

The reason that exhibitors are so very much concerned as to what the future holds for them is simply because the pattern they have followed for years is different today. Ours is an ever-changing business—and a rapidly changing one—and in my opinion we are going to see many changes in the next two years that will be somewhat revolutionary.

I think future theatres will be physically different to meet spectacular innovations, such as third dimension and television. It is probable that complete shows will come to the theatre through the air by microwave, perhaps, or recorded (sound and picture, yes, even color) on magnetic tape. It is quite possible that hours of operation may change considerably. It is also possible the theatre can very well be used, and profitably, every day in the off-hours of operation. In fact, the theatre can and should be the heart of community activity.

The important changes that have taken place in the past have always turned out to be for the best, and I am still convinced the best years of the motion picture industry lie ahead.

No overnight miracle will create Utopia for the exhibitor, although the impact of third dimension, when it is perfected, may resemble a miracle. But the exhibitor who changes with the times, keeps alert, and applies sound business judgment to his operation will be successful. The exhibitor who does not keep up with the changing times is doomed. Many small theatres were built during the lush period, and they provided the extra seats that were really required in those days; they justified their existence, but in my opinion there is no future for them in the changing pattern.

There should be intra-trade unity in this business, but judging from what has happened in the past, I am not too optimistic that it will be accomplished. To much selfishness of individuals and vested interests seems to preclude such a possibility. This industry today is plagued with litigation to an extent never before experienced. Surely arbitration should provide the means of settling disputes. But here again selfishness and jealously are the culprits.

Movietime U. S. A. to my way of thinking, was one of the best efforts put forth to promote our industry. True, there were disappointments and mistakes, but overall the results were excellent. Its impact on the people and the press was terrific, and it immediately effected a different attitude toward our business. Unlimited praise, particularly by the press, was alone worth the effort. I think Movietime U. S. A. should be an annual affair.

Product and Prices

Product for the entire year 1951 did not measure up to what I had hoped for, even though some very outstanding pictures were released that compare favorably with the best of other years. But there were not enough of them.

Generally, speaking, I am not in favor of increased admission prices on the better-than-average picture. I think the public is entitled to the occasional better picture at the regular admission. Our business was built on nominal admission prices, and I believe we should adhere to that practice. However, I think our price policy should be flexible enough to meet an occasional increase on a super-spectacular picture that justifies a higher admission.

Television in territory has been and still is a competitive factor where it has been in operation for a year or two, particularly since the advent of the coaxial cable. In my opinion it is not only here to stay but will get decidedly better. I feel television will find a place i our theatres to supplement our film programs and will be an asset to our business. Like radio, it will find its level and most definitely be a part of our way of life—a more pleasant and better part.

Again I say the future holds great promise for what I think is the best business in the world.

Good Pix Will Still Get 'Em Away From TV Sets And Back Into Theatres

By JOHN BALABAN
(Balaban & Katz Theatres)

Chicago.

Better merchandise makes for better business. Thus, better pictures means better boxoffice, be they pictures of first choice, or even in the secondary group. Truly, it is wishful thinking to believe that the industry can tur out only superproductions, but the chances for good business are much better if more first choice product is produced. However, the secondary group must not be neglected for they fill a great need in theatres devoted to double features, and ofttimes the industry will find a boxoffice "sleeper" among them.

Today's problems for the motion picture theatre are wide and varied, and profitable business is more difficult than heretofore. Television unquestionably is taking its toll in the areas where it now exists, and the wider its influence becomes, more theatrs will be affected. It looks as if quite a number of theatres will disappear in the next few years.

However, the general public will always look to the motion picture theatre for better motion picture entertainment of scope and magnitude, the kind of pictures that television cannot possibly present favorably. And, thus, both fields of entertainment, motion picture theatres and television, will enjoy their respective profitable places in amusements.

Judging from present trends, it seems to me that the motion picture theatre of the future will probably be moderate in size, of 1,500 seats or less, rather than the large deluxe type which prevails in important cities today.

So far as the general policy of entertainment in the future is concerned, that will depend largely upon developments in the business. Basically, of course, motion pictures will provide the theatre entertainment.

One of the great needs of our business today to iron out some of its complexities is a better understanding of our problems. Perhaps this will do away with much of the litigation currently prevailing that is so costly and time-consuming. This might be accomplished through means of arbitration.

Possibly one of the most progressive promotional ideas launched by the motion picture industry was the recent Movietime, U. S. A. campaign. By touring the stars and starlets, and bringing them in close contact with the representative people of the country as well as with the masses, not only was the industry well and favorably publicized, but a better understanding was created for motion pictures, and for the people who produce and act in them.

I sincerely trust that COMPO will organize these tours periodically and that it will engage the topmost stars and personalities for these appearances, for while the immediate benefits resulting from them might be intangible, the cumulative effect is bound to build good will for the industry and have boxoffice value well.

Cliffer for Chi

For the first time in over a decade, a cliffhanger series has been booked by 11 Balaban & Katz Theatres in Chicago. Serial Columbia's "Captain Video," film adaptation of the DuMont tele science-fiction show for small-fry.

Film also has been booked into 30 RKO houses in the New York circuit and into 58 Warner theatres.

WHAT CAMP SHOWS MEAN TODAY

By ABE LASTFOGEL

(Board Chairman, USO-CS)

Like many another veteran of World War II, USO-Camp Shows has found itself drafted again for the present crisis. The familiar "greetings" were delivered in April, 1951, stated in these words:

The Secretary of Defense recognizes Camp Shows, Inc. (a member agency of USO), as the official liaison with the agency for the procurement of professional theatrical talent from the entertainment industry for showing to the Armed Forces at military installations in the United States and to the Armed Forces overseas. The USO, through Camp Shows, Inc., assumes responsibility for recruiting both professional show units and visiting personalities to be made available in accordance with Department of Defense request schedules.

The signature affixed was that of General George C. Marshall, then Secretary of Defense; and his message an omnibus mandate to the entire entertainment industry. Nobody—from Broadway to Hollywood, from big star to little star, from talent agent to switchboard girl—nobody questioned the reactivation of Camp Shows. Live entertainment for the men and women in service has become a real and necessary part of our nation's military efforts.

The Camp Shows organization of 1941 to 1948 fame had compiled some amazing facts and statistics, giving new truth to Shakespeare's line, "All the world's a stage." At peak it was presenting 700 performances a day. In the four years through 1945, the period of actual war, 293,738 performances were given with a total attendance of 161,611,290. Every part of the globe was covered. To all the people in show business, to all the members of the Armed Forces, and to their families at home—that means almost everybody—Camp Shows had become an American institution as familiar as the U. S. mail.

The new Camp Shows organization was created to serve the same purpose as its predecessor. The same enthusiasm and popularity prevails. The same members of the entertainment industry are behind it. The same Americans support it. But something new has been added.

The 1951 Camp Shows organization has become a full-fledged member agency of USO, supplanting its prior relationship as an affiliate and one of the services of the United Service Organizations. Today Camp Shows membership in USO ranks equally with that of six great national religious and welfare agencies which with unprecedented unity and cooperation had banded together to serve the Armed Forces. These are the Young Men's Christian Associations, the National Catholic Community Service, the Salvation Army, the Young Women's Christian Associations, the National Jewish Welfare Board, and the National Travelers Aid Society.

This recognition must be a source of great pride for everybody in the entertainment industry. We must accept with humility the significance as well as the responsibility of our membership in USO.

A proper appraisal of show business must take into account not only what it is, but more importantly what it does. The Camp Shows experience of providing laughs and wholesome enjoyment for those under fire and away from the comfort of their homes, serves as an excellent yardstick of what entertainment does.

General Collins' Findings

The play-date records turned in by every CAMP SHOWS company abound with incidents that prove the effectiveness of entertainment. Eyewitness reports provide additional testimony. Here is one from General L. Lawton Collins:

"I wish you could have seen our men at the USO CAMP SHOWS which played the foxhole circuit. They would assemble often hours in advance . . . . . They simply drank the shows in. They laughed at every wisecrack. They grew sentimental over songs they heard sung, and after the show was over they went away whistling its catchy tunes. For at least a brief period they had been taken out of themselves, out of the deadly, drab existence which they had been living. I am sure that if any of you had been privileged to see those audiences, you would have felt that all the work you did was well worthwhile."

The under-the-surface value of the entertainment crops up constantly in the friendly exchanges between trouper and GI.—like this one reported by Audrey Totter after her recent trip to Japan and Korea: The place was a hospital, and she was passing the time of day with one of the men almost ready to ship back home.

"By the way," she asked, "am I keeping you from anything?"

"Yeah," he answered, "suffering!"

Sometimes it comes in a pair of letters, one from the soldier's father, the other, enclosed, from the son—like these two, the cover letter from New York City, and the enclosure from Korea:

The son wrote, "Today, believe it or not, we saw a stage show with Jack Benny, Errol Flynn, Benay Venuta, Marjorie Reynolds and others . . . really a big event . . . I had always been skeptical about these big names coming overseas. I figured they were strictly for the rear echelon. But they came right up to our regiment . . . The young ladies were really appreciated too, as I hadn't seen an American woman since last December."

The father wrote, "This letter is dated July 6. On July 14 we received a telegram notifying us that he had been killed in action on July 8. ". . . My wife and I deeply appreciate the efforts of these and the other entertainers and I am taking this means of expressing that appreciation. Further, in view of the obvious pleasure this show afforded our son, I should like to see that the boys who are still in Korea are provided with similar entertainment."

What Lies Ahead

These, then, are the tasks of CAMP SHOWS. What is its status as of the dawn of '52? What new demands will be made of CAMP SHOWS by the Department of Defense; and what new demands will it make in turn from the entertainment industry of which it is part?

Between the years 1941 and 1948 CAMP SHOWS had to be regarded as a temporary measure, just as the Armed Forces it served were regarded as temporary. Today, much as all of us would like to hope to the contrary, we must plan and build for an indefinite period of time. As long as our nation will need great military strength, so long will the entertainment industry be called upon to provide its own brand of spiritual nourishment for those in service.

The Christmas and New Year's holidays of 1951 provide some idea of what is in store for the CAMP SHOWS organization of the future. They also provide an insight into the cooperation that can be expected from people in the entertainment industry.

Defense Secretary Robert Lovett put a request for special holiday entertainment, above and beyond that normally scheduled, to CAMP SHOWS. Four planeloads of top name Broadway and Hollywood stars were asked for, to tour literally the four corners of the earth—Korea, Alaska, Europe and the Caribbean, with many stops between. Better than two weeks was required for this biggest single expedition of name stars in the history of show business, with a minimum of two performances at each stop, or every day, exclusive of hospital visits.

CAMP SHOWS in turn put this request to the industry, and the response was overwhelming. Those who couldn't go because of other commitments begged to be booked on future trips. Those who volunteered commented "For the men in service who will not be home for Christmas, we are more than happy to forego our own holidays. Who wouldn't be?"

Wounded Will Be With Us For a Long Time

By JAMES SAUTER

(President, USO-Camp Shows)

It's becoming more evident that soldier entertainment is a continuous process—one that knows no respite in war or peace. The next few years will tell whether we will have an armed truce or whether we will return to all-out peace.

But two things we do know. First, we shall always be a strong nation militarily—and this means that Camp Shows job of entertaining the men and women of the Armed Forces is one that must go on.

Second: Some wounded shall be with us for a long time. There will be some who will spend a part of their lives in Army, Navy and Veterans Administration hospitals. As a result of the war in Korea, there are many casualties. Some of the hurt from the last two World Wars are still institutionalized. To those, all Americans, all showfolk and USO-Camp Shows owes an unending obligation.

If the peace talks achieved the hoped-for successful conclusion then USO-Camp Shows will devote part of its energies to let the men in our hospitals here in the States know that they will not be neglected.

The time may soon be here when the military show business arm must project its combat picture into one of peace-time existence. It's our duty.

During the last war, we of show business had the Hollywood Victory Committee, the United Theatrical War Activities Committee, and voluntary entertainment industry groups which worked closely with other welfare organizations and with the military.

Plans even now are progressing to activate such a committee as UTWAC to take its place beside the Hollywood Coordinating Board.

During the Korean campaign, we of Camp Shows have had our major concentration on the fighting front and on those remote installations where the battle of boredom is being fought continuously. We haven't the funds to service both the fighting front and the hospitals here in America, but that's all the more reason why we must have all the volunteer help possible to do our job.

There are many in radio and television who are anchored in cities which contain Veterans Administration hospitals. These performers are now and will continue to be useful in the entertainment schedule of these hospitals. In a great measure, USO-Camp Shows activities must go on in peacetime as in times of trouble.

When, as our chairman, Abe Lastfogel, has said, Camp Shows became the seventh star in the USO flag, taking its place alongside Young Men's Christian Association, National Catholic Community Services, Salvation Army, Young Women's Christian Association, National Jewish Welfare Board and the National Travelers Aid Society—when we became that seventh star, we pledged that like these six great organization, we of show business would never be found wanting when duty called, in stress or peace. It is our privilege now—in these troubled times—to take our place alongside our six great partners in the USO.

Camp Shows must plan ahead. Those who have made so many sacrifices know in forceful terms that a grateful nation is behind them and that they'll not be forgotten by show business as long as there is a show business.

A sea captain and his chief engineer argued about which was most important to the ship's operation. When they couldn't agree, they decided to swap jobs. The chief clambered to the bridge and the captain went below. After a couple of hours, the skipper came on deck, grimy with grease and dirt, one eye swollen shut, his clothes awry. Waving a monkey wrench in a bleeding fist, he called to the chief: "You better come down. I can't make her go!" The engineer merely shrugged. "Of course you can't, Cap'n," he said. The earth presents the greatest paradox of all: It travels through space at the speed of 18½ miles an hour—without going any place.

People who ask for advice are the ones who are least likely to take it.

The kind of persons I like to see less and less of are the ones who never bother to phone you, never do anything about seeing you, but always greet you effusively when they run into you and say: "You're one of my favorite people."

Another character I could do without is the one who has just heard a new joke and right away calls you on the phone to tell it to you. (This chronic story teller should be deported—even if he's not an alien.) Another candidate for W. S. Gilbert's list of those who never will be missed is the man who laughs so hysterically at his own jokes that he fairly knocks himself out. (Don't bother to laugh at this kind of story teller. It isn't necessary.)

When we males see a beautiful girl being hugged and kissed in a movie, we put ourselves in the place of the man doing the love making. We'd be shocked to learn that our wives put themselves in the place of the girl being hugged and kissed.

Because silence, we have been told, is wisdom, we regard a "man of few words" as a sage, a pundit, etc. It ain't necessarily so. Very often, a man is a "man of few words" because that's all he knows.

The best bridge between despair and hope is a good night's sleep.

All that there is to say about the human race, was said by Jonathan Swift in "Gulliver's Travels." Of all the books I have read, that is the one I wish I had written. I can kick myself everytime I think that Swift beat me to it by only 225 years.

I am not ready to bite the dust yet, but I hope I don't live long enough to be sorry I was born.

Before I take leave of this mundane sphere, one of the things I'd like to have explained to me is why do some men wear a belt and suspenders at the same time? Almost invariably, these men carry their coat on their arm. Well, as the feller says, that's what makes horse racing.

We rarely hear of anyone having some of the maladies that used to plague us, like typhoid fever, diphtheria, and such. I have enough faith in medical science to believe that someday they will find a cure for the common cold and dandruff.

Totalitarianism, no matter what banner it parades under, is nothing but another form of gangsterism blown up to national proportions. And while I'm on the subject, the only real difference between Uncle Joe and Hitler is that one of them is dead.

Fear, whether it be of something real or fancied, is a terrible thing. I guess I'm just a lucky guy. I fear nobody—but people.

We are told that "this is the best of all possible worlds," which is just another way of saying the world isn't perfect. It could, however, be made perfect by the simple device of taking all the people out of it.

Except for the rare exceptions, of course:

Writing poetry is for those
Who can't express themselves in prose.

And:

Those who choose
To woo the muse,
Have little to gain
And more to loose.

I used to worry so much about not being a good speller. Since I wrote the following, I don't worry about it any more:

There are tomes in endless number
Available to us
That proclaim the debt that we owe
To such men as Galileo,
Kepler and Copernicus.
There are monuments to Edison
And Alexander Bell,
But I've yet to see a statue
Of a stinker who could spell.

P. S.: If any more of these thoughts intrude on my sleep, I'm gonna start taking pills.

When Gertrude Lawrence returned to London, some years ago, as a famous star, already well known there and in the provinces, she had as her co-star, Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., who proved to be the main attraction. Everyone rushed up for his autograph, but no one wanted hers. Finally, disgusted, Gertie grabbed away an autograph book from a fan and deliberately signed her name. The little girl looked at the autograph and then said to her friend: "Well, anyway, the hand writin' ain't so bad."

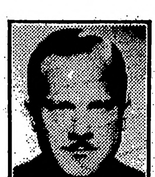
U. S. Filmer's Perspective on British Customs and Manners

By RICHARD MEALAND

London.

There was a cocktail party at Claridge's in London. All the British filmmakers were there, including an American delegation of the Motion Picture Association. My wife—who thinks that because I work in London the whole of Europe is available to us at a moment's whim—got talking to some of the guests about the places she hoped to visit during our stay here. (She had often said to me that she wanted to see Ireland, and had come home one day loaded down with literature given to her by a British tourist agency; the literature was all about Northern Ireland, and I had pointed out to her the vast difference between that sub-section of the United Kingdom and the Republic of Eire.)



Richard Mealand

She was talking to (I later learned) Joyce O'Hara, John G. McCarthy, James A. Mulvey and Tony Reddi , not one of whom even remotely resembles an Orangeman. "The place I want to visit," she said, "Is Southern Ireland."

Out of respect to her womanhood, they didn't shoot her on the spot. But Tony Reddin got her away from there quickly, with a curb on his shelalagh.

The second hand bookshops of London—particularly of Charing Cross Road—are well known to American bibliophiles. I have found in them certain rare books on mountain climbing, which I collect, at prices which would amaze the American authority on such books, Edward Cushing of New Canaan, Conn. But in three months of searching I had had no luck at finding two books of another kind, "Murder for Profit" and "12 Against the Gods," both by the late William Bolitho. One day I walked into an obscure little shop and ran into George Macy, the American publisher of fine editions, Heritage Books, etc. I told him what I was looking for. "I can send you as many as you want of each," he said. "Alexander Woollcott did a preface for 'Murder for Profit' and Kip Fadiman did one for '12 Against the Gods.' How many do you want?"

Moral: Don't bother looking for rare book bargains in London. Chances are George Macy has published 'em in some form or another at one time or another.

Title-Happy

Mike Macius has an advertising agency in London, but he used to be the London represenative of the former New York agency, Lord & Thomas. John Byram, of Paramount, was in London on a visit and met his old friend, Macius, whom he had not seen for years.

Later, John paid a visit to Gilbert Miller who has a considerable reputation not only as a producer of excellent plays but also as an extravagant admirer of anyone with a title. Johnny told Gilbert about meeting his old friend Macius, of Lord & Thomas Miller perked up interest at once. "Lord who?" he asked.

One maddening thing about taking a permanent job in England is the number of papers one has to fill out. I have answered so many questions about myself in the last three months that I am questionnaire-happy.

Here is the list:

1. American passport application filled out in New York.
2. Landing form for Great Britain, filled out on the plane before arrival.
3. Customs declaration filled out on the plane before arrival.
4. Immigration statement filled out on arrival at London Airport.
5. Application for work permit filled out for the British Home Office.
6. Application for British ration book.
7. Application for British identity card.
8. Application for permanent residence Great Britain.
9. Registration with the police Alien Registration Bureau.
10. British income tax form.
11. Registration at Somerset House as an executive of a British company.
12. Registration with the Bank of England for permission to hold shares of the British company.
13. Application for a "code number" in connection with British income tax.
14. Application for the compulsory British Health Insurance.
15. Statement of residence information.

Once this is done, you're set. Except—if you go out of the country for longer than 14 days, for a vacation on the Continent for instance, you have to go through practically the whole thing all over again, including the additional forms that must be filled out on entering and leaving the Continental country visited.

My wife's struggles with British rationing would make a book. One of her troubles is, of course, getting enough meat to provide us with the necessary proteins in our diet. There are two kinds of meat—and she now takes what the butcher gives her. But for some weeks, two words nearly brought us to the point of meat starvation. One of the words was "carcass meat," which she thought was something that has been dead for too long. The other was "offal" which she couldn't bring herself to say. She now knows better. When she gets carcass meat, she knows it's what she wants. When she gets offal, she gets liver or kidneys. The only trouble is, she refuses to cook kidneys. Says she doesn't like the smell.

Speaking of meat, we went visiting for a weekend with some English friends in Surrey. On Sunday morning we were awakened by the sound of shots. That evening we had pigeon-and-rabbit pie for dinner. The Englishman loves this. He has reverted to savagery and goes hunting before breakfast. Motorists in England do not brake or swerve when the denizens of the animal or bird world cross the road in front of their cars. They aim with intent to kill. There was a head-on collision in Sussex the other day; two cars coming from opposite directions were aiming for the same rabbit.

Going by air to Europe has advantages and disadvantages. You get there fast, but too fast. It took two weeks for my body to become adjusted to London time after New York time. I was sleepy at the wrong time of day and wide awake at the wrong time. At noon I felt like 4 a.m. and at midnight I felt in the mood for the afternoon cocktail. Similarly with the appetite and the body's routine functions. A foreign land is strange enough, but when you're hurled at it by plane, you never know what time it is.

In spite of many shortages England still has some foods which cannot be bettered anywhere else. My candidates, all freely obtainable in England, are: potted shrimps, smoked Scotch salmon, fresh Scotch salmon, orange marmalade, Little Scarlet strawberry jam, Whitstable oysters, Dover sole, jugged hare, Stilton cheese (rationed but sometimes obtainable), Cornish or Devonshire clotted cream (available seasonally), cold chicken pie, Broadbeans (when young and tender), partridge and bread crumbs—and a pint of mild and bitter, weak though it is these days, preferably Tetley's.

Mr. J. Rockefeller, a man of some* means
Took Martha Baird Allen on honeymoon scenes.
"Come-on-a My House" by William Saroyan
Was O. K. at first, but became quite annoyin'.
(With songwriters desp'rately striving for jack, it Would seem that a playwright should mind his own racket.)
A wave of inertia enveloped the city
The week that it played the Kefauver Committee.
Some affluent Have's became lowly Have-nots
By day at the Flats and by night at the Trots.
A sock and a smash and a b. o. bonanza
Was "Life of Caruso" with Mario Lanza.
A song which was rather excessively sung
Explained that for love one is never too young;
But the absolute leader in saleable schmaltz,
Of course was the beautiful "Tennessee Waltz."

Legits found the going a little too slow;
The esteemed "King and I," though an elegant show,
Can't compare with a play that has no predecessor:
The musical comedy starring Frank Loesser.
Dinty Moore's took a breather (for three weeks, I mean),
So for three weeks I tried Mrs. Stillman's cuisine.
Musical circles were somewhat surprised
When the Brooklyn Sym-phony was un-unionized.
Though Uncle Nick's epics found favor with many,
I'm one of the few who prefer Keats to Kenny.

Days may come and others may dawn,
But ev'ry one has a Barry gray dawn.
Broadway gave tempered accolades
To "Bagels & Yox" and "Borscht Capades."
ASCAP gave to those who have,
From its new home on Madison Ave.,
And one would have to travel far back
For a nicer Pres. than Otto Harbach.

Some praised Toots Shor and some reviled him,
Is how New Yorker Mag. profiled him.
When Collier's, too, gave him a spread,
You got the mag. with your rolls and bread.
Again it took a lot of moxie
To book Mitropoulos at the Roxy.
The pubs went for tunes that were ancient and folkey,
Like "Good-night, Irene" and "On Top of Old Smokey";
Some songwriters still had to work very hard,
While others got by on a library card.
The Big Show's scripting set the pace,
Thanks to a card called Goodman Ace.
Miss C. K. Hutchins, the former Miss Utah,
Was Miss America—what a beaut, ah!

The Turpin-Sugar fight was great,
But even greater was the gate;
Nor TV sights nor AM sounds
Exuded from the Polo Grounds.
'Twas au revoir for Number 5,
The champ who kept the Yanks alive.
Micky Mantle is his replacement.
A babe was born in Macy's basement.
With glee I tossed my hat away
For "Callaway Went Thataway";
The title song, I might assert,
Was pretty snappy, too. (Advert.)

Biz was spotty at movie palaces,
In spite of which we had two "Alices."
Crooner F. Sinatra gave a
Lot of time to courtin' Ava.
A show which gave me lots of fun
Was Gibbs' "Season in the Sun."
Eyssell was made R. Center's Pres.—
'Twas quite a feather in his fez.
The Met was in the red again,
So op'ra may be dead again.
The $64 question is:
What will happen with the Quiz?

At warmup time, the local bars
Were "tuned to the call-letters of the stars";
Those baseball broadcasts, how I relished 'em
The way the Ol' Redhead embellished 'em!
The Pale Hose started quite a blitz,
Then suddenly ran out of hits.
The Giants set the country buzzin'
With a home-run blast by Branca's cousin.
With Happy out, Dan Parker's solemn,
'Cause how's he gonna fill a column?
Did Be-Bop die? "It never did!"
Says Birdland's mentor, Symphony Sid.

Because of Rising Costs, the Bard
Did not send out a Xmas card,
So Happy New Year to all my friends
As this year starts and last year ends!

HOLLYWOOD BAEDEKER

By BILL HALLIGAN

Hollywood.

Hollywood is a wondrous place, probably the most publicized city in the world. Visitors from all over the land strive in vain each day to crash the sacred portals of the studios. Everyone wants to see how a motion picture is made. They are as welcome as a bill collector. If the cinema tycoons held open house a picture would never be made. The great studios are very polite about it but, for self-protection, they must curb the visiting list. Sightseers slow up production.

Balked at the attempt to worm their way in, the would-be Star Gazers are forced to look elsewhere and their next best bet is the amazing Farmers Market—an epicure's delight. After that they are stymied.

But the greatest sight of all, a place where they are doubly welcome remains in almost total obscurity. It is The Motion Picture Hospital & Country House at Woodland Hills.

Let me tell you how you get there.

You motor through San Fernando Valley 20 miles from Hollywood on Ventura Blvd. You pass Studio City, where once Mack Sennett was king. It is a double-lane freeway and you get an idea from the traffic how it has grown in the past 10 years—there are nearly 1,000,000 souls living in this beautiful valley.

Studio City is a metropolis all by itself. Smart shops. Motion Picture Palaces. A gorgeous view of the Santa Monica Mountains on one side and the San Gabriel Range on the other.

You take a side-drive of a block to Universal City where Bill Goetz now reigns, where Uncle Carl Laemmle made a dream come true. A few blocks away are the mammoth structures of the Warner Bros. and below that the vast factories of the aircraft manufacturers and the great airfield in Burbank.

You get back on the main line and pass through Sherman Oaks where Sepulvada cuts through the artery on its way from the Ocean over the mighty Ridge Route to Bakersfield.

Down the lane a mile is the little town of Encino where picture greats live in luxury and privacy—Clark Gable, Spencer Tracy, Bryan Foy and hosts of others.

You come to the little town of Tarzana where Charlie Winninger, Jay C. Flippen and Bill Hibbitt have their estates. Then over Chalk Hill and into Woodland Hills, a thriving little community once called Gerard. It boasts of one of the finest golf courses. On the way is a driving range where ex-vauder Jack Kennedy is the major domo.

Now you arrive at the little hanging town of Calabasas and turn left. In one minute you are looking at the finest establishment in all California. I might say America. The Motion Picture Hospital & Country House—a 40-acre paradise. It beggars the Biltmore in Santa Barbara. It is the home of the helpless—the sick and aged Motion Picture Artist.

Better Than Dr. Kildare

You walk up the steps of the hospital and enter the foyer. Of all the world's great hospitals you are now in one that is second to none. Forty private rooms, no wards, no rooms for two. You see the massive X-Ray room, the operating theatre, the laboratory and the pharmacy, the beautiful patio where the convalescent can bask in the sun and grow back into health, the acres of fruit trees and flowers and the mighty hills of the Topango Canyon stretching 15 miles to the sea.

Down the covered walk to the Country House is only a short stroll away. It has an entrance that J. P. Morgan would have been proud of. You see the magnificent library and you know you have never seen a better one. You walk through the lounge with its immense television set, and its luxurious chairs and lounges remind one of the Queen Mary.

You go outside and take a stroll around the place. There are 38 cottages smothered with roses. Here reside the former greats of the Cinema World living out their lives in contentment and luxury. This can rightly be called a heaven on earth, and it is the fulfillment of a dream of one man—a Doctor Christian come to life, a man who has labored incessantly for the success of this Shangri-La of the motion picture worker. His name is Jean Hersholt, and he is as plain as an old shoe.

For the guests there are three stationwagons making trips into Hollywood twice a week. There is a laundress and a dentist, a pedicurist and an occulist and a lady named Nunn who sees to the wants of the guests. There are no rules—ladies and gentlemen need none.

There are garages for your jalopy and a cleaner for your clothes. There are cigarets for the asking. This is the Cuffo's dream of Paradise. There is no set of workers in all the world who are as well taken care of in their hour of need and illness as the cinema artists of Hollywood. The Industry can well be proud.

The hospital has a mighty son of Hippocrates named Dr. Kobal who sees all, knows all, and cures all. The institution is run in right royal style by the competent and able Miss Ruth Griffith assisted by the angel of the place, Miss Ginger Dickey, an honor student from Stanford U., with a staff of 20 nurses and technicians. Nothing is left out, nothing is forgotten. They have everything. The greatest surgeon in California, to our way of thinking, is in command, Dr. Francis E. Browne. He averages a dozen operations a week in the surgery.

Is this some place? It positively is. And it's free.

Free to the workers in the motion picture field. Paid for and supported by them, augumented by huge donations from the Studios.

Two years ago the Friars Club gave a benefit performance for the fund. It established an all-time high in cash returns. Never in the history of show biz has the result been equalled. The net profit from the benefit, all turned over to the fund, was the gigantic sum of $301,000—net. Thanks Mr. Jessel.

The next time you are in Hollywood come out and see this place, the spot the industry points to with justifiable pride. It is truly a landmark, and every night when the lights are turned out and the silent prayer is said, there is always an extra one for the man directly responsible—Mr. Jean Hersholt.

Do you want to know how I know all about the place? I live there.

MPIC Exec Sec Reappraises Hollywood's Successful Fight Against Communism

By ART ARTHUR

Hollywood.

There seems to be a burning yearning in places plagued by personal-profit "patriots" of the ilk of one notorious rabble-rouser, who faced a sedition indictment in World War II to ignore, overlook or loudly disparage the fight against Communism waged within Hollywood.

Any effort to publicly record the facts about the industry's success in defeating the malignant threat of Communist infil-traitors immediately is met with loud snorts of "Whitewash!"

Whitewash? Only a total fool would attempt to whitewash away the record which clearly shows how Communists moved in on Hollywood and attempted to use the film industry for their foul and devious purposes.

But, by the same token, why the redwash? Why do we see such dogged determination to keep smearing the industry with a red brush? Why the implacable ears—closed insistence on ignoring the record which shows just as clearly that the Communists were met and routed by devoted honest patriots within the motion picture industry itself?

My guess is that there are only two reasons. We of the industry are responsible for one reason—our own failure to spread far and wide the truth and the facts about the industry's fight against Communism. That must be remedied.

The second reason lies in the aforementioned personal-profit "patriots"—the boys who make a buck out of passing themselves off as experts on "Hollywood Communists and Communism" . . . and who are unwilling to see that particular gravy train disappear. Some among the experts are honest anti-Communists motivated by only one objective—the total extinction of Communists wherever they may be. When they make mistakes, they are honest mistakes—and open to correction. But there's quite a calloused crew of others whose incomes dictate that they must continue to set up the "Reds-running-riot-in-Hollywood" strawman long after the battle is over and only feeble remnants remain to be mopped-up.

The hellfire war dances and Comanche whoopings of the redwash-hogwash specialists seem doubly daffy in light of the investigations by the House Committee on un-American Activities. Probably no investigation by the Committee has been more thorough than the one conducted into Hollywood Communism. But the redwash-hogwash artists scorn the House Committee, too, apparently. Everybody's out of step but the guy who might have to wrap up his lucrative racket if forced to admit that Hollywood in 1952 is a far war-cry from Hollywood in 1947.

Coming back to reason No. 1—our own failure to spread the facts far and wide—let's make this a little contribution toward correcting that first fault. (Full detail can be provided to support every statement herein capsuled.)

Since no well-informed industry champion would seek to whitewash, here are some of the facts which can be stressed whenever you run into the other extreme—the redwash-hogwash:

Almost Totally Extinct

1. Communism in Hollywood is bordering on total extinction. The long sinister effort stealthily begun by Communists more than 20 years ago is uttering its last gasps—thanks to successful efforts by the motion picture industry itself and some hefty assist by the House Committee on un-American Activities.

2. Few, if any, other American industries can point to a better record of successfully shattering a Communist infiltration threat. This is especially true of sensitive defense industries—where Communists have entrenched themselves and where they should be pursued to extinction with equal vigor by the House Committee. Communists have shown up in all other forms of mass communication (such as press, magazines, radio and television) as well as in schools and colleges, in our Government and even in church circles. But where else have militant anti-Communists fought the infiltrators on a corresponding scale—and with corresponding success? No wonder the Los Angeles Mirror observed editorially: "It is to be doubted that any other industry has a better record."

3. Any honest examination of the facts—dedicated neither to whitewash nor to redwash nor to hogwash—will make increasingly clear the little-realized fact that the story of Communism in Hollywood is a story of failure and defeat—and not a story of Communist triumph . . . that, in terms of the Party's major objectives, whatever successes they had were piddling successes . . . that today "the Communist is a completely ineffective element in Hollywood life—in Hollywood they have failed," as was stated under oath by ex-Communist Edward Dmytryk. Ex-Communists Richard Collins, Sterling Hayden and Leo Townsend all have testified in the same vein.

Nor are ex-Communists the only source of this opinion. Roy Brewer, leading Hollywood anti-Communist, has testified: "The back of Communist power in Hollywood has been broken." Senator Edward Martin, Congressman Donald Jackson and Victor Lasky, co-author of "Seeds of Treason," are among those who have expressed similar views.

4. No man who prides himself on honesty and fairness has the right to publicly clamor about the sordid story of how Communists plotted to take over Hollywood—unless he is also willing to acquaint himself with the stirring story of how patriotic anti-Communists in Hollywood slowed, stopped, reversed and then routed the Communist conspiracy.

5. The first important step in the Communist plot against Hollywood was to obtain control of the Guilds and Unions—and thus be in a position to dictate to management.

Faced with this threat, the Guilds and Unions of Hollywood successively demolished Communist influence within their ranks in an unparalleled series of anti-Communist triumphs, climaxing when the Screen Writers Guild in 1947 filled 20 out of the 21 places on its Executive Board with anti-Communists . . . and when Roy Brewer's AFL labor boys routed the Communist efforts to seize the IATSE on the West Coast.

6. Similarly, Hollywood management has established a record virtually unmatched by management in any other American industry faced with an equivalent fight to defeat Communist infiltration. Nowhere else in the nation, for example, has any responsible section of management made itself the subject of millions of dollars in lawsuits in order to pursue an anti-Communist program in the face of the innumerable legal jeopardies that hamper action by management.

7. Full, frank and searching investigation—dedicated neither to whitewash nor to redwash nor to hogwash—confirms that the Communist effort to inject propaganda into American motion pictures had virtually no success except upon Government request in the brief years when Soviet Russia was our wartime ally. But, on the contrary, the motion picture industry has made or is making a total of at least 50 films which in whole or in part contain direct attacks upon Communism—and which constitute hard-hitting anti-Communist propaganda. The same can be said of scores of short subjects and documentary films made by the industry.

8. To the consternation of Communists everywhere, the motion picture industry has made or is making scores of films which, by upholding those institutions of democracy which the Communists unceasingly try to tear down, present on the screens of the world day in and day out the affirmative case for the superiority of our way of life over that of any totalitarian system. (Witness "Come to the Stable," "Going My Way" and "One Foot in Heaven" as example of films which "sell" reverence and respect for religion.)

9. Communists throughout the world, via Moscow's Cominform, have been instructed that they must make Hollywood films a prime enemy. The orders, conveyed through the Cominform Journal No. 28, cries that "The American Cinema is a war weapon" and declares that: "It is imperative to render the American cinema harmless."

10. Any effort to determine the true nature of the motion picture industry in relation to Communism—dedicated neither to whitewash, redwash nor hogwash—would reveal overwhelming records of patriotic service in war and post-war by men and women of the industry, as well as service in aid of every worthy charitable cause and philanthropy to which the industry can lend its manifold assistance.

The records serve separately and collectively to cardiogram the real beat of Hollywood's heart in any choice between the ways of democracy and any brand of totalitarianism whatsoever, Communism included.

11. The search for truth leaves no doubt that Hollywood today possesses as fine a body of seasoned anti-Communist veterans as can be found anywhere in the country—men who have met and defeated some of the shrewdest and most resourceful brains that the Communist Party could send to the Coast. The skill and experience of these anti-Communists provide Hollywood with a security against local Communist re-birth scarcely found anywhere else in American life.

12. Any meticulous effort at fact-gathering would make clear that, at their very peak, Communists totaled little more than 1% of the people employed in the motion picture industry and that today—allowing for the unknown—the percentage is no more than the smallest fraction of 1%.

'Fellow Travelers'

13. At one time the Hollywood "fellow traveler" constituted a major problem. He was best described as being like the bride who didn't know the difference between baking powder and gunpowder—and was in for one helluva surprise!

But the "fellow traveler" faded rapidly on the heels of successful steps taken within Hollywood in recent years to alert unsuspecting individuals and to make them aware of concealed Commie beguilements.

Now, as a matter of fact, the situation has gone to the other extreme. One cautious individual announced not long ago that he had even resigned from the Auto Club!

14. Exploring every avenue toward power, the Communists sought names and influence through so-called political, professional, patriotic, social and veteran organizations—such as HICCASP (the Hollywood Independent Citizens Council of the Arts, Sciences & Professions), the Hollywood Writers Mobilization, the People's Education Center and numerous others.

But a review of the record—dedicated neither to whitewash nor to redwash nor to hogwash—would show how the Communists had each successive hope for power blasted as anti-Communists counterattacked the organizations and sank them into oblivion or inept frustration.

15. The Communists sought to use Hollywood as a source for funds, raised under every conceivable guise. In this field they met their best success—since the people of show business always were soft touches for any plea for milk for the babies of starving miners or what have you.

But the record shows that in recent years the Communist hope of turning Hollywood into the Party's treasure chest dwindled and dried up under the heat of anti-Communist spotlights—another victory over the disintegrating Communist apparatus best reflected, perhaps, in an observation last year in a Hollywood column: "At a local Red meeting the other night, after the hat was passed, the collection totalled $18.63. Three years ago, a meeting at the same place and the same organization grabbed $51,000."

16. Despite the most searching investigation by the House Committee and the most intensive efforts by industry anti-Communists, an underground faction of Communists may still remain in the Hollywood area—for Communists never give up entirely or stop trying.

For this reason, those in Hollywood who fought and beat the Communists have no intention of relaxing their vigilance for any sign that might betray any overlooked fragments of the Communist conspiracy.

17. Rather than being, as the redwash-hogwash boys would have it, an industry in which Communists still cavort on every corner, the motion picture industry today is in a position to offer to other industries a blueprint for action against Communists.

Instead of berating Hollywood, a lot of the attackers could well stop, look—and learn.

18. Every organization in the industry with any claim to expressing official viewpoints has supported the fight against Communism—including, in the east, Council of Motion Picture Organizations and the Motion Picture Assn. of America, and in Hollywood, the Screen Actors Guild and all other key bodies represented in the Motion Picture Industry Council. It was the MPIC which officially recorded the industry's support of the 1951 House Committee.

The MPIC statement of support added: "But the MPIC would be derelict in its duty if it did not point out that the public has been given an exaggerated and distorted impression of the degree of this Communist infiltration."

That statement still holds true—and could continue to be true as long as the redwash boys are able to parlay their little paint buckets into full dinner pails. But they must know by now that ptomaine will be the inevitable result.

'My Favorite Cattle Rustler'

By CHARLES WILLIAMS

Hollywood.

Jim Rogan is shooting the last sequence of "Desert Justice," a remake of "Death Valley Joe," from the silent version of "The Worst Man in Panamint," at Lone Pine, Cal.

Rogan is ahead of schedule two days and feels very happy this morning, until a studio car pulls up in the foreground, and Rex Allen, the unit manager, hops out. He greets Rogan and the crew effusively, and hands a letter to the director, which reads as follows.

Location—Lone Pine. "Desert Justice" Co.
Director—James Rogan. Producer—Max Weinberg.

Looked at a "Rough Cut" of six reels. Sorry you talked me into having Eddie Wilson. His comedy scenes are flat and he is badly miscast. Suggest using him in the big fight at the camp. But kill him off at the first exchange of shots. Regards, Max.

Rogan turns to his assistant, "Get Eddie Wilson a 10-gallon hat and a six-gun. He's going to work in the next shot." In a few minutes Eddie hobbles over to Rogan.

"What's the idea Jim? I'm playing the cook."

"Orders from the production office, Eddie. They want you in the big fight. Hey, Tex, get Wheezer up here for Eddie. Listen, count five after I start rolling, then pull your six-gun and empty it past camera right. You're a cattle-rustling cook, fighting off the ranch boys who are trying to recover the cattle that your gang rustled from the Bar B.Q."

In projection room "A" at Cosmos Studios, Rogan, Weinberg and the cutter are running "Desert Justice" for J. P. Hammons, the international banker who owns the studio and half of Culver City.

Rogan and Weinberg are watching Hammons' reactions closely. His face is countenance that would have broken Gutzon Borglum's chisel. He is a huge bearded man who hasn't laughed since his partner committed suicide in the panic of '29.

"Who is that actor playing the cook?" thunders Hammons.

"Why he's just a bit player, Mr. Hammons. We're going to cut him plenty."

"Like hell you are. He's the best western actor I' seen since Hoot Gibson. That chap is a great artist—never in my life have I seen anything like that shot where he shoots the horse in the neck, and takes that fall. The horse is very good, too. I think I'll have him shipped on to Southampton. My wife runs a little theatre there. She's going to do 'The Virginian.' The animal would strengthen the cast considerably."

Eddie Wilson is lying in bed trying to forget Wheezer, Lone Pine, and the big fight. His cute little better half, who shares the Murphy bed with him, has just finished serving him breakfast.

"How does your head feel, honey?"

"Lousy, no more westerns for me. Is there any mail baby?"

"I'll go out and see. Try and relax sweetie, you need all the strength you can get."

"I get enough rest laying off," yells our favorite cattle rustler.

In a few moments Alice runs into the room. "Here's letter from the studio."

"They have nothing on me. I told them I couldn't ride a horse. Read it to me."

"Darling, they can't put you in jail for trying. Listen,

'Dear Eddie:

Will you kindly drop into my office at your earliest convenience. Doctor Hansen tells me that you are much better. Regards,
Max Weinberg'."

Weinberg's office is an acute shock to the optic nerves. The furniture had been designed by an exiled Polish cabinet maker, who had been badly frightened by the OGPU. Everything was on a slant and looked as if it were about to run out the door. The cocktail bar was the ace attraction. It had an electrical robot bartender, with no union hours. By pressing any one of a dozen buttons on its chest, you could get a choice of 10 different drinks.

Rogan and Eddie are leaning against the teakwood bar, downing straight shots. Weinberg is sitting in a corner looking at some papers. He comes over to the bar and hands Eddie a pen and some contracts.

"Hammons has upped you to a flat $1,500 a week. That's top money for a western star these days, you lucky ham."

"To hell with the budget, slip me a sawbuck, Jimsey boy, thish is on little me." Rogan hands Eddie a bill.

The robot becomes nervous at the sight of money, and drops a glass.

"Wait a minute, boys, don't start grinding, I gotta call the wife."

Eddie stumbles over to Weinberg's desk and starts dialing the phone.

"Hello, baaby, thish ish me. Get your clothes on, we're going out to the valley and buy a house . . . whose drunk?"

Eddie slowly fades out on the desk.

Wrong Plug

During the recent Kefauver TV trials, the committee was living at a swank New York hotel. It happens that a very large bookmaker had been occupying a suite at the same hotel for a number of months and his clerk was accepting bets by telephone from that suite. A group of bettors desiring to wager on a horse one of them owned, phoned the hotel where the bookie was doing business. They asked the switchboard operator for the right suite but, like some horse players, she got her "plugs" mixed and connected him with the suite next door. A strange voice answered the phone.

"Who is this?" asked the player. "This is Senator Tobey," came back a gruff voice. The player dropped the receiver and turning to his pals remarked, "Boy, what a wrong number I got!" —Ken Kling.

Writers Are for the Birds

By CLAUDE BINYON

Hollywood.

Joe Presser liked his job as a studio janitor. He worked on the sound stages, sweeping up cigaret butts and paper cups and gum wrappers while he watched motion pictures being made. After a number of years people started calling him Pop and neglected apologizing when they bumped into him, but Joe didn't mind. His work was easy, and it fascinated him to see how scenes fell into certain patterns of sameness through the years.

Claude Binyon

There was the Man Sleeping the Living Room Couch Scene, for instance. Joe knew from long experience that the girl would get the bedroom and the man's pajamas, while the man would curl up uncomfortably with one blanket on a hard divan. Then there would be a shot of the girl lying wide-awake and a shot of the man lying wide-awake. Then the girl would look toward the door and get out of bed, and the man would look toward the door and get off the divan. Each would approach the door without the other knowing it. The man would almost knock, and the girl would almost open the door. Then they would go back to their bed and couch, because what else could they do in a picture?

A new director was making the Man Sleeping on the Living Room Couch Scene one day, and Joe frowned in surprise. The man crawled onto the divan with his blanket and the girl got into bed with the man's pajamas and that was that. Joe leaned on his broom handle, staring, unwilling to believe his eyes. Already uneasy about his work, and noting Joe's reaction, the director approached him between setups.

"Something wrong, Pop?" he asked.

"Maybe not, sir," shrugged Joe. "It just seemed to me like you missed a good chance to show how they feel about each other. Maybe like showing them both laying awake and yenning—and then they get up and go to the door—you know, just going, not doing; and finally they crawl back into the hay alone, still yenning. It's just an idea—maybe lousy."

The director pondered, and then he beamed. "That's it, Pop. That's what was in the back of my head all the time. Thanks for reminding me." And Joe was content again as he watched the new boy shoot the Man Sleeping on the Living Room Couch Scene the way it should be shot.

Joe performed the same service for other directors, steering them straight when they veered from the patterns of Ashamed of Your Own Mother or Father, or Driving Like Hell in the Fog, or the Wife Putting on a Phoney Love Act with the Concert Pianist, or Boy Telling Girl Off and Getting Told Off Double, or Priest Telling Gangster Friend This Is the Only Way It Could End. And sometimes he would remind directors that when they were making a picture about three men they were actually making the "Three Musketeers," and only a chump would try a new twist.

How They 'Broke' Him

In time Joe became an omen of good luck on the set and was requested as set janitor by many directors. This led to an investigation by the front office, with the inevitable result. Joe was relieved of his broom and given a cell in the writers' block, furnished with a typewriter and a secretary complete with knitting needles. He was assigned to write a story for Alan Ladd.

Joe liked the office very much. From the window he could see laborers pushing heavy things. But the secretary bothered him. She knitted steadily, in the manner of all good secretaries, but from time to time she looked at him expectantly. Finally she broached the subject. "When are we starting?" she asked.

Joe was genuinely surprised. "Starting what?" he said. "The Alan Ladd original," answered the secretary.

"How can we start?" retorted Joe. "What have they showed us? Nothing! How can you tell them what's wrong if they don't show you nothing?"

"But you're supposed to give them the idea," said the secretary. "Then they tell you what's wrong."

"I know what's wrong," said Joe. "All I gotta do is see it and I can tell you. But I can't write nothing first because I can't write nothing wrong!"

The secretary thought this over for a moment and then she excused herself. Within a short time Joe was called to the front office.

"Pop," said the producer, "I'm afraid we've made a mistake."

"Show it to me," said Joe confidently, "and I'll tell you."

"Look into that wall mirror," said the producer. Joe walked over and looked at himself.

"What's wrong with what you see?" asked the producer.

Joe considered. "It should have a broom in its hand," he said finally.

"I could make it gentle," said the producer. "I could get you a job as a critic."

Joe headed for the door, happier than he had been for weeks. "No, thanks," he said. "I don't want to sit around and smell it. I'd rather sweep it out."

A BIOPIC WITHOUT A BIO

By MAX SHULMAN

To the millions of theatregoers who enjoyed the recent biopic about the two eminent American tunesmiths, A. M. Heffernan and Ralph Schwartz, the following speech, made by Donald (Don) Crutfellow, the producer of the A. M. Heffernan-Ralph Schwartz biopic before the annual dinner of the American Biopic Producers Brotherhood in the Tourquoise Room of the Super-Chief, will be of interest.

Max Shulman

"Fellow biopic producers and gentlemen," said Mr. Crutfellow, opening his speech with a jest as is his wont (Mr. Crutfellow has frequently been called the American Will Rogers), "the difficulties surrounding the production of the A. M. Heffernan-Ralph Schwartz biopic were legion, and not the least of them was the choice of a title. For weeks every man-jack of us in the organization racked and cudgeled his brains, but without result. I had finally decided to release the picture without a title—I came to this decision with the utmost reluctance, let me tell you, for whenever I have done this in the past, an immoderate amount of confusion has resulted—when out of the blue a solution was found. My phone rang at 4 a. m. one morning. It was a young man named Ed Toklas from my organization. 'Mr. Crutfellow, Mr. Crutfellow!' he cried, scarcely able to contain his excitement. 'I've got it! I've got the title! Get this, Mr. Crutfellow—The A. M. Heffernan-Ralph Schwartz Story.'

"Well, gentlemen, titles like this don't come to you every day, and I am not one to let ingenuity in my organization go unrewarded. On the spot, despite the lateness of the hour, I summoned a notary and made Ed Toklas associate producer and gave him the hand of my daughter in marriage, overriding his modest protests that he did not deserve to be associate producer and he already had a wife.

"It must not be thought that finding a title ended the difficulties which beset 'The A. M. Heffernan-Ralph Schwartz Story.' Far from it. There were plot problems which seemed at the beginning insuperable. Naturally we wanted to follow as closely as possible the real life stories of A. M. Heffernan and Ralph Schwartz, but it was idle to deny that certain aspects of their lives were inconsistent with good movie-making. For example, A. M. Heffernan has been drunk since puberty and Ralph Schwartz is slightly under two feet high. Such figures, you will agree, gentlemen, are not boxoffice.

Fickle Husbands

"As though this were not trouble enough, a question of clearances arose which, I daresay, was the most difficult yet faced by a biopic producer. Heffernan was married seven times. After each divorce Schwartz would marry the castoff wife, without, however, troubling to divorce the wives he already had. A bewildering number of children, each of whom presented a vexing puzzle in paternity, resulted from this arrangement. I felt that this situation, though not without a certain piquance, was better left unportrayed. In this opinion I was enthusiastically supported by my legal department. So busy were my attorneys in obtaining clearances from all the Heffernan-Schwartz kith and kin, that they quite forgot to obtain clearances from Heffernan and Schwartz themselves. Both are now suing me for invasion of privacy.

"But there was more, gentlemen. The problem of locale had my scenic people quite beside themselves. Heffernan & Schwartz, eminent songwriters though they were, never went to Broadway. Nor to Hollywood. Not even to Chicago. They were born and bred in Wellington, Kansas, and have never set foot outside it. I do not mean to imply that Wellington is anything but a fine American community, but the difficulty of laying a musical in such a place must be apparent to everyone here.

"And then there was the problem of action. Aside from the marital didoes mentioned earlier, the lives of Heffernan and Schwartz were a study in dullness. They never did anything but go down to the railroad station every evening and watch the 6:12 go by. When the 6:12 was taken off the run in 1935, Heffernan and Schwartz went to the station every evening and just stared at the tracks.

"But all these problems were trifling—trifling, I say, gentlemen—compared to our big problem. All of these things paled and shrivelled before our chief obstacle—Heffernan & Schwartz only wrote one song.

"I am not here tonight to blow my own horn. It is no credit to me alone that 'The A. M. Heffernan-Ralph Schwartz Story' turned out to be a successful biopic, but to the brains and ingenuity of my entire organization, save the legal department. But I am not seeking praise for my organization either. I have told you this story tonight for one purpose only: to stiffen the spines of those among us who are flagging in their faith. Gentlemen, I have proved it and I urge you to adopt it as your watchword: You can get a biopic out of anybody."

A First for Everything

Billy Reardon, longtime host at the Stork, is now dittoing at the Rainbow Room, which the Union News Co. operates in Rockefeller Center along with its several other restaurants. Reardon, a former dancer now on the executive end of managing niteries, was struck by his experience last New Year's Eve. Under the modified management, since the Rockefellers gave up direct operation of the Rainbow Room as a plush nitery, the spot folds at 9 p. m., and for New Year's Eve they stayed as late as almost 10.

"For the first time in my adult life of 31 years," observed Reardon, "I thus found myself neither kicked nor kissed in a saloon on New Year's Eve." (He's either had to face an occasional alcoholic fracas when it wasn't a sentimental clinch).

It's Still Showmanship

Vet Film Adman Reappraises How the Pix Biz Did A Buckle-Down-Winsocki, Rolled Up Its Ballyhoo Sleeves, With Clicko End Results

By CHARLES EINFELD

This was the year! Life gave us a chilly look, Look gave us new life, conservative Wall Street investment houses recommended motion picture stocks, TV moguls grew grey over the failure of view- to turn handsprings over the opening o the new season, and Movietime USA left a trail of glamor through cities and villages ss the country.

The kind of thinking that led to Movietime and has actuated the idea for subsequent annual star tours is far from unconnected with the above phenomena. Movietime is, after all, only one figment of a dawning stream of consciousness that leading the film business to an improved boxoffice. A beginning has been made. We are recovering clarity of We are becoming showmen again some of us under the stress of unpleasant handwriting on the wall. And it's still showmanship, right down the line, that gives our product the push it deserves.

For a while there was a tendency to sit there like the cobra, hypnotized, swaying side to side while irrational fears played the snake-charmer's flute. We gazed, stupified with anxiety, at television, a sort of "little man upon the stair, gee I wish he'd go away" kind of thinking.

What's happening to TV? The N. Y. Times not long ago noted, "A faithful viewer can hardly help noticing that the general quality of TV offerings is on a downward trend." Commercials are killing it, while the picture business at least only sells entertainment, as a VARIETY editorial pinpointed.

What meanwhile has happened to movies in the past year? Time, more Luce-id than its sister magazine, conceded that the 1951 boxoffice was a "solid 10 to 15%" better than in 1950, while film rentals were reported up by a similar percentage. Production figures indicated 441 features in 1951, with 96, or 22%, in color; 1950 saw 376 full-length pictures, only 69, or 18% in color.

Qualitatively, the superiority of our industry's product is at a new high, and no title rundown is needed to know that productionwise, all studios have put teeth into the sometime-sniffed-at but nevertheless true slogan we coined at 20th-Fox, "Movies are better than ever." An occasional "dog" will sneak out, but by and large, compared with any art form, whether of the mass communications field, or even in the fine arts, motion pictures can point to a larger proportion of winners for the number of starters.

Once the picture has been produced, however, showmanship takes over. The extra push placed behind a picture brings in greater grosses. For, while there is a large audience available for fine pictures, people must be stimulated to enter the theatres.

Consider, for example, any big grosser. In addition to its merits as a screen attraction, one of the chief factors behind success is the hard work and effort by exhibitors that go into its selling.

Feeling that there never had been sufficient emphasis on public relations throughout all the branches of our industry, we initiated an experiment at our Los Angeles national sales convention last June. At that time, we conceived the unique idea of merging the distribution staff with the adpub department. The sales force, in short, was charged with aiding the exhibitor in selling his wares to the public.

This called for more than the mere settling of playdates, bookings and contracts. It rallied the active support of each division and branch manager, salesman and booker to help the theatre man sell his product. Both the distributor and exhibitor gain by this extra effort, but the exhibitor most of all. He is sustained in planning his campaign by the thought that each satisfied—and pre-sold—customer will bring others. To date, this novel merger has proved highly successful.

Planning is of prime importance in every human realm, and showmanship is no exception to the rule. Without planning, no audience is built up. Without planning, no habit has been created which will lead to community support of a theatre at times when the crop of pictures may turn out to be less healthy than at others.

Correct planning uses psychology, and like most sciences, uses facts which are so simple we often overlook them. There is no mystery about showmanship; it lies in our will to apply that same ingenuity and inspiration which has made the film industry one of the great instruments of good will over the years.

A picture will attain the prominence it deserves when that one precise ingredient which distinguishes it—whether sex, action, suspense or something else—is correctly spotted and used as the focus of pre-selling. A typical campaign can be reduced to the statement, "Here is what is in this picture." By thus selecting the proper emphasis in our advertising and promotion, we will bring in the right audience. And—you'd be surprised how many times this first principle is overlooked—there is a proper audience for every picture made. It's just up to us to utilize our resources properly to reach it.

Principles no more complex than this have backgrounded the various efforts showmen in America have made during the past few years to unite in a common effort to bring more people into our theatres. These are the principles which have made our theatres the first source of entertainment for millions of people seeking relaxation.

Today, when the "extra" we provide so often is remembered, programming at a theatre must be considered part and parcel of showmanship, so long as getting moviegoers to the boxoffice in a steady stream remains our goal. Such items as selection of the right short subjects, proper playdating, and timing the program so that people can attend at reasonable hours, are all important in good public relations and the intelligent operation of theatres.

The physical plant itself must always be considered part of our approach. As showmen, we must see to it that the same glamor caught on the screen is applied to the showcases of our product, both inside and out. We are competing at the present time with the comforts of home, and the television set, so it is doubly important to make the theatre a more inviting place to visit than it has ever been before.

All these points are part of the vital lesson showmen must never forget. Continued complacency spells retrogression. Pictures must not go out on their own without benefit of showmanship effort.

It would be a pity to waste the potentialities of our magnificent product by failing to make every person aware of its quality. Without showmanship, without the spark necessary to set this entertainment afire in the minds and hearts of the public, we are dealing only with so many pieces of celluloid. The best defense in war and showmanship is an aggressive offensive. Yes, it's still showmanship!

Cost Cut Leaves WB With Small Net Tho Gross Off

Slash picture budgets and operating costs left Warner Bros. with only a small drop in profits for the year ending last Aug. 31 despite a slide of $10,000,000 in gross. Figures were disclosed last Friday (28) in company's report for the fiscal year.

Net after taxes for the 12 months was $9,427,000 as compared with $10,271,000 for the parallel period ending Aug. 30, 1950. During 1951, $9,100,000 was provided for Federal taxes and $700,000 for contingent liabilities. For the 1950 fiscal year, taxes took $6,300,000 and contingent liabilities, $850,000.

Fruit of WB policy of buying up its own common is seen in the equivalent per-share earnings for 1951 as against 1950. Despite the drop in overall net, past year's earnings were equivalent to $1.67 per share as against 1950's $1.46. That's because there were only 5,619,785 shares outstanding at the end of fiscal 1951, in contrast to 6,977,300 at the end of fiscal 1950.

Film rentals, theatres admissions, sales and other items going to make up gross income totalled $116,909,000 for 1951 as against $126,944,000 for 1950.

As a result of examination by reps of the Internal Revenue Bureau, company has adjusted its fixed assets account and related depreciation reserves at Sept. 1, 1950. Accordingly, the sum of $3,768,000 has been restored to the asset account and an additional $1,000,000 has been provided for Federal income taxes for the prior year. This has resulted in an increase of $2,768,000 in earned surplus which sum is not included in the earnings for the year as shown above.

CHARLOTTE GREENWOOD SEASON'S GREETINGS

Can't All Be Blockbusters, But 'A' or 'B' Every Pic Must Be Sold

By JAMES R. GRAINGER
(Executive V. P., Republic Pictures)

I don't agree that only "big" pictures do business. In my opinion, the picture that does business, whether it a so-called blockbuster or not, is the one which has the entertainment value to which the public responds. We are all well aware of the fact that many pictures produced at lesser costs have rolled up excellent grosses.

J. R. Grainger

While I feel that the industry always needs some outstanding pictures as a "shot in the arm," we must take into consideration that theatres must have a steady flow of product to keep their screens occupied, and every picture can't be a "blockbuster." All the producing companies together barely make 52 outstanding pictures in that category. And I repeat, budgets alone don't make big pictures. Republic intends to produce a number of what are popularly known as "borderline" pictures, aiming, of course, for that popular appeal which spells boxoffice. Not at all incidentally, this type of picture helps to develop those new personalities which are always badly needed in this business.

I believe that television eventually will prove a boon to the motion picture industry, but when, I hesitate to prophesy. However, I don't believe that television will eliminate the so-called fringe theatres.

For the past 30 years we have been hearing plenty of complaints from exhibitors, but some of my best friends are exhibitors and I am happy to note that they are all waxing rich, driving Cadillacs, and going to Miami. Seriously, I sometimes wonder if exhibitors will ever be satisfied with a fair profit on their investment. I have stated before that exhibition has always been the most profitable end of the motion picture industry, and that situation always seems to be forgotten when there is an opportunity to denounce distributors and sales policies. Whenever an exhibitor has a legitimate squawk, I think I try to be fair about it; but wholesale denunciation is another thing.

That Personal Contact

I don't think that distribution is headed toward any streamlining. For the past 25 years there has been talk of centralization of shipping but nothing has ever come of it. I think that in this, as in every other industry, the salesmen who represent it must keep in close contact with their customers. I don't think you can sell pictures by mail. As far as Republic is concerned, we have always tried to maintain a close liaison with exhibitors, and we feel that this has real value in determining the kind of product we schedule. Theatremen are the link between the audience and the distributor, and we always try to take advantage of their ability to gauge public interest and taste.

During the year 1951 my records show that I have been away from New York 161 days, during which I traveled throughout the country, visiting our branch managers and talking with our customers.

I think that the future of the motion picture business is very healthy, notwithstanding the crepe-hangers who are always complaining. Quite a few of the difficulties which some theatres are experiencing are the result of their own showmanship inactivity. Running a theatre is a ballyhoo operation. It seems ironic to me that so many of the basic ideas initiated by showmen have been adopted and maintained at a high level by other industries, while so many exhibitors seem to have forgotten that this business was built on showmanship.

Republic has always been a firm advocate of the type of promotion used for "Movietime USA." For many years we have been bringing stars to the public through personal appearance tours and in connection with premieres. During the past few years, we have intensified our policy and have had some outstanding premieres involving th presence of stars in civic celebrations. A recent case in point is our very good premiere Omaha, with the Governor of the state, the Mayor of Omaha, and many other high civic dignitaries joining Hollywood contingent in tribute to the Air Force and General Curtis LeMay of the Strategic Air Command. Republic brought not only star of the picture but other "name" personalities to this premiere, and their activities on behalf of civic, patriotic, and charitable drives certainly helped to build good-will for the industry.

An all-important necessity for the success of the motion picture industry enthusiasm. The thought is certainly not new, but it rates repetition. We're in an exciting business, and we mustn't get so caught up in mechanics that we forget its opportunities. Every single picture produced is a challenge to all the people connected with its production, and to every person who touches upon it in distribution and exhibition.

'Let's Get Hopping'

By MAURICE BERGMAN

Gloom never had a long run in our business. Every once in a while it has a world premiere, and then peters out. This sort of proves that we are optimists by nature.

In the past year smiles started to replace frowns. A simple reason could be given for this metamorphosis. Business picked up, mainly because there were more good pictures and more enthusiasm displayed in their promotion.

It has always been my contention that crisis is the backbone of our business. Give us a good crisis and we rally around the problem. We have always proved that problems stimulate us, unite us and make us all pull together.

For that reason, strange to say, a boom is a dangerous thing for us. Give us a stretch of good business and, instead of working harder, we become indifferent. This happened during the war years. Then one day we woke up and found ourselves in a depression.

This was a blessing. It caused the birth of COMPO. Now that conditions are better, we are apt to neglect COMPO. If anyone is interested, I have compiled ten points that might be kept in mind during the upturn. Here they are, for free!

1. Spend a little time each day thinking about next month.

2. Cultivate our own backyard a little more. In other words, save our speeches and mind our own business.

3. See a few more movies. They're fun, and they help us to find out a little more about our business.

4. When we have ideas to improve the business, send them to COMPO.

5. Leave technical discussions to the experts. Let's be showmen rather than oracles.

6. Let's think a little more about advertising and, as business improves, let's spend more for pr motion rather than less. Let's try to stimulate and enlarge the good market rather than wait for a bad one.

7. Let's have more action and less meetings. The latter take a lot of time that could be better spent. If we must have these meetings, let's make the participants come prepared. This will eliminate irrelevancies.

8. Let's work on the theory that all pictures are boxoffice until proven otherwise.

9. If we personally dislike picture, let's keep this opinion to ourselves. The public may like it.

10. Finally, let's try to train young folks in all branches of our business. Let's build for the future.

So there!

Maybe That 'Lost' Pix Audience Only Has Been Mislaid

By ABE MONTAGUE

(Sales V. P., Columbia Pictures)

Everything considered, it's been a pretty good year. We've had better—but we've had worse, too. The boxoffice came to life, slumped, then picked up again. That ole devil Television doesn't seem quite so ferocious from where we sit this year as it did a year ago. The quality of product has improved. The plaintive wail of the anguished exhibitor has diminished to a mere moan. Yes, everything considered, it's been a pretty good year.

Abe Montague

One thing made 1951 a little different. More than any other year I remember, this past year was a year for big pictures. The big ones did business, lots of business. "Caruso," "Show Boat," "David and Bathsheba," "Born Yesterday" were all that any distributor (or any exhibitor, for that matter) could want. In this lies our comfort, our solace, our strength and our weakness. All we need now is a string of big pictures.

You see, it's the less-than-top-level efforts that are the backbreakers. And in 1951, this was pointed up more forcefully than ever. National grosses on second features slipped noticeably. Even more marked was the dropoff in business done by the "nervous A's," the "pretty good" pictures. What happened at that level was sheer murder. For this, too, we all shall remember 1951.

And yet, I am as convinced as ever that the pattern of our industry need not and cannot change materially. There is still a demand for second features. It is smaller, perhaps, than it used to be. Or maybe there are more second features. But the demand is still there.

Bad Pix Unintended

I am convinced, too, that no one in Hollywood sets out deliberately to make a bad picture. Not all books are successful, nor all plays. In any form of creative effort there must be a variable factor. And therein lies that mysterious, intangible, ephemeral, elusive, wonderful quality called "boxoffice."

Columbia had an interesting example of this during the aforementioned 1951. We released a little opus called "Pick Up," produced on the Coast by Hugo Haas at a cost that no self-respecting second feature would care to whisper. But this one had it. It took some doing, but it wound up playing top-half throughout the country. And we wound up spending as much on advertising as the producer spent in negative cost. But we also wound up with a domestic gross equal to most top-bracket, top-budget pictures.

If this can still happen in our industry, the honeymoon is not yet . There's still a chance for the producer with an idea, the distributor with a "gimmick," the exhibitor with the drive to put it over.

It brings to mind a fellow I know who has just built a theatre outside one of our big cities. The area he chose needed another theatre like I need another head. In the 8-mile area immediately adjacent to the new house, there were 22 other theatres of various sizes and odors.

All the industry's best brains told my friend that he was crazy. He listened carefully—and then went right ahead. He built a fine theatre. The best projection, the best sound, the most comfortable seats, the most modern lighting—and the best pictures he could get. Then he set about selling himself and his new theatre to the surrounding communities.

The results surprised even him. His opening week gross was about twice as much as he expected. His second and third weeks held right up to the same level. And business has continued to flood in past the time where novelty alone can be credited with the revenue. And, peculiarly, the opposition was not seriously hurt.

This, then, was primarily new business. These were patrons who had tired of shabby theatres, poor projection, muddy sound, dirty rest rooms, parking problems, unimaginative bookings. These were people who had fled to television for their entertainment and found it wanting. They were hungry for an opportunity to return to the movies—if they could do it in comfort and with an assurance of courteous, respectful treatment.

The "lost" audience, I'm convinced, is not really lost; it's just been mislaid. If as much thought would be paid to showmanship to get the public back to the theatre as has been used to merchandise candy and popcorn, I am sure greater numbers of people would be attending our theatres. We've forgotten that we're not just in an ordinary business—we're in show business!

I still believe—and I will always believe—that good pictures, properly presented, will bring the "lost" audience back a-runnin'—all with money clenched in their hot little fists.

I hope that a year from now, we will be able to point to signal achievements in this direction.

But as for 1951, everything considered, it was a pretty good year.

Paramount Distrib Chief Admits TV Competition But Not Extermination

By A. W. SCHWALBERG

My feeling about television is like that of the man who was frightened by a ghost until he discovered that it was only a figment of his fancy. Television itself is, of course, real, but the fears it has engendered in the past are, like the ghost, nonexistent.

Al Schwalberg

Recently, sitting in the office of a friend, I noticed on the wall a framed picture representing the Colosseum at the height of its glory. In the ring, the ancient Roman version of a circus was in progress, and the stands were packed; the Latin equivalent of the SRO sign was undoubtedly posted beside the boxoffice.

Because my mind was on business I remarked absently, "You know, no matter what the period in history, people liked to get out of their homes and go places."

Moving forward several thousand years in time, I visited a friend recently on a Saturday afternoon. He tuned in his television set to a football game in the midwest. It was snowing — not television's "snow" but the real thing—the temperature was in the low twenties, the field was covered with a glaze of ice, the skies were leaden and forbidding . . . and there were 45,000 howling rooters in the stands, and to me, in defiance of all common sense, and having a whale of a good time.

People like to get out of their homes and go places.

We cannot deny that television represents a real competition to motion pictures, and we ought not to try. Yes, it is competition, but also, let us remember, are automobiles, parks, beaches, concerts, libraries, books. We have survived and prospered all these years in the midst of competition, and we shall go on doing so. Is there any business in the universe that has the field all to itself?

I recall, last summer, getting an enthusiastic telephone call from an exhibitor. He was elated because, the previous Sunday, it had rained and his previous Sunday's business had doubled. It occurred to me—once more—that although the rain kept the people away from the beaches, it didn't keep them in.

Television? Yes, it represents competition, not a threat. Competition is the spice of business life. It is something we can cope with, something we are coping with—successfully. And one major factor in the makeup of human beings is on our side. The people who sat in the ancient Colosseum are no different than the people who sit in a modern movie theatre—they like to get out of their homes and go places!

Need Scientific Programming to Buck The 13,000,000 'Theatres' in the Home

By AL LICHTMAN

Distribution Chief, 20th-Fox

There is a positive new feeling on the part of the public. A demand for substance and quality in its film entertainment. The American filmgoer no longer buys pictures because they move, he wants them to say something as well as depict something that is part of his life or hope for the future. This in no way decries escapist entertainment. All entertainment is escapist in its attempts to draw the public away from the monotony of its existence. But all entertainment must be fresh, novel in its approach, and dressed in new and exciting trappings.

Al Lichtman

We are competing with 13,000,000 theatres in the home these days, but the public is still interested and anxious to buy quality entertainment of substance and importance.

Cheap merchandise put out to pull the public in before it gets over its initial sales shock doesn't pay off any more, and Hollywood is fast realizing this fact.

The fringe media, nibbling away at the boxoffice dollar, or giving the public something for nothing, are only accepted when our theatres cannot top them with superior merchandise. The real shoppers, however, those who want their recreation plus quality, are ready to become permanent fixtures at our boxoffices and maintain the picture-going habit.

Right now musicals, novelties, historical films, spectacles—and those pictures that have something to say are the boxoffice favorites. Made with understanding and taste, these films receive their final incentive when properly merchandised to the public. The in-betweeners get nowhere. All roads no longer lead to the theatre boxoffice as the single source of mass entertainment. Our weapon is the extra something that rises above competition.

Something for nothing will always attract the apathetic pleasure-seeker, but even he can get tired of seeing the same thing week in and week out.

Look over the list of films doing business today—"David and Bathsheba," "Desert Fox," "An American in Paris," "Streetcar Named Desire," "Quo Vadis," "A Place in the Sun"—all meeting the entertainment needs and demands of the public. Many others, unfortunately, can't stand up to "Giveaway Entertainment."

Those Duals—Again

There is a big evil in our system, when it forces us to produce a great many ordinary pictures to support the double feature bill. The overall effect is that the ordinary product tends to leave the public with the feeling that all pictures are mediocre, thus destroying the reputation of the many films coming from Hollywood every week.

Certainly, with the economic picture not as rosy as it was six or seven years ago, we are hurting ourselves by not producing a steady stream of top quality films because of factors which we can cure within our own field.

A major deterrent to maximum realization on our pictures is spacing of playdates. Too many theatres are showing the same picture simultaneously, depriving the public of selection when it goes in search of film entertainment. Once a picture has been robbed of its potential by excessive competition with itself, it disappears and a great segment of our audience is lost, deprived of the opportunity to ever see the film. This is a constant complaint, which has been presented to and by exhibitors countless times. The paradox is that all exhibitors agree that the situation should be corrected, but no one wants to make the first move. "Let the other fellow move back" is the answer.

There are other factors to consider in channeling our potential into the theatre. Making it easier to attend pictures is an important item on our sales agenda. The problems of baby sitters, parking, poor timing of shows, and programming are things within our reach for correction.

The other day, I received a letter from an exhibitor friend who operates in Philadelphia. I think a great many people in our industry would be interested in his approach to the programming problem and its ramifications.

Better Balance

He suggested, first off, one quality feature running approximately an hour and a half in length. With this feature, he would show a 30-minute featurette; a short subject of public interest along the theme of tolerance, religion, patriotism, etc.; a one-reel cartoon; and a newsreel.

This program is worthy of deep consideration for many reasons. For one thing it does much to eliminate the double feature evil, as well as provide a show of suitable length with a variety of entertainment.

Of major importance is the concept of scientific programming embodied in the plan. For example, if the feature were a drama, the featurette and remainder of the program would tend to be in a much lighter vein, and vice versa. If the feature had its strongest appeal to women, then the rest of the show would provide subjects of special interest to men in an attempt to give the entire program wide appeal.

Key to the idea would be th sale of the feature and featurette as a package, so that there would be complete control of the program in its entertainment and artistic sense, thus eliminating much of the burden of the exhibitor's booking and buying problems.

With such an idea Hollywood's producers might be given considerable more freedom to concentrate their best efforts on fewer features with greater quality.

Constant feeding of the theatre, with more and more films to satisfy the double feature evil, has been extremely detrimental to our business. The production of featurettes, such as outlined above, might uncover numerous fresh entertainment ideas currently not suitable for feature length treatment, as well as provide a training ground for acting and production talent for the future.

If motion picture exhibitors expect to once again recapture the lost audience and do a substantial week in and week out business, I urge that they give sincere and earnest consideration to this problem of programming and spacing of product. Without these two factors we are vitiating the potential worth of our merchandise, and doing a disservice to the public and ourselves by not letting all segments of the population enjoy our wares.

We have seen our industry rise and fall, weathering storms, hurdling obstacles, meeting all boxoffice inroads. Application of new merchandising ideas, fresh production methods and sound programming is our great armament of the future.

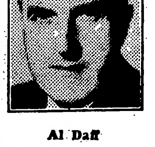
It's a Small World

By ALFRED E. DAFF

(Universal's World Sales Chief)

It's a small world and it is getting smaller.

As I travel my hundred odd thousand air miles each year, in the interests of Universal-International, this fact is brought home to me more strongly than ever. In addition to covering 31 branch offices in the U. S., I met our sales executives and managers in the whole of the Eastern Hemisphere, Australia and New Zealand. On the side I have made several trips to London and the Continent. Certain observations, therefore, may be in order.



Al Daff

First of all, I am just as certain as ever that our customers are the same the world over. Secondly, I am sure that the problems the industry face are practically the same everywhere:

1. Sufficiently good product for the mass audience.

2. Strategic planning of advertising and promotion on behalf of the entire industry.

I say this because the recent so-called decline in the American business was played up very strongly by opposition interests, and the trade generally, in practically every country abroad, and whether it be in Europe, China, Buenos Aires, or anywhere else, people like to be on the side of a victor. They like to be part of a success, and dependence on American product in foreign countries makes it necessary for the industry, in the U. S., to be successful in all its ramifications.

Confidence is a prime factor in our dealings in America and abroad. Confidence in our pictures and the future of our industry, and it is because of the facts outlined above, that I strongly emphasize whenever I have the opportunity to urge the extension of COMPO and Movietime U. S. A. to embrace foreign countries, so that common problems can be attacked on a global as well as a local level. I know of no better format than that of Movietime U. S. A.

In our own company we have seen and derived the benefits of a global point of view.

We have coordinated our selling efforts and devices.

We have picked up good ideas from foreign countries, and exported American ideas in the selling of pictures as well as the actual pictures.

Our foreign offices and our domestic departments have all benefited from promotion ideas originating elsewhere in the world.

The U. S., nor any other country, holds any patterns or monopolies on creative ability and original ideas. There may be differences due to many factors, but the ultimate results and benefits can be the same.

I have expounded the theory that our industry survives on new ideas, or new twists to old ideas, and Universal has delved into the past and learned a lot, even though our thinking is aimed directly at the future.

We are constantly emphasizing the necessity of delivering the message of motion picture entertainment directly into the home. We have deplored the lack of the use of heralds and direct mailing pieces. We have tried to encourage a greater use of this medium, because it is our firm belief that the very thing on which our industry was developed, will preserve it—the family trade.

The selling of motion pictures institutionally is of vital importance. It is necessary from a good public relations point of view, but at no time do we in Universal-International think that the selling of each motion picture on its merit can be replaced by good institutional advertising.

To keep the public interest alive we have to demonstrate that every visit to a motion picture theatre is a holiday, and to sell this, to the great world motion picture audience, is every exhibitor's and distributor's job.

It is fortunate for us all that more and more, in all parts of the world, there is an awakening to this simple fact. Therefore, everybody associated with distribution and exhibition should bring home this point as vigorously as their enterprising ingenuity and effort can command.

Give the Author Top Billing, It Even Helps the B.O.

By THEODORE PRATT

Boca Raton, Fla.

In line with the comeback of pictures (did they ever go away?) this is a report and suggestion for using authors in the exploitation of pictures. I don't mean screenwriters. I mean the authors of the original material, novel, factual book, or any material on which the picture is based.

Theodore Pratt

Heretofore this individual has been regarded mostly as an evil necessity, usually thought of as the raw ore from which fine metal is refined in the Writers' Bldg. over by Stage 6.

Occasionally a big-time author was used in minor ways, such as giving his name in the billing in letters as large as that of the screenwriter or almost the size of the producer and director. On an extremely few astounding occasions the author of a tremendous bestseller has been given top billing because the picture company thought his name would help to sell the picture. They were right.

Generally, of course, everyone knows the ancient joke about where the original book author fits in on the outdoor posters—down near where the dogs operate. In the percentages given for billing in the Hollywood pressbooks the traditional amount for the novelist from which the picture is taken is 10%, right at the bottom.

I don't say original authors in the past have been what might be called extremely helpful in cooperating with picture companies about the releases of films made from their stories. Some of them have come right out in cold print and called the pictures lousy. They have looked down upon Hollywood artistically. They have failed to see that there is anything in it for them after their book is paid for.

I contend that there is a good deal in it for them, and a good deal in it for the picture company, for such authors and such companies to adopt a program of mutual aid when even a fairly good picture is made from a book.

The first traditional viewpoint the picture company must overcome to get any result from this is to not be afraid that an original author might steal a few lines of mention from its contract stars. Break down and mention the original author a little more; it might bring more than a nickel back, as I intend to demonstrate.

The first mental (and emotional) hazard the author must overcome is taking creative brain in hand and kneading it hard to realize that a picture can be good even though it changes his story. This isn't so difficult to do if approached from the viewpoint that a novel has one technique of telling its story, while a film has another. Each can be good in its own way.

Each, above all, is a different medium. By the very fact of selling his book for a film an author should expect his story to be told in another manner.

Now we've got quite a remarkable proposition: The picture company and the author of the original book are being asked to cooperate with each other when the picture is released, for their mutual benefit.

Benefit? each screams. Mutual? Who used that dirty word? What benefit? Whose?

For Example

The only way I can illustrate this is to get personal. When three of my books were made into pictures I stood by when they were shown and had absolutely nothing to do with their exploitation or exhibition. When my books are published, on the other hand, I have a good deal to do with them, giving talks, radio broadcasts, and attending autographing parties.

Why not apply original author participation to the ising of a movie made from a book?

When my fourth book went to pictures, the opportunity came up to have a crack at this to see what might happen. The book was "The Barefoot Mailman" in current release by Columbia. When the picture company hired me to find the locations for the outdoor shooting I saw to it that this fact, with pictures of me on the search for same, appeared in the Florida newspapers, the scene of the work. This meant a good deal of publicity not only for the picture but for the book and also my other books.

When Columbia announced it was looking for another title for the picture I hopped in and fought the idea. I fought it seriously, getting the backing of many people and institutions in Florida, battling it out in the newspapers and slugging it out over the radio. I happened to win the fight to keep the book title. In the process everybody got a lot of mention. The public for the picture was built up more than ever. And more of my books were bought.

Around the time the picture is released, the end of this year, two more books of mine happen to be on the publishing horizon. One, "The Big Bubble," follows "The Barefoot Mailman" in locale; the second, "Handsome," an original paperback 35c. giant, is laid in the same section of Florida as the "hard" books. In the newspaper stories going out about these by myself and my publishers, and in the radio broadcasts I have arranged to make all over the state of Florida, the movie of "The Barefoot Mailman" is being given very generous mention; in fact, one-third of the 15-minute time is devoted to it, free to the picture company.

During this mention I am stating that, even though the picture does not keep exactly to the book, it is still a good, exciting picture. I explain to the lay public why it is necessary to change and cut an original novel. Most of the diehards who are enthusiastic over the book and look down upon "movies ruining it," I think, will be won over by my sincere explanation. They won't go around running down the picture and hurting its business.

Columbia has seen the wisdom and value of this by asking me to make a special recording of my remarks about the picture. They are sending platters of this to their exchanges and distributors around the country for use in spot radio announcements at first showings of the film. They allowed me to mention my new books in this announcement.

In this way everybody is helped.

Columbia and I plan to carry our love-fest even further, making some experiments. At openings in Florida, I am going to be invited to be present. Booksellers will be allowed to sit in theatre lobbies with a stock of my books, including the one being shown in the theatre, and myself on hand with pen in hot fist to autograph copies purchased.

This will attract attention to both film and books. None of it will damage word-of-mouth advertising of the picture.

Pictures and authors of books from which they are made have nothing in common during the release of the picture? Boys and girls, unless I'm very much mistaken the extra business that will be done by "The Barefoot Mailman" directly due to the above cooperative work will easily equal the amount paid to me for the book. And the extra business my various books will do because of the opportunity of plugging them as per the above will be worth far more than the effort involved both by myself and the picture company.

All this, to me, is merely one small facet in the business opportunities being overlooked by the picture and bookselling industries at the point where they meet.

Lesson in Economics

It happened many years ago, in Toledo. Joe Laurie, Jr., was on the bill with me and I confided to him that a certain party was always wiring me for money and always had pleas in his wire that I just couldn't resist. I showed him the wire I received that week, "Must have $200 as my father has to have both legs amputated." I knew it was a phoney, but also felt that if I didn't send it for such a purpose I would never forgive myself. Joe read the many wires for money this party would send me every week and also thought it was a phoney. So he wrote out a wire, "Sending you $100; just have one leg amputated. That's all I can afford right now."

It was Joe who told me how to save my money. "Get a casher's check every week and send it to the bank," said he. I never had a bank account in my life, so I took Laurie's advice, bought cashier's checks every week and opened an account in a N. Y. bank. The funny part was when I got to N. Y. I kept buying cashier's checks and deposited them in my bank. I thought that's the only way you could deposit money in the bank. I have learned a lot since then. Years later when I met Joe again and reminded him that it was he that started to save my money, he said, "Belle, I owe you an apology. For years when I met you I thought you were wearing falsies and all the time you were carrying double grouchbags full of cashier's checks!"

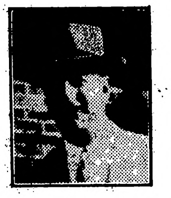
The Lawyerin' Of Hezekiah Isaiah Ezekial

By JULIAN T. ABELES

(Attorney for Motion Picture, Broadcasting and Music Publishing Interests)

There was Asa, the knowingest young un in the whole of Catfish Creek, Arkansas, yet the boy never heard tell his family name. Since time immortelle, generation after generation had peeped at the light of day, and somehow managed to survive, in that little one-room cabin a settin' on the top-most craig of the Ozark Mountains. In all their dragged-out years the family had gone and spread out so that genealogy had just come to mean nothin' at all. Got so none of the more recent of the clan knew what twig, much less what branch, of the family tree they might be hangin' on. Being as it was, Asa's maw couldn't no-how recollect if Asa were a Nehemiah or a Ashtoreth. For as she was wont to say, "Our hog Azariah hain't got no family name and he's sure like unto the rest of our men folk, when they're not a sleepin' all they're a doin' is a chawin' and a gruntin'." So it mattered none what until along came the day I'll be a tellin' you 'bout.



Julian T. Abeles

Phi Beta Kappa of Catfish Creek

Now, as I was a sayin', Asa warn't second to none 'round them there parts when it came to knowin' a thing—or maybe two, although I gotta admit any other habitant of Catfish Creek might well have raised claim to a photo finish. On account of Asa being the smart one he'd been serving his apprenticeship in his uncle Jered Nehemiah's white mule distillery. This enterprise had its situs right smack on Catfish Creek, this being the namesake of Asa's homestead. Uncle Jered took care of production and Asa messed around with distribution and sales. Of course, in very damp weather, when Aunt Hoshea had a bad case of the misery, Uncle Jered had to put on extra help in his department. The resultant beverage was dispensed at two bits a jug to them that had a design for livin', and four bits for five jugs to them that warn't gonna be round much longer.

As to them that did their consuming on the premises, Asa would drag the body to the edge of the craig and give it a shove down the mountain side for no additional charge. Because of this special service Uncle Jered's emporium became the Stork Club of Catfish Creek's cafe society. Now Asa's principal, or perhaps I should rightly say sole, attribute was that in figurin' two bits out of four bits likely as not he would make the right change. And as for the four-bit customers it was more than an even chance that he would not make the mistake of giving change for a silver dollar. Yes, I must say, that Asa was the only one in them parts of the hills that had a born knack of figurin'. He didn't need to have any concern about paper money, as how he made it a point of refusin' to be taken in with any of that Northern "inmatashun stuff." For as he went and said, "Warn't no different from any of them other Sunday funny papers ceptin' they goes and puts their president's pitture on it and gets them there ignorant Northerners to think that makes it worth sumptin'. One of my grandpappies got himself a trunk full of that kind'a paper, that's even got Jeff Davis' pitture on it and it even warn't no good for nothin' at 'tall, so how come that thar Northern trash gonna be any good for sumpin'."

The White Mule Kicks the Traces

Well, I done said Asa been a servin' his apprenticeship at the source of Uncle Jered's liquid white hybred. Been a servin't what I said 'cause there came a part of a day there warn't no Uncle Jered to be a servin' any more. It was on account of a very damp season that business got so durned tootin' good Uncle Jered went and threw capacity to the winds. And that's just where Uncle Jered went and gone. They say he was mighty deaf like, but ain't much doubt he heard that sound-off, and least he sure felt it, for there he was right in the middle of it. Many a one in them parts opened wide his mouth to get one on the house, as a whole still full of Uncle Jered's flying mule came through the air like a cloudburst.

Many in the valley were want to say as how all hell let loose when the devil came to claim his nearest kin. There war'nt much doubt of Uncle Jered's eventual destination, but he sure was a headin' in the wrong direction. The way Uncle Jered was a'sailin upward there warn't any doubt he'd been booked on this cruise for a "how-ya!" to St. Peter.

Inhabitants therebouts make talk that one drink of Uncle Jered's beverage was just as liable as not to go and blow your top off. No wonder then a still full of it went and blew the whole mountain top off. I ain't never been much for them proverbs, in particular the one 'bout all that goes up is shore to be a 'cummin' down. For Uncle Jered went plenty up all right but nothin' ever came down that resembled Uncle Jered. In fact, seemed sort of shameful like to be a wastin' all that funeral money on a little dirt, some of his kin folk said looked sorta like the kind they'd seen on Uncle Jered.

Well it warn't long after the smoke had blown away, along with Uncle Jered, that there was reason to want to know if Asa were a Nehemiah or a Ashtoreth. It came about this way. That part of Uncle Jered's land that didn't go along with him had the reparian rights to Catfish Creek. This particular creek abounds with its namesake, which imparted to its waters that delightful poignant scent and taste of the specie. Being as how that odor of catfish would be wafted by the mountain breezes for miles around, even total strangers in them parts needed no neon sign to guide them to Uncle Jered's source of supply.

This creek water was one of the principal ingredients of Uncle Jered's concoction. It was the secret formula, handed down from generation to generation, that gave Uncle Jered's hoary mule that rare and distinctive flavor—that any cigaret manufacturer would give his eye teeth for. Then again, them catfish sure did rid them parts of everything that even faintly resembled anyone of the rodent family.

Now, if it could be that Asa were a Nehemiah, the boy would be a comin' into this priceless heritage. That's how come my ideal, the illustrious Hezekiah Isaiah Ezekial, be a lawyerin' for Asa's birthright. Comes the day of the trial and I 'tends court with Hezekiah as I was want to do. He always said I was his left hand—bein' as how he was right-handed. The State's Attorney had the dire misfortune to be pitted against Hezekiah, which came about bein' as how if Asa couldn't rightly prove himself then the state was gonna lay claim to the land.

The first witness called by the state was the most ancient female I was ever want to see. I've heard tell 'bout that man Alexander who got one "great" degree because of something or other he went and did. Well, this old lady must a went and done plenty more than Mr. Alexander, for all the "greats" you had to wade through before you got to the "grand-maw" part of her title.

She goes and testifies, under the proddin' of the state's attorney, as how Asa much resembled the Ashtoreth side of the family with his very low' flat forehead and that insipid grimace. But then Hezekiah scored a'plenty when she goes and says that the Ashtoreths couldn't no-how lay any exclusive claim to these here distinguishing attributes, being as how all the Nehemiahs had the self-dame blessings betsowed upon them. For as she spoke out, this family heritage had always come in right handy like, when you had to go and assort your young uns from the rest of the broods at the family get-togethers. Then she goes on to tell as how the young un that was want to play down by the creek with Azariah, the family hog offspring, was certain to be the Nehemiah they was a seekin' for.

Well could she recollect as how them two urchins would romp 'round, and ever so often Azariah'd goes and pokes in the creek after one of them catfish. Says she how that hog loved anything that reeked of catfish, and when Uncle Jered made a batch of his brew, there would be a settin' Azariah gruntin' away while waitin' for the chance to lick around the pot after Uncle had filled the jugs—and them grunts sounded like the opening of an old drawbridge if Uncle Jered happened to overlook part of a batch in the bottom of the pot.

Greater Love Hath No Hog

Right then and there the Judge granted Hezekiah's request for an adjournment to "prepare his case." When the Court resumed, Hezekiah said as how his only witness would be the hog Azariah. The state's attorney bellows his objection on the ground that hog ain't fit for testifying. Thereupon, Hezekiah, in a broken voice, and with tears streaming down his face, relates 'bout when the Confederate flag bearer was shot down at the battle of Pole-cat Ridge and our noble army was retreating, Azariah's immortal sire grasped our beloved battle flag in his mouth and gave his life leading our troops to a glorious victory—how they buried him with full military honors and the flag on his breast—and erected a monument to his memory at the site of his momentous deed.

There was an agry murmur through the courtroom and if Hezekiah hadn't motioned them back, the Judge and Jury would have been in the fore of the state's attorney lynching party.

Well I don't need to say the objection went for nothin' at all. Hezekiah then signalled for the bailiff to open the courtroom door and in dashed Azariah. At first he ran straight for the judge's bench sniffling wildly, and then turned sharply and with a bleat of ear-splitting grunts bore down on Asa and started lickin' him from head to toe. Even them cold-blooded mountaineers were heard to sniffle—such affection the hog showed for that boy was far beyond all human comprehension—there could be no possible doubt that Asa was Azariah's childhood companion and the Nehemiah they was a'lookin' for. The jury rose as one man and gave their verdict for Asa, to the wild plaudits of the judge and spectators.

When we were a safe distance from the courthouse, Hezekiah turned to me, shaking his head, "When I prepared my case durin' the adjournment, by pourin' them jugs of Uncle Jered's catfish brew over Asa, I was plumb certain that hog would sniffle him out, but I done forgot 'bout the judge bein' as fond of that brew as the hog was, always keepin' a jug under his bench—boy it almost lost our case."

Barnum Was Right—From the Par Pic of the Same Name

Circus Bombast Best Ballyhoo—A Nod to Some Real Oldfashioned Tub-Thumping

By JEROME PICKMAN
(Ad-Publicity Veepee, Paramount Pictures)

In one way or another I've been promoting entertainment — for motion picture companies, live attractions and as newspaperman — for quite a number of years. During that time I've been very sure that every promotion was getting better and bigger; that with each new attraction, promotion and publicity men were coming up with bigger and better ideas of exploitation and selling.

Jerry Pickman

Sure, somewhere in the back of my mind I had a recollection of the great, legendary pressagents of the past—the Tody Hamiltons, Harry Reichenbachs, A. Toxen Worm and Dexter W. Fellows. I had heard of their memorable promotions, the selling slants they had devised, and their exploits in the ancient and honorable art of ballyhoo. But I must admit that I always had kind of a sneaking feeling that today we know how to do it better . . . until just now.

For now I've made a great "discovery"—that promotion as the old-time circus pressagents did it was good then, is still good today, and in all probability will be good in the future. I've spent the past couple of months steeping myself in the atmosphere of the circus, studying the way the circus was sold to the American public, and coming to realize that in the almost classic simplicity and unashamed frankness of its selling approach there is a directness of appeal and a power to convince which many more complex promotion approaches lack.

My interest in the way the old-time circus promoters operated was far more than merely academic. News may possibly have leaked out that Paramount has a picture called "The Greatest Show on Earth," which Cecil B. DeMille produced with the cooperation of the Ringling Brothers-Barnum & Bailey Combined Shows. The greater part of the picture was shot on location at the Ringling winter quarters in Sarasota, Fla., and during actual circus performances on nationwide tour.

In setting up the campaign for "Greatest Show on Earth," we began to study the old-time circus promotion methods, frankly skeptical, but still willing to see if there might be a "handle" or angle of approach which we might be able to adapt. And the deeper we got into the subject, the more clear it became that the traditional method of selling the circus to the public not only gave us our "handle," but provided the complete campaign slant for the picture—and set the pattern for future selling of many other pictures!

Audacious Adjectives

If you analyze the old-time circus approach, you find that all selling was via superlatives. Every act was the "biggest"; every performer the "most daring"; every spectacle the "most stupendous"; every animal the "most ferocious." During the days when many pressagents were turning into public relations counsellors (someone—I forget who—once described a public relations counsel as "a pressagent with spats"), it became fashionable to look with a little bit of scorn on this old-time routine. I don't know why. After all, in spite of the lavish use of superlatives, the selling pitch was fundamentally true and honest—the circus did present an impressive array of people; its stars did stunts the mere contemplation of which would send shivers down the spines of the average person; its menagerie did offer lions and tigers and gorillas and other fauna gathered from all over the world, beasts a great deal more ferocious and awe-inspiring than those with which audiences were familiar.

It seems to me that the show's success lay in the fact that—consciously or unconsciously — the flamboyant superlatives of the circus salesmanship actually did represent the flamboyant appeal of the circus itself. There was no attempt to go into involved, smart-aleck approaches; no searching for oblique salesmanship which sold indirectly; none of the "applied psychology" which some of us have tried to use on pictures in our search for some unusual method of selling. Here was selling which stemmed directly from the subject matter itself. And it sold!

At the risk of laboring the point, this same essential honesty in selling approach was used—and just as successfully—by the old-time theatrical touring company pressagents. What do you think would have happened to a pressagent who, to sell "Way Down East," developed the angle of the inexorable pressure of social and economic troubles? Any time a pressagent had this great old tearjerker to sell, he sold it by pulling out all the stops on the organ, making his audience weep in advance.

Here, it seems—and I think experience will bear it out—is the pattern which all entertainment selling has to follow if it expects to succeed. In every form of entertainment and in each individual show, picture, attraction or event, there is one basic, underlying theme. Successful promotion must operate much in the manner of a dissecting scalpel, peeling away all the excess embroidery with which the basic theme has been surrounded by story line, production or whatever. When the basic theme has been revealed, this is the selling appeal to be followed. It's as simple and as easily workable as that.

The circus has modernized itself repeatedly down through the years; it has changed and accommodated itself to circumstances and changing times. But in its simple, honest, frank, emotional appeal to the simple, honest and frank emotions of humanity, it has never changed. It has given audiences something solid to which they could cling; something which they instinctively recognized they could accept as honest and sincere. And audiences have always responded.

Motion pictures should profit by the proven success of this straightforward approach to salesmanship. Certainly in many a campaign all of us have spent time and energy looking for something to latch on to; maybe in our desire to find something "new" we have occasionally been guilty of overlooking the obvious value of the obvious approach. I feel that we have profited from the lessons we learned during our research into the old, traditional methods of circus selling. I think that what we have learned will help us not only in selling "Greatest Show on Earth," but many other pictures as well. At least, I hope so.

Chi's Ridge Asks 360G Of Majors in Trust Suit

Chicago.

Ridge Theatre, owned by Lasker Bros. in 1935-42, filed suit in Chicago Federal Court Thursday (27). House asks triple damages of $360,000, alleging the majors, Warner Bros. Theatres and Balaban & Katz conspired to prevent first-run product until 66 days after loop run.

Morris Kaplan and Sol Best, owners of the Indie Amo, on the same day asked for an injunction against National Screen, alleging firm won't sell trailers without posters and paper.

Seymour Simon attorneyed both suits for the plaintiffs.

Cause for Optimism

Minneapolis.

While business has been running behind the corresponding period in 1950, there's some cause for optimism among exhibs in this area. They say they've spotted a trek back to theatres away from home TV.

Theatremen report that the trend so far has been limited to children. Their hope, of course, is that it will spread to adult ticket-buyers.

OK B.O. Payoff Point of Selling

By PERRY LIEBER
(Studio Publicity Director, RKO Radio Pictures)

Hollywood.

When I was a kid I asked a neighbor who had a great reputation as a hunter what was the best way to hunt rabbits.

"Get yourself a good gun," he said, "learn to shoot, and go out looking for rabbits, where rabbits are apt to be."

During my hair-thinning years as a studio publicity director I've frequently been tempted to use the gun my neighbor suggested, for purposes other than rabbit shooting.

The man had something, however. Not only for hunting rabbits, but for bagging the movie buck. There are still plenty of entertainment dollars to be had, but in these days you've got to hunt them in their own spending ground. Otherwise, they'll wind up in the pot of some other business.

Good product is the first essential for successful movie dollar hunting, of course. You can't bag big grosses with duds for ammunition.

Granting that every picture produced in Hollywood can't be an epic guaranteed to shake the lettuce loose from the tightest wallet, we're getting strong, saleable pictures these days; the best entertainment values our industry has ever turned out. Naturally, the job of the studio publicity departments is to get the message of those values across to the entertainment shopping public.

It's a job we no longer can do by writing passionate essays about Flossie Floosey's taste in garters. The public may be interested in Flossie's garters, but if so, what it really wants to know is, does she show them in her new picture? It also wants to know a great deal more about Flossie's picture, like just what does it have besides garters to make it worth plunking down the price of a theatre admission.

A great deal can be done, and is done, to disseminate that sales information from Hollywood. Through the media of syndicated columns, wire news services and radio networks it is possible to keep a steady flow of interesting material on coming pictures and their stellar personalities reaching the cities and towns where those pictures will eventually play.

Through feature stories and art layouts to individual newspapers on home town personalities and subjects of local interest, it is possible to achieve an even more direct point of sale contact.

In these competitive days that's not enough. To do the job right, it's necessary to go hunting for movie boxoffice dollars in the cities and towns where they'll be spent.

Even New Faces Click

Do it with personalities wherever and whenever it is at all possible. They don't have to be big name personalities. We sent Margaret Sheridan, one of our contract actresses who has appeared in just one big picture, "The Thing From Another World," to Memphis and Atlanta recently, and what she did to theatre business in those cities is what I'd like to do with my bank account. The boxoffice upbeat continued after Miss Sheridan had departed, because the interest in, and good will for, Hollywood she inspired lingered on.

The bigger the names, of course, the bigger the draw. Shelley Winters and Farley Granger set Kansas City on a record breaking pix spending spree when they personally chaperoned the world premiere of "Behave Yourself!" there.

Jane Russell, Robert Mitchum and Vincent Price made the film theatre tills in New York, Philadelphia and Chicago look like mints when they appeared in those cities with "His Kind of Woman."

Tony Martin collected wampum and well wishes out of all proportion to the cost of the jaunts from appearances in New York, Cleveland and Houston with our "Two Tickets To Broadway." Eddie Bracken helped bring in a boxoffice bonanza with the same picture in San Francisco.

When film personalities come to town it creates excitement. It's a contagious excitement that reflects itself in long lines at theatre boxoffices, and pretty black figures in the account ledgers. I'm convinced that by hunting entertainment dollars right in their home haunts we've got the answer to any ill winds blowing our way.

Respect for the Printed Word

By HERBERT BAYARD SWOPE

I think it can be said, conservatively, that newspapers are here to stay! From the Acta Diurna (and that's not VARIETY slang) to the present hourly issues, they have survived imitations and eliminations.

No one can say just what their secret of longevity is. It may be due to the respect that we feel for the printed word. After all, it was the printed word which made us realize the nature of duty when we first studied our lessons in school. That reaction continues.

The newspapers have grown by taking advantage of all improvement, but radio and television, while capable of transmitting news, are certainly not included in newspaper mechanics. Far-seeing newspapers have protected themselves by becoming a part of the wireless world, and they will go further eventualy.

The next great change in newspapers will eliminate many of the costs of composition and practically all the cost—the enormous cost—of distribution. A master copy wil be broadcast from a central station and be received in your home on a recording machine, which will type the news as it comes through the air. When you reach your set in the morning a complete newspaper will be awaiting you.

Radio and television news has been on the timid side in the way of building up news enterprise and campaigns. They have been content to take the news as the papers or associations supply it. But that won't last long; as competition becomes keener, the press will be set a sterner task by the air and, paying good money for talent, the air will get the talent.

Circulation Comparisons

It will be interesting to mark the comparison of total circulation of newspapers with the total circulation of news on radio and television. The total circulation of morning and evening papers in the country is 53,829,072 daily. Radio and TV claim around 60,000,000 for their news. That number will grow. It costs nothing once you have a set in your home, and the material is selected for you—you don't have to beat your brains to decide what to read and then try to find it!

The one thing that the press has over the air is permanence, but that will be changed, and changed soon.

As to advertising: Experts say that the air is cheaper per circulation head than is the press. I am not sure that is yet a demonstrable thesis, but it will be—and before long. And more effective especially in color.

There is no stopping the progress of this art. I can recall not many years ago, when I was trying to run the N. Y. World, some of the newspaper owners and editors wanted to bar radio programs from the press. They even suggested that all reference to the radio be eliminated.

We were meeting in the Plaza Hotel. Moved by an inspiration, I went to the window and called my conferees to where I stood, asking them to look out at Central Park. The roads were jammed with automobiles. I said: "Not many years ago the revered city fathers passed a resolution forbidding automobiles in Central Park! What you have just seen is the answer to the absurdity of such a resolution as has been suggested."

It is still a good lesson to keep in mind. To coin a phrase, "You can't stop progress."

THE MORNING MAIL

By PAUL N. LAZARUS, JR.

Dear Sir:—

On March 31, the North Piltdown Center American Legion Post will dedicate its war memorial. The mayor, the town councilmen, the high school principal and other important local dignitaries will attend. We would appreciate it if you would send one or more Hollywood stars to attend the ceremony. We feel sure that this will be a good advertisement for your pictures and will result in your making many friends in North Piltdown Center. Advise who you are sending and when they will arrive . . .

Dear Spacebuyer:

According to an impartial survey just completed, Next Month Magazine gives you 12% better coverage of your 57-to-59 year old audience than any other publication in the field, including Life Magazine. Surely, you must realize the great importance of reaching this particular market . . .

Dear Committee Member:

On Thursday, at 12:30 p.m., at the Johnston office, we are holding an important meeting of the Committee to Consider the Use of 24-Sheets in Plugging Radio Spots. As your company's representative, it is imperative that you attend . . .

Dear Sir:—

As you probably know from your Sales Department, we are playing your picture "Mother Has a Breakdown" at the Strand Theatre, Newport, on March 7-8-9. Our normal advertising budget is $12.50 which covers trailers, heralds, and lobby displays. We suggest that a cooperative advertising campaign be placed in our local paper of $125. This will amount to about 1,000 lines. We will contribute an extra $12.50 to help defray the expense . . .

Dear Louse:—

I understand from a reliable source that all of your stars are Communists. How can you Hollywood people expect us 100% Americans whose ancestors fought and bled for this country of ours to put up with this. The rats. Unless you fire all these Reds immediately I for one will not go to any more movies. And I won't let any of my family go, either. And whomever of my many friends, too. The dirty rats . . .

Dear Committee-Member:

There will be a luncheon meeting of the Advertising & Publicity Committee Thursday at 12:30 to discuss ways and means. As your company's representative

Dear Joe:

Here at the Studio, we can't figure out what the trouble is with you guys in New York. We're making great pictures, important pictures, but they're evidently not being sold right. Take the last one, for instance, "The Son of Quo Vadis." The reviews in DAILY VARIETY and the others were great. You should have seen the cards we got at the sneak. It had to be a big grosser if it was properly handled. The first four engagements, however, were extremely disappointing despite the fact that several house records were broken. I suggest that you immediately prepare new ads and accessories stressing the mother-love angle instead of showing gangsters and machine-guns

Dear Joe:—

One of our exhibitor-accounts, Sophocles Smerch, from the town of South Northfield will arrive in New York Tuesday with his wife and five children. They would like to see "Guys and Dolls" on Friday night and "South Pacific" on Saturday night, if you can get seven good seats down front. If you can't, I guess "The King and I" would be all right, although Mrs. Smerch is most anxious to see "Guys and Dolls," since she's been told she looks like Isabel Bigley. Personally, I think she looks more like Sam Levene. Anyway, I will appreciate.

How to Become an Executive Without Thinking

By MAX E. YOUNGSTEIN

(Ad-Publicity V. P. of United Artists)

For the past ten years, I have heard a great deal of criticism leveled at the motion picture industry for its failure to train young executives. It is my fond hope that the blueprint set forth here will rectify this deficiency.

Max Youngstei

While intended primarily for advertising, publicity and exploitation directors, it is possible that, if properly used, it will create a few vice-presidents, and possibly one president. If the latter happens, I will be very touched indeed.

It is important at the outset to recognize the fact that there are four basic situations which must be handled by every advertising, publicity and exploitation director. I don't want to be overly enthusiastic, but with careful study I simply cannot resist betting that I will make at least v.p., or perhaps even a new company.

Situation No. 1: First Picture Screening

This situation generally opens with your being in the office in New York at 11 o'clock. You have just finished routing any troublesome correspondence to your department heads and you are thinking fondly about the restaurant in which you will have three-hour lunch (minimum). At that moment a wire is received reading: "Urgent you catch earliest flight possible. Picture ready to be screened 9 p. m. tonight. This is it. Confirm. Regards. Signed A. K."

(It is necessary to take a moment out to emphasize the importance of the word "regards" in this wire. The word "regards" is a true sign of a top executive. You must add this to every wire you send and to every letter, regardless of how abusive and insulting it may be. The word "regards" gives you an out. It furnishes you with incontrovertible evidence of the fact that everything you have said is from one friend to another.)

Your transportation man kills himself, but gets you on the noon plane, and 12 hours later you are in the studio screening room completely surrounded by A. K. You struggle valiantly through two hours of Technicolor mixed with phenobarbitol which you, of course, have taken on the plane. Every top film executive must take phenobarbitol on a plane ride. He has to be ready for what greets him he arrives in Hollywood.

If you are experienced, however, you can sleep through at least half of the picture. You are ready to handle the situation without a single thought. You awake yourself firmly three minutes before the end of the picture. As the final title card starts on the screen, and without waiting for the lights to go on, you jump across three rows of seats and grab A. K., preferably with both hands—and shout "A. K.—you've got a helluva picture!" This sentence I rate as importantly as the word "regards." With a little training and voice-control, you can give it at least 10 variations in inflection, each one with a shade of meaning all its own. I promise you that there isn't a single screening room situation that this will not cover. However, you may, out of your own desire to keep your brain functioning, wish to have more variety. If you are a person possessed of such intellectual integrity, you can go through the same gymnastics, but this time you yell—"A. K.—you've done it again!" For the complete intellectual purist, generally a City College man, you can have a third standby where you scream—"A. K.——is that a picture!!!"

This third approach, however, requires a little handling, since it must be accompanied with very vigorous shaking of the head from side to side. For real training in this regard, check anyone of the kinescopes of the Molly Goldberg TV shows.

With any of the above three mastered, you are practically guaranteed to move to the very top of the class. The worst that will happen to you is that you will become an executive assistant. If you are real ambitious, you will then head straight for the airport mumbling—"A. K. This picture is just too big for the marquee. Just this once I wish I had my own theatres. All you've got to do is open the doors and step back. I'd love to stay, A. K., and discuss this further with you, but I feel I will lose the feeling if I don't head straight back to the office."

As you shake his hand agai , not forgetting the two-handed grip, you clinch it with—"One thing you've got to watch out for, A. K.—this picture must never be screened in a projection room—only in a theatre . . . it needs an audience." Dimly you hear A. K. say, "Remember the line I gave you. It will sell the picture in every city, in every town, in every city and town. Just use the line, 'Their love was bigger than both of them.'" With the plane door shut, you now take out a king-size phenobarbitol and face towards New York.

Situation No. 2: Staff Screening on Picture

You rush from the airport directly to the office via Carey Cadillac. Carry at least two bags, one of which should be the diplomatic type. This should be done even if they are empty and in spite of the fact that you have spent only four hours in Hollywood. This impresses everyone, particularly the elevator starter and operator and sometimes, with a little luck, you can also impress the receptionist. Make certain the shoeshine man sees both bags stacked in the corner. Don't laugh at these things. These are the people who really help you become a top executive.

In spite of the fact that you have had 12 hours sleep on the plane, act as if you are exhausted, ask for six cups of coffee, and with the empty containers standing on the desk, call in the entire staff for a meeting.

Start the meeting off with a short statement to the effect that although you are falling on your face, you just had to tell them about the great new picture you saw last night. You say, "Fellas, you know there's one thing about me that everybody says—that is—that I level with you. When I think a picture is great, I tell you so. When I think it's a stinker, I don't flinch—I tell it to you—I tell it to the front office—and I tell it to the producer. Like I said, one thing I do is level. I know you guys will forgive me because I am so exhausted for just thinking out loud. I will just be talking off the top of my head. This will be a springboard—we will spitball a little."

Here again we must stop to emphasize the importance of what might look to you like an ad lib. The phrase "Just thinking out loud" must be rated as one of the top executive builders in our industry. This phrase must not be used as a substitute for talking out loud. It certainly must never be used as a substitute for just thinking. You will, of course, call in your secretary to take notes on the meeting, and as she lifts her pencil to take her notes, you will stop her by telling everyone it's all off the record.

You explain that A. K.'s new picture is a great picture. If you have strength, you stand up as you say this—hold the desk for a few minutes and then sit down. You then add, "while it is a great picture, some people think it is only a critic's picture. Our problem is—will the critics think so? Other people think it is the people's picture. Our problem is—will the people think so? Let's do the unusual on this picture. Let's have a junket—let's tie up with the mayor, maybe the governor . . . let's get the church people to help—the women's clubs—I think this one is an exploitation special—maybe we can get it banned in Boston . . . maybe we can have the Life editors to lunch . . . it's their kind of picture. On the other hand, fellas, and you know I always level with you, if I had my own way, and this was my picture, I'd open this one cold. I think this one is so big that it doesn't need a campaign of any kind."

By saying this, you make it very clear to all of the department heads that no one is indispensable. That any good ideas they have are really yours. You wind up your pitch by saying, "Well, fellas, I know that you are all raring to go—you must have a million ideas—just remember that I got a big organization and I don't want to do everything myself. This has been an open meeting—anyone have anything further to say?"—and with that you quickly dismiss everybody. It is important that you do this before anyone gets a chance to open their mouths.

Situation No. 3: Meeting with Advertising Agency

Always take off your jacket for this type of meeting. It pays to give those ad guys the feeling that you are a real craftsman just like they are. While they are placing the roughs of the ads around the room, look at each one, put your chin in your hand, try as hard as possible to look like you're thinking and then walk on, and make no comment at all. After you are through, sit down and the first thing you say is, "Fellas, you have a great set of ads, but——"

The word "But" is this sentence and at this point is not only important, it's crucial. The first part of this sentence lets all the boys know how much you love them and their ads. The word "but" however, is your custom-built escape hatch from any responsibility for anything that ever happens on the campaign.

The first "but" is, "The ads don't sing." In rapid succession, you give them one "but" after another. The following additional "buts" point out that it doesn't have the woman's approach, mass approach, family approach, mass appeal, class appeal, or critics appeal, not enough white space—maybe too much white space in one or two spots. If the agency boys look too depressed at this point, you tell them—"Fellas, don't get me wrong, I still think it's a great campaign . . . all I'm asking is—'Will it sell tickets?'—I'm looking for something different . , some original thinking from the boys . . . I think you are giving me the same old 66. Now, I don't like to say it—but I don't think you're earning your 15%—Monarch's pressbook on 'Love in the Saddle' will give you an idea of the kind of originality I have in mind. As I said, I want originality but don't be afraid to use some of the stuff that we know sells tickets. What's wrong with the line—'They lived 24 crowded hours in a lifetime?' . . . sure it's an intimate love story but who will it hurt if you say, 'with a cast of thousands?' . . . personally, I don't think you will ever come up with a better line than my own line—'Their love was bigger than both of them.'"

As they shuffle out of the room, stop the account executive and say, "Sam, I want to speak to you alone for a minute . . . I don't have the heart to hurt those fine boys of yours but if they don't stop that top-of-the-head thinking, I'm going to have to get me a new agency." This sentence is a very important morale-builder and you really don't take any chances because the average advertising publicity and exploitation director has absolutely no say in choosing the agency that works with him.

There are many other lines you can use during an agency meeting. A few other lines I recommend for spice are "In the great tradition of 'Gone With the Wind,' 'It Happened One Night,' 'The Informer,' and 'Red Stallion in the Rockies.'" I also recommend lines like "Three years in the making," or "A truly great picture."

A. K. is, of course, in New York. A little more than $100,000 has been spent on the opening, about 80% on A. K.——

In spite of the fact that the picture opened to the greatest first hour's business on a rainy Tuesday morning, between Thanksgiving and Christmas and in spite of the fact that the audience loved it—business for the opening day stinks.

A. K. is now standing with you in front of the theatre . . . new lobby . . . new marquees . . . new ads . . . new publicity. The only thing not new is the picture. It is w up to you to explain why business stinks. The following list will cover almost every situation:

Too hot.
Too cold.
Too rainy.
Too sunny.
Too soon after Easter.
The house is on the wrong side of the street.
The house is too big.
The house is too small.
The house is too medium.
Very tough competition on the street.
Too many openings this week.
No openings on the street this week.
World's series.
Hockey.
Boxing.
Football.
Polo (in exclusive neighborhood).
County fairs (kill drive-in business).
Tennis matches.
Parking problem.
The public let them down.
Women.

How to Be Hardboiled

Vet Whodunit Author's Expose Exposition on Private-Eyes, Leering Ladies, Et Al.

By JOHN ROEBURT

It is the solemn duty of the practiced to mentor the young—Who said that? Even greater than duty, it is Man's instinctive drive—Not to have been mere wraith or shadow in his time on Earth; to leave behind his mark, or his hard-got wisdom, or his progeny.

So that the secrets of my own craft remain, when I take up lodging in whatever dreadful Valhalla murder writers go to, I will set down here as many pointers and trade samples as VARIETY space allows (allows me, that is.)

With this advice: Latch on to thei friend, if you would a modern murder writer be. Take these pointers for your very own, make them your very own. It's formula stuff, sure, sure—But without the formula, bub, you're dead! No checks in the mail, tch tch, no hoise to your petard, tch tch!

The categories below are arbitrarily rendered, for ready shorthand, and for classroom simplification.

1—Problem of the Blonde: The stuff of murkiest dream, your story blonde. Never the girl at your elbow, even in the Copa, and certainly not the lady you married. Visualize this babe as blonde to the shade of albino, with eyes that are a blue infinity a fellow can drop off in. Give her an eccentric walk, jig in fact, that automatically qualifies her as the Queen Mother of Sex. Dress her scantily, splash her with rainbow paint, endow her with an abundant greed, and try, try hard, bub, to preserve her from censorship!

2—Problem of the Heavy: The chameleon in our midst, this gent. He bears small resemblance, in shape, manner, or chartable biology, to the mammalian male. In visualizing him, rule out at once all distorted imaginings of your brother-in-law, or the tax collector. Our Joe's kephole lean, dirigible round, a giant, a dwarf, a savant, a psychotic, and with a malice toward men that barely stops short of Andrei Vishinsky.

3—Problem of the Estate Wherein Murder Dwells: Not the house your jack built, or where your boss patronizes you weekends. Not even the joint they dragged you to that time you threw hysterics in the Automat. Wrong visualization, Neighbor! This nightmare was designed by the Albright Brothers, and furnished by Dali. It's bigger than the Colosseum, has a high Florentine gate only a tough-winged American Eagle can negotiate, has more shadowy nooks and corridors than a Surrealist dream, and is thickly colonized by bats. Among other oddities of decor, do not omit a wall clock that also serves as a coffin, or a vault for purloined documents.

4—Problem of the Torpedo, or Gunsel: Always indentured to the Heavy; never in business for himself—the Sap! An uncomplicated personality usually, as normal as Steakburgers, as sociable as Saturday Night in a Brownsville Pool Hall. He is a pool shark, in fact—adept in putting your eyeballs in the corner pocket. A grand (guignol) fellow, with a face that is pleasantly homespun, open, and devoid of traceable meanness.

5—Problem of the (Private) Eye: The Ultimate Man. Not you, dope—So tear up that image of yourself and go soap your mirror! This is the guy your wife fancies, while you're dreming up the Blonde. He has fists of steel, an iron stomach, a hide like medieval armor. Bullets bounce off him. Love, too, bounces off him—he's kissed-off as many as he's kissed. He uses gin for a mouthwash, rinses stiffs out of his hair, and takes a blood bath every Friday night. Never completed Grade School, but has the forensic brilliance of a Brandeis. A bad man to cross, worse to doublecross, damfoolish to triplecross. When delineating The Eye, be sure to bash, batter, bludgeon, eviscerate him, but keep him alive. This annihilation short of death, should be wrought in a stylized idiom that is heavy with figures. The following samples are worth copying.

. It took a long time for the balloon to drift down from Outer Gravity, and settle back on my shoulders."

". . . The bomb-burst in my head set off a chain reaction. The last thing I heard before being blown to bits, was Mona screaming."

" . I got re-located in the world, with splinters of wooden railing stuck like toothpicks hor d'hoeuvres."

". . . My teeth were a guillotine knife slicing down to cut off my tongue, as an abyss opened. . . ."

". . . There was a light, no bigger than a pin-head, waiting for me at the end of a long sleep."

". . . In a drugstore, I got the cracks in my skull re-glued, and an iodine pomade where it lumped."

6—Problem of the Lingo: A glossy, metaphorical style is a must. So shelve all remembered college readings in Models for Writing Prose. Strive for the most complex, obscure, rococo, and absolute. The imperishable sample below are herewith deeded to the public domain:

". . . He was a spidery looking guy, who looked as if he'd just crawled out of a cobweb."

". . . A shaggy-hairey guy, like try combing the knots out and you'd pull his head off."

". . . Blood oozed out of him, like 50 pipes had sprung a leak."

" . . She wore a painted smile on lips too thin for laughter."

". . . Mort's Bar & Grill was a sewer dive. Open a manhole and drop in."

". . . A dagger stood vertically in his adam's apple, like a cemetery cross."

". . . Her blood on broken cubes of ice and gravel, gave the illusion of rubies. Greedy Dora lay with a wilderness of precious stones at her feet."

. . He was a pint-sized guy with a mouse of a moustache, and the look of a fox."

". . . The door opened on a blonde who looked as if she was already counting your money."

". . . The air was as indigestible as vomit-gas."

Had enough?

Recent Medical Discoveries

(Amusement Division)

By MAC BENOFF

Hollywood.

With the upsurge in the field of medical discoveries, the Enterprising Chemicraft Tank & Bust Co. has hastened to set up a laboratory under the leadership of Dr. Von Shmertzen for the specific purpose of conducting research of the various anti-biotics, hormone derivatives and anti-histaminic properties as related to animals (i.e. humans) in the amusement fields. They have allowed the doctor full freedom to conduct his research, working only in the interests of scientific and medical research so that finishing dates on motion pictures shall be met with more exactitude.

For 14 months the Von Shmertzen laboratories have been gathering evidence based on tests conducted upon unemployed actors, freelance writers, fifth-string agents, and one or two associate producers. When the statistical evidence begins to weigh preponderantly toward fact, the drug may be applied to guinea pigs, valuable monkeys, trained seals, and any vidpix producers displaying equal intelligence. It now seems not premature to report on the findings of the following drugs:

Streptomysight—Performs an advantageous temporary paralysis of the optic nerves. Applied upon arising in the morning, it will completely shut off certain vision rays so that upon reading the tradepapers at breakfast the user sees nothing but the mentions of his own name. A more subtle strain of the Strepto culture is Auromysight. It allows for further observation of tradepapers, namely the user's name and the obituary columns.

In either case, it was discovered that the experimental group enjoyed a more than 400% rise in enjoyment of breakfast. Appetites sharpened, and many diets began to include such foods as eggs, cereal, orange juice, and even fatty foods ithout the usual distress. Oddly enough, there were diverse requests; such as chittlins, bagels, and crepes suzettes. Liquor consumption was dropped completely, although a few continued its use, but only in coffee.

Discontinuance of Streptomysight and Auromysight resulted in complete reversion. Tempers flared again at breakfast; divorce actions which had been dropped were renewed; releases of one kind or another, held in abeyance, were promptly mailed, etc.

Dr. Von Schmertzen feels he has a very important breakfast aid here and is continuing his studies on the original group with the view to obtaining a cure for ulcers and (to use his own expression) "dropdeadedness."

Effects of Seconalysis

Seconalysis—A form of sleeping pill which effectively dulls the mental processes, but has its own awakening agent, and allows the user complete freedom to think clearly. During this limited period he may jot down any story ideas, directorial touches, production memos, or, in the case of actors, retorts to directors. The user then falls back into a calm and normal deep sleep, able to call on his notes in the morning with an untroubled mind and relaxed body.

Excellent results were obtained on an experimental group until the first stumbling block was found. A number of writer teams working in collaboration received ideas at different times in their mid-sleep reverie and could not consult with each other. Research workers noted that if an attempt were made by one of the partners, the only contribution his colleague would make was, "Oh, go back to sleep." Naturally, collaborating writers slept in the same room, and experiments conducted at one studio had all the writers sleeping in the same room. It was thought that twin beds might be a cause of uneven thought processes, and double beds were substituted. The experiment resulted failure, particularly with writers of the same sex.

In the actors' group the many retorts—thought of the previous night—were tried on the set the next day. It was felt that while Seconalysis allowed an actor to think of retorts, it did not improve their quality, and the total effect of the experiment is therefore dubious.

Directors were found to be equally tense, especially on location. Seconalysis seemed to aid directors, but in most cases these directors were found to be shooting a few days ahead of schedule. It was again thought that here, too, research might be carried on in another field and perhaps an improvement in their super-toxicity might result if they changed the name of their Guild. A few random recommendations were Camera Movers Guild, Light Experts Guild. No particular reason was given for these names, but it was felt that if a false sense of non-responsibility might be instilled in the directors tensions might be relaxed so that they could be further aided by Seconalysis.

Producers Good Subjects

Producers were excellent subjects, awakening briskly and falling right back to deep sleep promptly. However, morning examination revealed that nothing was ever written down on the convenient jot pads. Consequently, the experiment was discontinued after a reasonable time. (In this case 11 months).

Quite by accident, a radio writer, who produced fruitful results was discovered among the screenwriters. Research on his group was extended, and the experiments were carried through with magnificent results. Almost all the writers awakened at approximately the same time, seemed to have the same, or concurrent, ideas, and in a very short time were so agreeably disposed that they stole from one another freely. It may soon be possible for radio writers, with the aid of Seconalysis, to sleep 24 hours a day and continue their work successfully.

Dr. Von Shmertzen feels he has an invaluable aid treating troubled sleep with Seconalysis. He is not releasing the drug as yet, preferring to see the results of his experiments on another group from the Watussi Tribe, who have, incidentally, been in contact with picture workers. He is testing them to see if their wakening periods can produce equal or better results at a lower cost. He will then present his findings to his benefactors, who may then assemble a yearly picture program for some studio.

Hadacolic — no further experiments were made after Dr. Von Shmertzen himself tested a bottle and suddenly smashed his laboratory to bits. He took off for Hollywood and sold himself as a story editor to one of the major studios. The Chemicraft Tank & Bust Co. has withheld certain contractual deferred payments to the doctor and is awaiting a change in regime at the studio (expected momentarily) for their research head to return and continue his valuable research. Whereupon they will from time to time release subsequent bulletins.

Krim, Benjamin To Coast Jan. 15 for UA

Arthur Krim, prexy of United Artists; Robert Benjamin, his partner, and Max Youngstei , company's pub-ad topper, expect to leave New York for the Coast around Jan. 15. Execs will see new independent product set for UA release and will work on new distribution deals.

Lew Wasserman, prez of Music Corp. of America, who is now in N. Y., will be on the Coast at the same time to follow through on the projected deal for indie pictures to be made by five stars who are MCA clients. Deal still is in early stages. Talent involved includes Gregory Peck, Alan Ladd, James Stewart, Marlon Brando and Cary Grant.

C. Mackenzie Plans Scot Pic

Glasgow.

Plans are set for a new Scottish film project inspired by novelist Compton Mackenzie, author of "Tight Little Island." First production will be Mackenzie's story, "Monarch of the Glen," with James Robertson Justice in the lead.

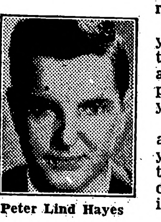
Mackenzie and Justice, with authors Moray McLaren and Eric Linklater, are behind the project.

Hecklers

By PETER LIND HAYES

"The next time you have your hat blocked don't forget to take your head out of it!"

"I don't know what I'd do without you but I'd rather!"



Peter Lind Hayes

"Why don't you stroll over to the Brewery and let 'em put a head on you!"

"Some guys are jerks but you're trying to make a career out of it!"

"When snakes get drunk, they see you."

All stock lines for sure, but these and many more like them are constantly floating around in the sub-conscious minds of our top saloon comics. After many years in supper clubs I have decided the most profitable thing to do is ignore the obnoxious drunk. I contend that no matter how witty you seem to be with the pat ad lib you still lose ground with the rest of your audience.

For instance . . . recently at the Waldorf, Mary (Healy) and I were working especially hard because Richard Rodgers was in the audience and we wished to please him with our satire on "The King and I." Naturally this would be the night for a Heckler and brother we had a beauty. After taunting us for awhile with words and getting no response he suddenly came up with a bright idea, he tossed a half-a-dollar onto the floor. Well sir, this I didn't expect. (At the Waldorf, maybe a $20 gold piece, but never a 50c piece). Mary leaned over and whispered, "Easy, dear!" I was in such a state of paralyzed astonishment I continued on with the act rather vaguely but all the time trying to figure out what to do.

Fortunately at this moment the Captain decided that tip or no tip this bum had to go. They assisted him gently but firmly to the door leaving the stage to the three of us . . . Mary and Peter and the shiny half dollar. In about four minutes it was getting more attention than we were, finally we got to a point in the act where I said, "If you feel low, sing high" . . . at this moment I stopped the music, repeated "If you feel low . . ." reached over, picked up the half dollar and gingerly placed it in my pocket. The reaction was very gratifying and much more so than it would have been had I gone to work on the drunk with "one-liners."

A Cooked Tourist

On another occasion at the Waldorf we received a call early in the evening from a man claiming to be James A. FitzPatrick, the travelog man. I had been doing a satire on Mr. FitzPatrick for years but had never met him and this apparently was the reason for the call. I begged off for the moment and asked him to return for the midnight show and I would be happy to meet him immediately after our performance. I opened with the FitzPatrick number and decided to introduce him at the finish . . . this I did with a glowing eulogy and the admission that I had never met the gentleman and would like to have him take a bow. Well, sir, up jumps a tuxedo at the ringside and says, "Here I am Buddy-Boy and I'm stiff as a billy goat!" I walked over and apologized for embarrassing him and then he started to insult me and holler and scream but, finally, during a tiny lull in his tirade, a calm clear voice rang out from the other side of the room and said, "Peter, that man is not James FitzPatrick, I am James FitzPatrick" . . . I turned on the ringside drunk and said, "Pardon me, your name is Fatzpitrick and I'm looking for FitzPatrick!"

Occasionally something unforeseen will happen that actually helps to break the ice that usually confronts the saloon entertainer. I recall one night at the Copacabana when the late Sid Grauman was seated auspiciously at ringside. I was doing a very quiet impression of Gary Cooper when suddenly I heard a rather faint but nevertheless ominous mumbling from the entire audience. I raised my eyes just in time to see a giant water-bug approaching the bottom of the microphone stand. It was at least three inches long and by now every eye in the place was focused on the lowly heckler. I turned to the coast showman and with an apologetic air said, "Mr. Grauman, I usually work alone but tonight I would like you to meet my new partner . Hal Roach!" Needless to say I've wasted several years trying to train a roach to make just such an entrance every night.

Another occasion that comes to mind where much more was achieved with sugar than vinegar concerns itself with a comic named George Riley. George worked at the Grace Hayes Lodge, in Hollywood, with us and one night was set upon by a rather famous but evil woman. This gal is well known in Hollywood and has a passion for heckling comedians. She is a very heavy-set female with a flair for dressing like a man so we always referred to her as "Gentleman Jim Jeffries." This particular night she was being unmerciful, she was drunk enough to have the hiccups and after every hiccup she would look at George and say, "You stink!" George just kept smiling at her tenderly until about the seventh inning and then suddenly he strolled over to her table exposed her to the unfriendly glare of the spotlight, and still with a big smile on his kisser, he said, "Madam, aren't you content with just being beautiful!"

Joe E. Lewis in Chi.

Joe E. Lewis is a master at the retort proper but he tells this one on himself. It was Saturday night at the Chez Parce, Chicago, and the joint was packed. Joe E. was working on a tiny platform in the middle of the dance floor; tables had been pushed right up to his shoe leather. He was having a bad time of it with a large table to his left. They were heckling him endlessly and not even listening to his witty answers. Presently he lost his temper and said, "I give up, these people are too much for me, put the spotlight on them!" A hush fell on the room but still the unruly table continued to hurl their drunken insults. Joe E. repeated his demand that the spotlight be directed to these people and again slowed the big arc of light onto the agitators. As the bright beam engulfed them, the loudest offender blinked crazily at the spotlight, turned back to his table and shouted, "Straighten up everybody, they're gonna' take our picture!" Even Lewis fell i a helpless heap of laughter.

Let me say that the reason I have for not wanting to answer a heckler must be placed at the feet of Joe Frisco. Very wisely Mr. Frisco says . . "K-K-Kid when your'e w-w-w-orking for a s-s-s-aloon-keeper, don't insult any of the customers . . . they m-m-m-ight buy a bottle of wine!"

Hollywood As The Idea Capital Of The World

By CHARLES SCHNEE

Hollywood.

You've got to hand it to Hollywood for at least one thing: for good or bad, it's the idea capital of the world. This charming little mountain village must be the only community on earth where a citizen can be hit right between the eyes at breakfast with an idea and convert it into $50,000 in negotiable currency ere vespers.

The tablecloths in any studio commissary attest to the fact that along about dessert ideas start busting out all over. Anywhere within a 40-mile radius of a film studio, anytime you see a man suddenly stop talking in the middle of a sentence and apparently go blind without warning, don't loosen his collar and drag him out into fresh air. Just let him be. An idea has suddenly struck him.

Successful operators deliberately create or maintain the conditions or circumstances under which good ideas are most likely to come to them. Like one very successful writer I know who has been knocking around the studios at a fancy salary for years. He seems to get his best ideas while in barber chairs. The gabbier the barber, the more obnoxious the loud radio, the better the story ideas. During his less productive periods he's the best groomed layoff in Hollywood.

Last time he sat down in a barber chair he got up owing $42.50 and sporting a permanent wave and red polish on his toe-nails. But it was worth it—he came up with a dilly of a story idea.

As a writer I know that the good ones come to you at the darndest times. My wife has learned to shut up and back away and hide when she sees a sudden blank look come over my face. She knows I just thought of an idea for the end of the picture.

I am frequently struck with an idea while shaving. I don't know what it is about the operation that turns me into a magnet for ideas.

For instance one morning, in the middle of shaving, an idea suddenly came to me as a good premise for a play. Possibly a movie later, but anyway, it sounded wonderful as a stage comedy.

I ran out of the bath. My wife saw me coming; she hid in th basement. I rushed into my den and started banging the typewriter. It wound up into a play now being read by a Broadway producer.

Now I can go back and shave the other side of my face.

Ideas come that way in more cosmic fields of thought, too, apparently. Now you would have thought that lying flat on your back under an apple tree, while killing time, would hardly be the occasion for great accomplishments in such a profound science as astrophysics. But look what happened when the apple fell and struck Sir Isaac Newton. Bam! — just like that — Newton's Law Of Universal Gravitation!

The wife of another great man tells a little story about what happened to an obscure clerk in the Swiss patent office one Sunday morning. It was around 11 o'clock and the lady was in curlers, the patent office clerk hadn't shaved and the Sunday papers were strewn all over the place. Hardly the time for inspiration.

The man was putting on a sock when he suddenly stopped and went upstairs and got a pencil and a piece of scrap paper. He came back down and did a little scribbling and mumbling to himself. Being a good wife who had seen ideas aborning before, she said nothing.

In a moment he grinned. "Mama," he said, "I've got an idea. I've got to work out some of the details yet."

Whereupon Albert Einstein went back upstairs and expounded the Theory of Relativity!

I have changed socks as much as 30 times a morning for weeks, but nothing has happened. I'm convinced that what works beautifully for one man isn't worth a darn to another.

almost 5,000,000 new video sets during the year. Sale of these, he said, plus new installation and servicing, added more than $1,500,000 to the national income. He cited boosts in transmitting power and improvement in receiver design as contributing to the widening receiver distribution potentials in present TV market areas.

Noting that TV's "glamor" sometimes overshadows the strides made by radio and disks, Folsom pointed out that production of radios and radio-phono units for the year hit about 12,000,000 units—more than double the number of TV set sales. This, he said, raised the number of radio sets throughout the country to more than 100,000,000, an average of more than two sets per family. He concurred with other top industry execs in predicting production of between 4,000,000 and 4,500,000 TV receivers in 1952, and 9,000,000 to 10,000,000 radios and radio-phonos.

"The limiting factor in domestic production will be, of course, the availability of raw materials and component parts," he said. "Curtailment of supplies for non-military production is expected to be felt most during the first half of 1952. This condition may improve to some extent in the second half, as the expanded production of suppliers begi to reach manufacturers."

THE BEST WAY TO SAY HAPPY NEW YEAR:

"Give them
M-G-M Pictures!"

Leo Rings the Bell with the Public!

"LONE STAR"—The Battle of Texas and the Battle of the Sexes. Clark Gable and Broderick Crawford fight for gorgeous Ava Gardner. Cast includes Lionel Barrymore, Beulah Bondi. It's BIG in Love and Action with Box-Office written all over it!

JUST A FEW OF THE BIG ONES FOR 1952!
And of course the Biggest: "QUO VADIS"!

Theatre TV Passes B.O. Test, Scans Future

By NATHAN L. HALPERN

(President, Theatre Network Television)

This has been a busy and eventful year for theatre television. From coast to coast, some 250,000 people paid to watch big-screen television at their local theatres. Small exhibitors and big circuits alike showed courage and business foresight in pioneering the field. Now, at the end of the year, there are four times as many theatres with large-screen installations as there were at the close of 1950. The number of cities with television-equipped theatres has more than doubled.

Here, then, is evidence of a snowball starting to roll downhill. Yet these dimensional comparisons are already meaningless, except as historical data. Today's figures will, we know, be obsolete tomorrow.

During the first part of 1951, theatre owners who were contemplating TV installations raised two fundamental questions:

(1) "Will people pay to watch theatre TV exclusives when they can watch home TV for nothing?"

(3) "Assuming that people will pay, who will supply theatres with exclusive programs?"

To answer these questions, the cart had to be placed in front of the horse. The second question had to be answered first; exclusive programs had to be furnished in order to test the boxoffice. This "trial by boxoffice" became possible when the organization of Theatre Network Television, Inc. (TNT) was undertaken, in May. The first theatre TV networking of exclusive programs followed.

TNT Provides One Answer

TNT is, in some ways, similar in concept to "home television" broadcasting networks. Yet in bridging two different industries, TNT also has functions allied to film producers and distributors.

TNT was created to fill the need for a business organization devoting full-time to theatre television programs and distribution. To accomplish the best results for the theatre television industry, it was felt generally that such a company should not be berthed within any single exhibitor circuit but should serve independently the requirements of all exhibitors. Thus TNT was conceived and organized.

Since virtually all major sports promoters and institutions have already suffered in some way from unrestricted, free home television, they are receptive to the idea of pay-as-you-go television. This dynamic new theatre TV medium offers promoters what they have been seeking—a way to live with television and protect the gate at the same time. Moreover, theatre TV presents events with an impact that stimulates audiences into far more enjoyment.

Accordingly, TNT launched the first exclusive theatre TV networking by presenting a series of major outdoor boxing attractions during the summer. These fights were promoted by the International Boxing Club, whose president, James D. Norris, and executive vice-president, Ned Irish, exhibited a long-range approach to the television future of sports events. Equally interested in theatre TV during the year were the National Collegiate Athletic Assn. and many colleges, and, subsequently, Madison Square Garden.

Some TNT Presentations

Shortly after its start, TNT presented the Louis-Savold fight as a theatre television exclusive. The LaMotta-Murphy, Layne-Marciano, and Louis-Bivins bouts followed. In September, the outdoor fight season was climaxed by two great championship matches that were theatre televised by TNT . . . Robinson-Turpin and Saddler-Pep.

During the summer, TNT was already planning its fall and winter programs. First came the football season. Games involving many of the major gridiron powers were made available to television-equipped theatres. Princeton, Navy, Yale, Columbia, Notre Dame, Indiana, Illinois and Michigan were among the teams presented.

By mid-November, TNT completed negotiations with Madison Square Garden for theatre television rights to a number of select winter events scheduled through March, 1952. At the same time, TNT was negotiating for other attractions in entertainment fields for 1951-1952 presentation.

Entertainment built on boxoffice is judged in only one way—on boxoffice receipts. It is surprising, to even the most optimistic supporters, how quickly theatre television won a large number of paying devotees.

Take the Robinson-Turpin fight. Every theatre carrying this event did absolute capacity business at substantially advanced prices over $2. Moreover, two times the number of patrons accommodated were turned away for lack of standing room. In Chicago, after it was announced that standing room had been sold out at the State Lake, the huge turn-away crowd literally broke down doors to get into the theatre.

This is, admittedly, a dramatic example of the appeal a theatre TV exclusive can exert. But four out of six fights were complete sell-outs. And the total dollar business volume for the other bouts was, in general, substantially above normal film business for those nights.

Even in a luke-warm football season—and despite the adverse competive conditions imposed by superior free home TV football presentations — theatre television demonstrated its great potential in this branch of sports. The Guild Theatre in New York, for instance, turned away over twice its capacity when it presented the Princeton-Cornell game at $2.40 per admission. These evidences of public interest were only the beginning; they pointed up a far greater untapped audience for major attractions on theatre TV.

Satisfied Customers

The atmosphere and impact of theatre television evoke unprecedented audience reaction. Fight fans shout advice, just as if they were at ringside. Football rooters stand up and cheer, as if they were in the stadium. It is not unlikely that plays and musical comedies will draw the same applause as the original, flesh-and-blood performances.

At the end of each event, audience enthusiasm manifests itself in inquiries about future theatre television programs. Thus, theatre TV has not only shown its ability to draw customers; it has turned out satisfied customers, who want more—who will pay for more.

Although there was a rapid increase in the number of television-equipped theatres towards the end of the year, programs built specifically for theatre television were not economically practical in 1951. Attractions especially created and staged for movie television may become the bread and butter of the medium. But the 1951 acid test—at the boxoffice—had to be based on "ready-made" events.

The television operating economics for individual theatres were good, considering the comparatively few units carrying the load. Some theatres showed profits on individual events. Most were near the break-even point, or showed small losses occasioned in part by low admission price policies and by very substantial telephone costs for infrequent usage. Against a comparable period in the growth of any other entertainment medium, this early economic picture is truly remarkable.

Theatre television will continue to program major sports events. In addition, attractions from other fields of entertainment will take their places on the theatre TV screen. The big new development in theatre TV programming will be entertainment features utilizing the unique advantages of spontaneity offered by the television medium.

5 U.S. FILM FIRMS WIN ARG. TAX REBATES

Buenos Aires.

Some five U. S. film companies won tax rebates amounting to 738,590 pesos ($52,439) under a decision handed down by an Argentine court. Case reportedly covers periods as far back as eight to 10 years ago.

Firms paid a 5% impost on their Argentine gross incomes, but the court ruled that the bite should have applied to only half their gross incomes.

Benefiting by the decision are Warners, with a 307,767 peso rebate; Universal, 92,470; United Artists, 183,341, and Columbia Pictures, 43,317.

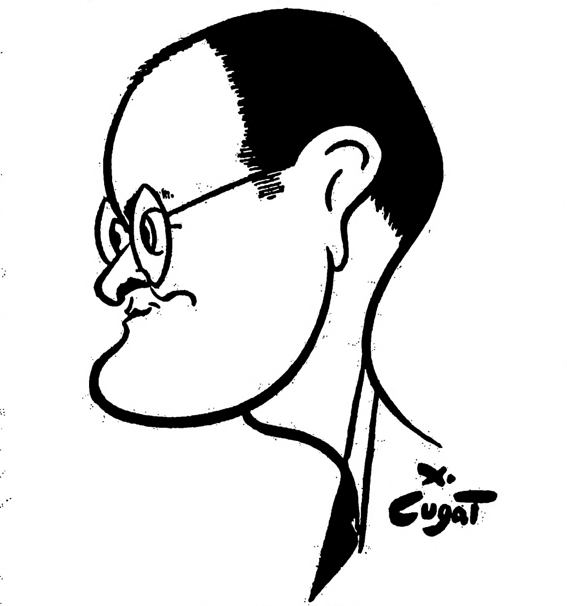
Several other companies had also protested the tax. However, out-of-court adjustments were said to have been made these complaints.

Chi Judge Denies 'Vadis' Right to Roadshow

Chicago.

Judge Michael Igoe last Friday (28) denied the request of Metro for permission to roadshow "Quo Vadis" here. Jurist, under the Jackson Park case decision which he handed down several years ago, also nixed M-G's request that a clearance period be permitted after the Chi first-run.

Under the JP ruling, all Loop houses except the Oriental and Woods are prohibited from showing pix for more than two weeks and they must be made available to subsequents as soon as they come out of the first-runs. That means that if Metro insists on a longer engagement than two weeks and wants to institute clearance, it can do business only with the Oriental or Woods.



PETE SMITH

For the ninth consecutive year exhibitors have just voted Pete Smith Specialties the most popular live action movie shorts in the "Motion Picture Herald-FAME" national poll. And for the eight consecutive year in the "Showmen's Trade Review" poll.

How to Induce People To Write Letters

By GEORGE STEVENS

Hollywood.

I got my course in "How to Induce a Lot of People to Write Letters" the hard way—under fire.

George Stevens

There I was minding my own business and getting along just fine. Not a care in the world. Then I went to work on an idea that I had had for years: making a picture based on Theodore Dreiser's massive and classic "An American Tragedy."

My experience knocked right into the well-known askew busby such dead-wrong assumptions as that which holds that all so-called fan mail is written by the hot-rod and chocolate-malt set and concerns only such vital problems of the day as whether Lana Turner should become a brunet in her next picture.

The American people are a race of letter-writers. For which, praise be! It is part of our heritage to be able to sit down and write a beefing note to somebody when there is something we don't like—and it is part of our nature to sit down and write a bouquet to someone when we do like something. The conversion of a well-known novel to the screen will stir up just about as much mail, one way or another, as anything I can think of.

Most Letters Sensible

While this sort of correspondence naturally includes some screwball extremes, most of the letters which grew out of "A Place in the Sun," the picture title for the "An American Tragedy" story, were sensible, observant and pertinent.

As I say, there was the usual quota of balmy correspondence, with which any producer and studio is familiar. That is inevitable but is happily limited.

Some of them whip you. You take a customer who wrote me from down south—Tennessee, to be exact—informing me that she had seen through my ruse, and she thought something should be done about it.

"I saw your picture, 'A Place in the Sun,'" she wrote, "and you plagiarized it from somewhere. I don't remember the name of the book but I read that story, I know I did, in a book once."

Well, that gives you an idea. Besides, there is a school of thought—composed mainly of editors of literary magazines—which holds that telling a producer-director that you recognized the book story in his picture is a form of flattery. But most of the mail inspired by the picture was valid comment, and all of it showed an amazingly wide interest in the problems of converting a novel, especially one like Dreiser's, into a film.

We will never know the exact figures, so my guesses are as good as yours. As a rough estimate I would say that one out of every 100 people who see a picture and seriously dislike it will bother to sit down and write somebody about it.

This guess-work as to the percentage of theatregoers who write letters does not mean that beefing letters outnumber the bouquets 10-to-1. It simply means that you can figure that for every one complaint, 100 people didn't like the picture, whereas for every one letter of praise, 1,000 customers thought it was a good show.

Dreiser's book itself was a controversial one. I gather that most readers divide off into well-defined camps. In other words, you think it's wonderful or you think it's depressing and laborious. And most Dreiser fans are really all-out on the subject. With this contingent, it might be said that anyone who assumes to transfer a Dreiser novel to the screen has two strikes on him when he steps up to bat. They resent even the idea.

However, "A Place in the Sun" kicked up a remarkably large number of correspondents who expressed favor for the way the story was treated. Many wrote that it was a good idea to drop the period of the story—back there 30 or so years ago—and bring it up to date on the grounds that the period background would have intruded itself too much on the basic screen story. In other words, the props and costumes and references to that period would have gotten in the way of the powerful drama of the story itself.

If I learned one thing from this mail it is the fact that any filmmaker is a fool who talks about "working down" to the theatre-going public in his story treatments. The customers want a good story. Even if you have to plagiarize it from Dreiser!

'IT'S BETTER THAN . . .'

By LEO GUILD

Hollywood.

Hollywood is the land of the Discoverers. There's always someone who has found something better than the masses. The new and novel is considered superior to the established, be it an unreleased foreign film or a "guaranteed" cold cure.

There are, for example, Discoverers who laugh derisively when you mention the Beachcomber Restaurant. Why, they've found a little Chinese cafe—"on a side street only 20 miles from here"—where you go through a laundry to a back room and you're served chickens' neck stuffed with blueberries covered with onions. Out of this world!

Of course, when you finally get there, either the place is marked "closed" (for lack of business) or the food tastes and looks like steaming slush.

Another Discoverer laughs loudly at a mention of Mocambo or Ciro's. He's found an intimate little New York-type club which has the greatest entertainment in the world. Atmosphere! Color! Intime!

Once there, a tired, fleshy singer moans monotonously while everyone sips watered drinks and wishes they were home sick in bed.

You Never Learn

You continue to get stuck because you never learn. Over and over again you fall for the enthusiasms of the Discoverers. They know a used-car lot where you can get a Cadillac formerly driven by Lana Turner ("who never ran up any mileage because she used Topping's car") for one-tenth the original cost.

They know a little dress shop with "originals only," and where the dresses are a steal because the poor woman who owns the shop doesn't know prices.

For blind dates, there's always a Discoverer who knows a girl who makes Betty Grable look like Marjorie Main without makeup.

Female Discoverers insist your wife has to try a little beauty parlor which is the Home of the Silver Blondes. "Every big star who cares how she looks goes there."

As summer approaches, Discoverers are amazed that you'd go to a crowded touristy spot like Carmel, Lake Arrowhead, Las Vegas or Big Bear. They know of a little place on the desert about a hundred miles north (actually 217 miles) that is the healthiest place in the country. And the women—wow!

Come down with a cold and Discoverers pounce on you. They have a doctor whom you just have to see, because this particular doctor is the one who cured Louis B. Mayer of flu with one shot and wouldn't take a dime for it— just wants to cure people.

When you put on weight, there's a Discoverer of a diet in which you chop up apple cores, strain them, and eat the stuff garnished on mackerel three times a day. Miracles happen!

Are you off to Palm Springs? There are Discoverers who will laugh at your naivete on taking Highway 99, the best-known and most-travelled road. They know a back road that will get you there in half the time. No lights. Traffic? You never see another car!

The Discoverers have a favorite line. It's one of the ways you can identify them. They start off, "If you like then you'll just love - - - - - - !"

Beware of Discoverers—they're everywhere!

Would Pool Studio Resources For '1 for All' Advancements

By HENRY KING

(The author is a veteran film director)

Hollywood.

Film-making is a fiercely competitive enterprise in which no man can rest on his laurels. Every product has to stand on its own merits in the open market against stiff competition. This results in better values for the buying public, in this instance, finer pictures.

Henry King

However, the entire industry should forget its individual competitive interests and get together on joint undertakings to the mutual advantage of all. In short, all studios should pool their money and talent on certain undertakings.

Foremost should be an organized, handsomely subsidized technological research program aimed at developing better and cheaper processes in the field of film mechanics and engineering. This would augment, not discourage, individual and independent laboratory research.

Formation of such a setup would in no way hold back any advances developed outside of the picture industry's "Institute." Awards for individual accomplishments would be just as great.

It would mean that there would be a steady advance in general technology of the screen, with all participating on a general level.

It is possible that if all these interests had been working more together on research, the color problem would have been resolved long ago. The picture-maker mustn't forget that he has competition other than that offered by rival studios. The industry as a whole has to meet the competition set up by rival media, notably television.

In any event, within another 20 years, either individually or collectively, picture mechanics will be enormously improved. The only thing is that it can be done faster and better probably if an Institute correlates and furthers research.

It will mean better and cheaper-to-make pictures. For instance if a producer develops a method of cutting production costs. Keeping it secret from other producers will not necessarily make it more valuable to him.

Such a program of research need not necessarily confine itself to the production end of the business. In fact, Hollywood could reap great returns both directly and indirectly on a program aimed at improving theatre air-conditioning, acoustics, and general audience comfort.

The project also could serve a very valuable function as a nonpartisan testing agency which would determine the validity of various claims regarding machinery and appliances used by either end of the industry.

There are very few technical developments of any importance which do not eventually benefit the whole picture business. Remember that even sound pictures were once the exclusive realm of a few pioneers. Today the production of soundless commercial pictures is unthinkable.

As a secondary consideration, the Institute would hold great public goodwill potentials. It would constitute a public service. It would contribute substantially to the comfort, well-being and entertainment of the buying public. Any program is in the public interest which offers greater safety and value for the purchaser's dollar.

How to Make a Sexy Dish In Hollywood

By RICHARD BROOKS

Hollywood.

We may as well face it: sex is here to stay.

I've had my share of working in the film mills, and I'll be darned if to this day I can identify exactly what infuses a picture with the magic of sex, or what endows a gal star with sex appeal.

It's true that certain symbols or conventions have been set up through the years which constitute a sort of code through which the makers say to the audience: "This dish is sexy." However, some symbols of screen sex are synthetic, and most of them are arbitrary. For example, you have this new star you want to introduce in your picture, and after considerable conferring the powers-that-be decide she should be given the old sex buildup. Just as though something else mattered.

So you're going to have to get over to your audiences right from the start that this kid is really a sexy item. How do you go about it? Well, there are the obvious symbols with which you can tag her. It is pretty hard to break away from them and yet get over the idea within a few seconds—because that's really all the time you have—after her image first hits screen.

The orthodox symbols require that she be smoking a cigaret. Why? You've got me. Possibly a woman dipping snuff or chewing tobacco or smoking a cigar would not be sexy, but what's wrong with just a plain woman, sans cigaret?

Cigarets and Bad Women

There was a time when the cigaret itself, under the morals of that era, symbolized the bad woman. Nice women didn't smoke cigarets; that was all. But nowadays everyone's grandma smokes. But the symbolism, however obscure, persists on the screen.

Now, in addition to smoking a cigaret, she must be smoking it exactly a certain way. It's got to be hanging straight down from her lips, she has to have her head tilted and her lids squinting to keep the smoke out of her eyes.

There are even sub-divisions of the cigaret symbol. For instance, the cigaret-holder. Give a woman on the screen a cigaretholder and she is immediately identified as a pretty fast character. The longer the cigaretholder the worse she is.

And there's something about a woman being blonde. There is absolutely nothing, in fact, to support this, because there are as many completely moral blondes as there are brunets, I'm sure, but on the screen a blonde sort of suggests that she is quite a deal. A really bleached blonde is supposed to be practically incorrigible.

But apart from the color of her hair, there is another surefire sex symbol which tags her right now. That is her voice.

Now, by all reasonable standards, to be sexy our girl should have a low, feminine voice. The principal difference in the adult male and the adult female voice is its pitch. The female voice is more musical. So we should have her speak in a low, musical voice, if we want to emphasize her sex. How this symbolism got started, I don't know. Clear back to Garbo and to Dietrich's first pictures, the low, flat voice was identifying women stars as being sexy.

Time was when voluptuousness involved a fairly well-fed curvaceous contour. Over a period of a few years, the symbol was switched to hungry-looking, half-starved women somewhat the anemic side like Dietrich.

As to her manner, it is required that our sexy star act infernally and eternally bored. Why, you've got me. I don't think it is a normal male reaction to be fascinated by women who act bored. On the other hand, men are suckers for women who affect an overwhelming enthusiasm for everything, including his "office talk."

Another tag involves possibly the most important of all sexy alternates—the bust measurement. No comment.

Don't Fence Me In!

By PAUL DOUGLAS

Hollywood.

I've been everything from a paint salesman to a lifeguard. But I spent some 24 years nursing the yen to get up on a stage and act. Though that was denied me for all those years, I lived by choice as close to the world of footlights and greasepaint as I could. My pals were actors; my haunts were theatrical hangouts.

But long before I made connections myself, I studied plays and motion pictures like a guy squinting through a microscope at specimens on a glass slide. I had a terrific desire to find out everything I could about dramatic form and the business of acting in general.

I came to some conclusions that weren't necessarily original, but I did arrive at them independently. I'd like to discuss one of them briefly.

Most of what I've seen of the picture business I like. There's a lot of solid intelligence and ability that goes into the Hollywood product, and anybody who tries to make out that the business is run by a bunch of "Once in a Lifetime" characters is either stupid or malicious—or both. That was a great play; but it was a wild caricature—don't forget it.

From an actor's viewpoint there's only one fault to find with the film industry. This isn't by nature a squawk about it—it's rather a plea to the powers that be not to inflict it on the acting profession.

Type-Casting

I'm talking about type-casting. This seems to be an insidious pattern of thinking in film minds, deriving from economic factors which, on the surface, seem sound enough. But it's ruinous to actors, and in the long run the damage is reflected at the boxoffice. The public eventually gets sick of seeing an actor or actress in one type of role, and when that happens there are two bad results: the actor's just about through, popularity-wise, and the film patron transfers his personal disgust and disappointment to the film business as a whole.

Just because a guy happens to look like a truckdriver doesn't necessarily mean that's all he can do in life. He might very well turn out to be a swell steel magnate.

Edward G. Robinson is irrevocably pegged in the public mind as a "Little Caesar" character. A superb actor, he's played other parts magnificently—but he did the toughie so long and so often early in his film career that the memory of it can't be erased. Consequently, his fine performance in any other role is lessened in believability by the shadowy background figure of the mugg with the big cigar and the smoking rod. No man can buck successfully the persistent public recollection of him in an established character.

Jimmy Cagney's another fine actor who laid a permanent finger on himself as a "public enemy." Cagney's essayed a few other portrayals beside the hard-fisted, lead-throwing hoodlum; he was great as George M. Cohan in "Yankee Doodle Dandy," but public acceptance of him always reverts to the original type.

There've been some who were typed who managed to break free, but it was a rough struggle. Joan Crawford had tremendous difficulty proving she was an actress, not just a "Dancing Daughter." Ginger Rogers likewise. Their original characterizations popularized them, and at the same time tightened a strangling noose of artistic limitation around their necks.

Dick Powell's Salvation

Dick Powell came close to going under when the public got sick of him as the apple-cheeked crooner he played in so many of his early pictures. He was as sick of the role as they were, and he made a heroic effort to get away from it. He had his work cut out, for no producer would take a chance on Powell as a rugged, punchy character. He finally got his break as the shamus in Ray Chandler's thriller, "Farewell, My Lovely," which turned out for some screwy reason to be called "Murder, My Sweet." It did the job for Powell.

Why is it necessary to push an actor to the brink of professional doom by forcing him to repeat, and repeat, a successful performance? Why is it necessary to stuff a characterization down the public's throat until it chokes Americans love steak and apple pie—but as a steady, absolutely unrelieved diet —no!

Actually, I got my break in this business by being my own "type." Garson Kanin, an old friend from my radio-announcing and sports-commentating days, wrote a play called "Born Yesterday," in which the lead role was that of a rugged junk tycoon. Kanin had headaches a-plenty trying to cast the role, and two days before rehearsals were due to start he confided to his wife, Ruth Gordon, that he'd like "a Paul Douglas type, only an actor." Ruth, bless her, came up with the classic (to me!) crack: "Why not try Douglas?" He did—and I was in.

Dame Cinema Goes Respectable

It Took 10 Years at N.Y.U. to Achieve This and Video Will Repeat 10 Years Hence

By PROFESSOR ROBERT GESSNER

(Chairman, Department of Motion Pictures, New York University)

Anniversaries have an insidious way of condoning sin. There was a time when actors of the female persuasion were considered wicked indeed, and the stage itself a near-house of ill fame. But now Madame Theatre is as respectable as Ambassadress Mesta. And VARIETY, which once blushed to be labeled the Bible of Show Business, is now the midwife of a one-volume Encyclopedia Brittanica.

rof. Gessner

Ten years ago another heresy was born. The world's largest university decided after some doubt and misgivings to acknowledge the existence of motion pictures. The first four-year curriculum leading to a Bachelor of Arts degree was inaugurated at N.Y.U. Faculty skeptics gave us one year before the hook mercifully removed us. Today it is sad, in some ways, to report that we are deemed as respectable as Music, Painting, Sculpture, Literature, Architecture and the Theatre. Motion pictures is enthroned as the Eighth Muse, and in the academic cloister you can observe her matronly spread beside her older and somewhat over-rouged sisters. There was a time when she was considered by dons and deans to be the tart from Third Avenue. Nowadays Miss Cathode Ray is the upstart brat. What this has done to Dame Cinema is to add years to her respectability.

A mere decade ago only a few colleges offered courses in motion pictures. They were called, in the uplift tradition, "appreciation courses." The first of these was inaugurated also at New York University, back in 1923, and listed under what is flatteringly called "adult education."

Today over 150 colleges and universities are giving motion picture courses for credit toward degrees. Today a would-be writer, director, producer can major in the subject at Boston University, University of Southern California, University of California at Los Angeles, University of North Carolina, and elsewhere. New York University remains the only four-year major in the country.

No Popcorn

Looking back from this 10th anniversary the changes and additions, which at the time seemed gradual, are now more clearly marked. Whereas the faculty vote which inaugurated the program was excitingly close, the faculty recently voted unanimously, on a point of policy, to uphold the Department. On the 10th anniversary we find we have nine times more enrollment than when we began. We have added new courses, not without the accompaniment of eyebrow maneuvers, in such subjects as Motion Picture Theatre Management, Film Cutting & Editing, Motion Picture Industry, and Television.

It is interesting to note that TV came in back in 1944 before the academicians, as well as the TV entrepreneurs, knew much about the medium. The inclusion of the course in TV was felt to be a necessary evil, something like the study of a communicable social disease. Today, however, over half of the graduates of that course, as well as the Department, are actively engaged in TV. They are on networks and individual stations in production, writing, and camera assignments. They also shoot and edit films expressly for TV. As one graduate recently told me, "TV's like movies, Prof., the way you taught it in the history course, when we were learning about Mack Sennett."

The three cautions which were posted 10 years ago still hold: (1) The courses are not designed to train technicians. (2) Talent a prerequisite. (3) No employment placement is ensured. There's still no known substitute for talent, but we can and have enriched all shades of talent.

While the majority of our students commute to class by subway, we have had foreign students from Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Germany, Cuba, Mexico, Puerto Rico, Israel, and France. Among the girls the best known have been Miroslava Stern who had the lead in "The Brave Bulls." Among the boys have been Malvin Wald, writer and producer in Hollywood.

No Flickery Bait

We have avoided tie-ins with studio and star publicity, while at the same time our guest lecturers have been strictly legit. We have had the following people: G. W. Bitzer on being Griffith's cameraman, Orson Welles on "Citizen Kane," John Garfield on acting, Luise Rainer on acting, Rouben Mamoulian on color, Elia Kazan on directing, Sol Lesser on production, Donald Ogden Stewart on screen writing, Arthur L. Mayer on theatre distribution, J. Arthur Rank, and others.

Looking back on such a short span it's hard to measure the record. Education is like clothes, it is very personal. Who can say that we would have had such playwrights as Sidney Howard, S. N. Behrman, Philip Barry, etc., if Professor G. P. Baker had not had a workshop at Yale? On the other hand, as individualistic a writer as Tennessee Williams confesses that his drama studies at Iowa speeded his maturity. We cannot instill talent in a student who is talentless. A neophyte writer who has studieed motion pictures as a student will write with more understanding, and possibly success, than one who began from scratch. If he has talent, he will write a better script.

Perhaps the most valuable contribution we have made over the past 10 years has been to enhance the general enjoyment of good films by an educated audience. According to our system of analysis, which is rather detailed and technically explicit, we have ruined more mediocre films for more students than Hollywood could do itself.

"I used to tolerate poor pictures," one student remarked, "but now I suffer when they are bad."

On the other hand, the pleasure derived from the better film is enhanced by a fuller appreciation of art and technique, which would have remained hidden to the uninitiated. Just as college courses in literature have developed over the years an ever-expanding audience for good books, so in our small way do these appreciation courses create an audience far beyond the small coterie of the so-called art theatres. A good story is good boxoffice, and as long as there will be more people appreciating good stories we will have a healthy boxoffice.

This applies to TV as well. The Mack Sennett vaudeville acts on TV will give way to more adult humor. Knowledge never desensitized a gourmet's palate. On the other hand, it never could make a gourmet out of an inveterate bean-eater. All in all, the next 10 years for us, I suspect, will be as exciting as the first. Anniversaries, as VARIETY knows, are not always respectable.

Notes From My Bureau Drawer

By ERIC JOHNSTON

(President, Motion Picture Association of America)

Washington.

It's good to be back again—in show business—after more than 10 months with the Federal Government as Administrator of the Economic Stabilization Agency.

The generous welcome home was wonderful, too, and made easier some of the good-byes I had to say when I left the employ of the United States of America. One editorial writer summed up my leaving this way:

"What he regarded as a patriotic duty earned for him nothing but the dubious distinction of being charged with various forms of un-Americanism by a number of his fellow citizens who disagreed violently with everything he did while agreeing enthusiastically that he was just the man to be doing it."

Someone said this reminded him of Swanson on a street car—sic transit gloria!

There are many satisfactions, many frustrations, pleasant associations and unpleasant ones about Government service. I think I learned a lot—most of it the hard way. I hope I acquired both a broader and more intimate understanding of the ways of Washington and the democratic process. And if I helped in any measure to speed the defense mobilization program or make its course more orderly, I am well repaid for 10 months of my life. Because, above all else in America and in the free world, we must be strong enough, both militarily and economically, to defend ourselves against Communist aggression. Our istence is at stake.

During the first few days in office, surrounded by the career administrative people, personnel experts, budget experts, operations experts, the lads who know how to fill out the forms and route the papers which are the sine qua non of government, I felt that I was hearing a foreign language being spoken. Federalese is a patois all its own. What I heard was strangely reminiscent of my boyhood days in school when a science teacher defined the aurora borealis thusly:

When the molaphigiostical temperature of the horizon becomes such as to colorasize the impurient indentations of the hemispheres analogy, thus affected a rapid change takes place in the thorumbumter of the corbustus of the aquiversale which can be seen only when it is visible.

But not all the language I heard in Government was a strange patois. A lot of it was familiar American, four-letter words and combinations thereof, mostly directed at me.

My education in semantics was surpassed only by my education in human anatomy. It didn't take me long to get a doctoral degree in that subject. I could write a thesis on the tenderness of man's economic toes. Step on them ever so lightly, and the howls will be heard to high Heaven—and to Congress.

That was one of the tough parts of the job. Do something that pleased someone and you could be sure you had displeased another. Nobody can lose friends faster than an administrator of economic controls, and I'm sure I qualify as the Dale Carnegie of former friendships.

One day at a luncheon with some Government officials and their wives I was mentioning some of the tougher aspects of my job—how any decision I made was sure to unloose a storm of protest.

One of the wives interjected that if I thought I had a tough job, I should have seen what her husband had to go through in a foreign assignment he had undertaken for the Government at the close of World War II. Why some of the decisions he had to make were so tough that popular resentment even rose against her. At one function an official of the country went so far as to refer to her as a "bitch."

Thereupon I arose from my seat at the luncheon table, extended my hand to her and said: "Mother, meet your son!"

Whenever I met this lady after that, she always addressed me as "son."

Once she so addressed me and one of my companions said:

"I didn't know she was your mother."

"She really isn't," I replied, "but we have a relationship I am sure you wouldn't understand."

Not all ladies were as understanding as that wife.

In the early days of the Stabilization program a large group of workers came to Washington to seek a wage increase. The delegates were of both sexes.

The discussions got pretty heated at times while I was trying to explain why I could not allow the pay increase.

During a momentary lull in the proceedings I got my come-uppance from one of the ladies who turned to her neighbor and said in a loud voice:

"He's supposed to be from Hollywood, eh! But he's not so hot—we've got better than him walking the streets of Omaha!"

Soon after its establishment, labor members withdrew from participation in the work of the Wage Stabilization Board. It became my task to work out with management and labor an acceptable formula for reestablishment of the Board.

In the course of that task I held a series of 78 meetings with labor and management. Often I would confer all day with one group of negotiators and get both sides close to an agreement. But when we would resume talks the next day I would find a completely new set of delegates on hand. Management and labor sent in so many new teams that some days I thought I was playing Tennessee and other days I thought I was playing Michigan State.

But labor and management weren't always that far apart. Many times I had the impression they were ganging up on me. Once when I denied a request for a wage increase I wasn't surprised when labor protested. Any umpire can expect a beef when he calls a close one. But you don't often see the first baseman taking the runner's side in the argument. That's what happened though. Management joined in to say my ruling had been too tough.

After a while, however, nothing surprised me. Once an industrialist called at my office and demanded that I grant a wage increase to his employees.

I explained the importance of economic stability to the whole mobilization program and told him that we couldn't very well keep prices within bounds unless we preserved some balance on the wage side, too.

He agreed with everything I said. But his employees just had to have higher pay or he'd lose some of them and they'd be mighty hard to replace.

A few days later I attended a business meeting and I heard this same industrialist roundly denounce a "spineless Eric Johnston" who wanted to control prices for business but who was willing to give labor anything it asked for!

My stint in Washington would have seemed incomplete if I hadn't had some secretary trouble. On one of my first days I asked a young lady who had been assigned to my office to take some dictation. She replied that she didn't take shorthand. Since I had some urgent letters to get out I suggested that she take them on her typewriter. She didn't type. I finally managed to get her promoted to a better job.

I relate that incident reluctantly, however, because I found the overwhelming majority of federal employees to be able, hard working and devoted to the public interest. Far too much of the criticism that is heaped on the heads of bureaucrats has no foundation in fact.

Yes, it's good to be back in our industry, and, in company with old friends, to face the challenges of the new year.

Biography of a Word

By H. ALLEN SMITH

Along toward the end of 1950 a press association, devoting a small portion of its transmission time to the cultural aspects of contemporary living, carried an item from Hollywood proclaiming that a motion picture titled "Rhubarb" would soon go into production at Paramount. This item came to the attention of an association of rhubarb growers in Louisiana and an alert official of the organization sent off a letter par avion to Paramount, offering know-how cooperation, suggesting a promotional tie-in, and recommending that a qualified rhubarb grower be taken on as technical adviser.

H. Allen Smith

Paramount, of course, had no for a rhubarb grower because the picture had been envisioned without the employment of a single ratty stalk of rhubarb rhaaponticum, or common garden rhubarb. The film, in fact, would serve as convincing evidence that a new improper noun has become firmly embedded in the common speech of America. The word rhubarb, as it appears day after day in the American press, seldom has reference to pie-filling. In its new identity, it has been defined in Supplement II of H. L. Mencken's "The American Language" as baseball slang for "an altercation on the field." It has long since outgrown that definition. A larger explanation (quoted by Mr. Mencken) is contained in a novel called "Rhubarb," published in 1946 and written by me, using both hands. This second definition follows:

"Then and there the cat got his name—perhaps the only printable name he ever had—derived from a colloquialism insinuated into the Yankee vernacular by Red Barber, the baseball broadcaster. Mr. Barber in turn picked it up from the prose writings of Garry Schumacher and spread it to the far-wandering winds. In Mr. Barber's lexicon a rhubarb was a noisy altercation, a broil, a violent emotional upheaval brought on by epical dispute—such as whether one grown man had touched another grown man on the body with a ball the size of a smallish orange."

The word as thus defined has advanced into wide general usage during the last few years. In 1951 I saw it used to describe a dispute which arose at a session of the United Nations, and it appeared in a dispatch from the Far East, where a series of rhubarbs developed during the cease-fire talks in Korea. There are backstage rhubarbs today in opera, and a lost-generation rhubarb among the literati. I've been informed, too, that the editorial committees which pass upon new words for our standard dictionaries are engaging in small rhubarbs themselves over the question of recognizing the newcomer.

British Version

So far as I can find out, the word has had but one previous incarnation in the lexicon of slang. Among British dockworkers a rhubarb was a loan, so denominated "because of its ruddy length." In my own experience I can recall another specialized use of the word. During the 1930s it was employed as a method of stimulating crowd noises in radio broadcasts. Someone discovered that if the script called for the hum and buzz of conversation in a crowd, the effect could be best achieved by having everyone in the studio say, "Rhubarb and rhubarb and rhubarb and rhubarb . . ."

The Rhubarb of the novel and the motion picture is cat—an extraordinarily mean and supercilious and cantankerous cat, therefore lovable. Through inheritance this cat becomes the owner of a major league baseball team. Inasmuch as the novel and, more particularly the movie, have helped to solidify the word's acceptance, I would like to explain that I almost went to the well without it. When I started writing the book I wanted to give the cat a name out of baseball jargon, and most of the baseball jargon I knew had been acquired from the radio broadcasts of the aforementioned Red Barber.

When a ball team was engaged in a wild and frenetic scoring rampage, he would sometimes say, "They're sure tearin 'up the pea patch!" When I first began composing my inimitable vulgarities about the cat, I named him Peapatch. About halfway through the book, however, I grew dissatisfied with my hero's name—it sounded just a trifle too cute—and so I changed it to Rhubarb. Then when Paramount bought the picture rights to the book, I felt almost certain that they would change the name of the cat and the title of the story as a matter of policy. I was fully prepared to see my cat on the screen as Eggplant, or Okra, or Kohlrabi, or Gooseberry. But never once was any such change suggested.

The book itself had a wide circulation with the consequence that a great many people around the country began naming their own cats Rhubarb. One of these was a cat inhabiting a beer parlor in the neighborhood of Cornell University. The lady proprietor of this establishment not only named her cat Rhubarb, but had trained him to walk up and down the bar with a small stalk of garden rhubarb in his teeth.

My own favorites among the real Rhubarbs, however, was an outsize tomcat belonging to a doctor in a small Missouri town. This Missouri Rhubarb could turn electric lights on and off by leaping at the wall switches, and he was a pool shark. The doctor had a pool table in his home. He would scatter the 15 balls over the table, then say, "Your shot, Rhubarb." The cat would leap onto the table and using both paws, swiftly pocket all 15 balls. I have not seen him perform this feat but I believe the story. If the doctor had told me that he pocketed the balls in rotation—beginning with the No. 1 ball and going on up to No. 15—then I would have suspected that the doctor was lying. He made no such claim. The cat shot straight pool.

Not That Educated!

As to the etymology of rhubarb—it appears that there is a definite relationship between the two widely divergent meanings of the word. Let us take, first, the plant. It got its name from the Greek rheon barbaron, meaning something that comes from the barbarous country of the Rha (Volga) River. The plant has thick succulent petioles, and these petioles are loaded with chrysarobin, calcium oxalate, rheotannic acid, emodin, sporrhetin and mucilage. I have heard that the leaves are poisonous and that the rhubarb circulios, which are bugs, stay away from them, devoting their energies to boring holes in the petioles.

If I were a rhubarb grower—if my family fortune and fame derived from the cultivation of rhubarb—I believe that I would resent the new connotation of the word, and I might even launch a movement to change the name of my product altogether. Pieplant would do—in many sections of the United States rhubarb is generally addressed by that name. It is also called, in various localities, wine plant, apple-cabbage and apple-peru. Along the Maine coast it is known as rhubub.

There is significance in the fact that rhubarb has for centuries occupied a prominent position in the world's pharmacopoeia. The dried rhizomes and roots of certain Chinese and Tibetan varieties have long been valued as a purgative and as a stomachic bitter. And the medicinal value of ordinary garden rhubarb has been known to generations of American mothers. Which brings us to Garry Schumacher.

Mr. Schumacher, currently on the staff of the N. Y. Giants, spent many years as a baseball writer with the N. Y. Journal-American. He is a native of the Greenpoint section of Brooklyn. He has informed me that when he was a boy, the mothers of Greenpoint held firmly to the belief that rhubarb was essential to the good health of their children, that seasonal dosages of rhubarb would invigorate them and permit them to fight like bobcats and thus get along in the world. In the Greenpoint springtimes of 40 years ago every kid had a rhubarb routine to follow. The moment school was out, it was ordained that he go straight home where his mother would hand him a slice of bread with a portion of stewed rhubarb smeared on it. Mr. Schumacher admits that, as of today, he considers rhubarb to be a near-delicacy, but when he was a boy it bore the stigma of a medicament. It was good fuh ya, therefore it was revolting, and he and all his friends despised it as children despise castor oil.

They would scamper home then, after school, and get their rhubarb-smeared bread, then head at once for the street games that awaited them—street games that usually included whaling hell out of each other. The fighting sometimes started before the boys had finished off their rhubarb and it was not uncommon for a boy to find himself with rhubarb in his hair and down his neck and in his ears. In time, says Mr. Schumacher, the Greenpoint kids began referring to their happy play as rhubarbs—exclaiming through puffed lips, "Wotta rhubarb!"

Mr. Schumacher somehow grew up and the word disappeared into his subconscious and lay dormant there, like a rhubarb circulio with a bellyful of chrysarobin. Then one day around 1940 when he was assigned to chronicle the doings of the Brooklyn Dodgers, the Brooklyn manager, Leo Durocher, engaged in a particularly violent argument with an umpire, as was his wont. Dust was kicked, gloves were thrown, strong language flew, people were banished for inciting to riot . . . and that evening Mr. Schumacher was reflecting on the noble fury of the affair when the old Greenpoint cry rose out of his subconscious and he found himself exclaiming, "Wotta rhubarb!"

The phrase once resurrected stayed alive in his mind and he inserted it in his sports copy, and it appealed to Mr. Barber who was sorely in need of a new word to describe the antics of the rhubarbing Dodgers, and . . .

Well, it does seem a fur piece from the River Rha to a cat.

Short Shots

Hollywood.

In the original script the author led off with this philosophical bit for his "Treasure of Sierra Madre": "In Mexico buried treasure is an example of how kind nature consoles with shadows for want of substantials."

Arthur Murray tells the story of the two women who entered an Italian restaurant, and trying to impress the waiter with her cosmopolitan manner, the first woman scanned the menu and said: "Two orders of Guiseppe Verticelo." "I beg pardon, madam," replied the waiter. "That is the proprietor."

In the Irish Digest was this paid advertisement: "We appeal to every man and woman whose heart is not dead, to defend the defenseless and champion the cause of these poor creatures who cannot speak for themselves." It is signed: All Ireland Donkey Protection Society.

Ed Gray, the Hollywood agent, is responsible for selling "Jacobowski and the Colonel." He says that when the play first opened, two dolls standing in front of the marquee said thoughtfully: "What a title! How in the world would they pronounce it? Jacobowski and the what?"

No 'Variety' Piece This Year

By MARTIN FIELD

Hollywood.

Editor, VARIETY:

Yes, I got your note (it was in the middle of October). We're working on our 46th Anniversary Number, and please let me have it soonest. . . .

My subject came sooner than I expected, the very next night at a party. Writers. One of them reported breathlessly, "Columbia is looking like mad for a story for Princess Rita." A scripter who specialized in swashbucklers promptly visualized Rita as a pirate gal. Another, who wrote westerns, naturally thought she'd be great as a gal sheriff. The party was soon over, our hostess excusing herself to work on a glamor story treatment she hopefully titled "Hilda."

As for me, I went home all aglow, itching to get at my typewriter so I could start a VARIETY piece called "A Story for Susie," in which all the writers in Hollywood dropped everything to work a story especially tailored to Miss Hayworth's talents. Only I'd call her Susie Starr.

It looked good. I'd gotten as far as half of my first rough draft when, the following night, outside Schwab's drugstore, I met Lionel. Lionel was a writer who had recently been upped to producer. Also, he was not the same man I had known when he was a plain screen writer. His brow was furrowed, his large brown eyes were misted with suspicion and distrust as he told me, "Martin, I don't believe any of those stories they circulate in this town about Sam Goldwyn, Darryl Zanuck or Dore Schary. Look at me, a peaceful, home-loving man, faithful to his wife, kind to his relatives, as good as gold to his friends. But have you heard the stories people tell about me nowadays?"

He lighted a cigar, his hand trembling as he snapped a flame out of his gold lighter.

"Heaven knows I can't give everybody a job. So every one I turn down becomes an enemy. And suddenly I hear I'm the greatest wolf in Hollywood. No girl is safe with me, except my wife. The icest things I hear about myself are that I'm mean, I'm stingy, I'm a heel and a louse and a double no-good."

Lionel's Woes

When Lionel had finished telling me the price he was paying to be a producer, I went home chuckling. Not at the woes of Lionel, poor fellow, but at the VARIETY piece I saw leaping from my typewriter. "So You Want to Be a Producer?" was the title, and all it needed was straight reporting from Lionel's mouth. The little brunet who tried to cuddle him into giving her a role and was so vastly offended when he failed to respond that she endowed him with lavender tendencies to every one she met. The actors who pretended Lionel had sent for them to read for him when he had, in truth, never even heard of them. The agents who cursed him when he denied a client a part. The money man who fell in love with an ingenue and insisted that Lionel hire her for every picture. The once-famous producer of spectacular film flops who tried to chisel his way into Lionel's producing setup.

Yes, that piece about Lionel was all set until I ran into Jeff. Jeff was a writer who once sold a story for $40,000 and had been trying to repeat for the last five years. His tall, lean, tweeded figure was coming out of an agent's office on Beverly Drive when he spotted me. (I was going to my dentist.) He took a firm grip at the screenplay under his arm and with his free hand clutched my shoulder.

"The time isn't right," he moaned.

"What time?" I asked.

'What's the Write Time?'

Jeff jerked back his head, toward his agent's office. "For five years I've been hearing the time isn't right," he explained. "For selling a story, that is." He whipped out a pocket calendar. "Here, let me show you. January? Why, people are just getting over Christmas and New Year's. Give 'em a chance to get unwound. February? Very short month. How much can you do? Before you know it, it's March. March? Income tax month! How can you expect a producer to worry about your story when he's busy with Uncle Share-the-wealth? April? Spring fever, you dope. Can't expect a man with yawns to concentrate on a script. May? Weather's too nice. A man's gotta get some golf in, you know. June? Everybody's east this time of year. Don't you love New York in June? July? Too busy getting the boat ready in Newport. Besides, did you ever hear of a game called baseball? Also, horseracing, beach parties and yachting. Also, the mountains, fishing and golf. August? Repeat July. September? Got to see the exhibitors. Big conference in Chicago. October? World Series. November? Football. Thanksgiving. Palm Springs. December? You crazy? Christmas and New Year's!"

"Tough, Jeff," I sympathized.

"My agent is a man who wouldn't give me the right time," he summarized sadly.

This sort of thing kept up. Before I could set down Jeff's story, which I called "What's the Write Time?" I met a producer who was mad at a writer. It seems this writer had written a book with the producer as a favorable character then, just because the producer fired him, the writer switched the character in the book in the next edition. To a nasty. These writers are so vengeful. And I started work on a fresh piece called "The Writer and the Producer."

But what happens? I came across the story about the gold-plated thermos bottle. In Hollywood, ulcers is a very fashionable ailment. People drink half-and-half for it. (For the benefit of easterners, half-and-half is half milk and half sweet cream.) So a producer out of a job applied to the head of a studio who was about to turn him down when he saw the producer take a swig of half-and-half out of a gold-plated thermos. P.S.: He got the job. And then there was the story about the set worker who innocently walked through the studio street with his thermos of coffee in his hand and before he could say Jack L. Warner he was whisked into a suite of offices and told he was a producer. The new mark of success, the thermos of cream.

By this time I got your second letter, "Please consider this a gentle second reminder, as tempus is fugiting." Your letter set me to running all over the house, picking up notes. "A Story for Susie." "So You Want to Be a Producer?" "What's the Write Time?" "The Gold-Plated Thermos."

Truly, I was confronted by a fearful situation. Four stories for VARIETY. And not one of them ready.

So, now that it's deadline time, I'm writing you this explanation. No VARIETY piece this year. I do hope you understand.

Never again. Next year I promise I'll keep away from writers' parties, from Schwab's, from Beverly Drive and my dentist. I'll just stay home with your letter until I give birth.

Forgive me?

Zalways,
Martin.

U in General Denial Of A-C's Pact Suit

Making a general denial of all allegations and claims, Universal asked dismissal of the Abbott & Costello suit against it and Realart Pictures in answers filed last week in N. Y. Federal Court. U also claimed that A. & C. had confirmed all of the alleged acts charged and accepted all benefits of the contract, thereby waiving all causes of action.

Abbott-Costello filed suit two months ago for $5,000,000, charging that Universal attempted to defraud them. U's defense stated all it owed is a $13,962 balance. Also that this was offered to A. & C. and refused.

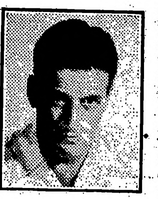
It was cited by Universal that A. & C. had entered an agreement whereby the team and U were to share on a 50-50 basis in rentals from all Abbott-Costello shorts. U claimed this deal was made as settlement of all claims against the company. Another point made by U was that the team had been guilty of waiting too long in filing the suit.

Pix Can't Live By Bigness Alone

By STANLEY KRAMER

Hollywood.

Obviously the film industry as it has been constituted couldn't long survive just producing blockbusters, which I assume mean pictures that are replete with thousands of plunging horses and necklines, plus gigantic, spectacular, lavish situations and expenditures of millions of dollars. In the final analysis, we are a story-telling medium, and our success depends directly upon our ability to select and tell stories well. If we must substitute size for all of the other well-tested elements that comprise expert story telling, we belong in the circus business instead of motion pictures. It is possible that a wave of the super-colossal will engulf the industry. One success always sets off a number of copies, thus paving the way for a new cycle which merely repeats the process.



Stanley Kramer

For our part, we will continue to seek out the best stories we can find and which, in our opinion, are satisfying to tell in the motion picture medium. We will do them, as well as seek, within as reasonable a cost as possible and hope that our judgment will be confirmed by more than casual theatre attendance.

It takes no crystal gazer to reduce the entire subject to the fact that TV will continue to compete on a growing basis for the public's entertainment time. This new medium, potentially fluent in great story-telling, unbeatable as a ringside viewer of current events, sports and public gatherings, surely will hit further into motion picture theatre receipts. I don't think anyone will argue that our motion picture houses can command as much entertainment time as they could before TV existed. Therefore, as new stations are constructed, new programs developed, we must face realistically the increased competition.

The Approach Daring

We can either decide that we will meet curtailment by operating at reduced costs for restricted grosses, or we can, by daring approaches to subject matter and production methods, try to meet the threat of TV by widening our present motion picture market. I recommend the latter. Since it is pretty well accepted by the industry at large that we always made pictures mainly for an 18 to 25 age bracket, I think the opportunity is wide open for us to win over millions of ex-patrons, 25 years of age and over, by serving them up more mature productions better suited to their more mature tastes. This presents the exciting possibility of turning a shrinking market into an expanding one by placing a greater variety of more exciting kinds of stories before the public.

With other costs going up, it doesn't seem reasonable that film costs can be pared. All we can do is to be vigilant in the selection of subject matter so that nothing is made which cannot be given the full treatment on a sensible budget basis. This, of course, leaves the field wide open to a producer's judgment because one subject may be a boxoffice bargain at a million and a half, while another is a piece of junk at $125,000. After all, a producer should be prepared to accept this kind of responsibility.

We are working on new techniques all the time, but I don't believe that the consideration of cost reduction alone contains any of the answers to what we commonly call all boxoffice ills. Again I say, the challenge of TV, or public apathy, or anything else, can be met only through the kinds of stories we select. We will survive on a healthy growing market if we can find and tell better stories than anyone else can. As someone said to me recently, no one needs to leave the house these days to see a "B" picture.

An 18-Year-Old Marine Stirs Some Memories

By GEORGE SIDNEY

Hollywood.

A group of Marines recently came through the Metro lot on an escorted tour. They had seen a lot of tough combat service in Korea and were back in the States, thanks to the rotation system. They were seeing a film studio for the first time, and I volunteered to help show them around, since I knew the lot so well.

One of the boys looked exceedingly young. He had just passed 18—had fibbed about his age and was bucking an unrelenting enemy when barely 17.

That night at home I got to wondering what it was like 17 or 18 year ago, when this battle-hardened veteran of Korea was still wearing diapers.

Bing Crosby was almost a veteran even then, having been in three features, "We're Not Dressing," "She Loves Me Not" and "Here Is My Heart." Bob Hope was making Vitaphone shorts in New York between out-of-town vaude.

Educational, Hal Roach and Mascot Serials were production companies people still talked about. Charlie Chase was about the funniest thing on the screen. John Wayne was turning out 10 cowboy pictures a year. Ralph Staub's "Screen Snapshots" were already an established film institution. So was Pete Smith. Walter Futter hadn't yet earned the profits in "Africa Speaks," but was doing well with his Travelaugh shorts.

Dumas Pretty Popular

The writing credits for the year included Alexander Dumas, who wrote something called "The Count of Monte Cristo," which, it seems, was made into a picture by Edward Small, who later reissued it 12 times, had new prints struck off, and regenerated his bank account with something they now call "residuals" and then television profits.

Graham Baker and Gene Towne got as much publicity as Wald and Krasna—but even then the W-K combo had already teamed up on the writing of "20 Million Sweethearts." And just to show you how people do get around in Hollywood, Max Arnow was then at Warner Bros., Sammy Lee was a top dance director, LeRoy Prinz was at Paramount, Mack Gordon was knocking out a song called "Did You Ever See a Dream Walking?" Ben Hecht made an excursion into production with "Crime Without Passion," Buddy DeSylva was lured from Broadway to Fox to write and produce, Jack LaRue was the great threat to George Raft, Shirley Temple was making a big hit in "Little Miss Marker" and people who saw "It Happened One Night," made by Columbia, were talking about a chap named Clark Gable, who had been borrowed, it seems, from Metro.

George Burns and Gracie Allen were in great demand. Heather Angel was a boxoffice attraction. Dick Arlen was killing them in such blockbusters as "Come On Marines" and "Let 'Em Have It." George Arliss had just given his inimitable imitation of Rothschild and was heading for the robes of "Cardinal Richelieu." Henry Armetta was making people laugh, despite the tailend of a depression and the inroads of legalized grog joints. Edward Arnold had just made his first bid for the White House in "The President Vanishes." And Jean Arthur was getting her foot on the ladder of stardom in "Whirlpool." Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire were dancing their heads off in "The Gay Divorcee." There was a new cowboy star named Gene Autry, and he sang with the help of a guitar. Baby LeRoy was the hit of the year, and George Barbier was trying to sidetrack a few laughs for himself in the never-to-be-forgotten "Miss Fain's Baby Is Stolen."

John Barrymore had just made his most famous journey in "20th Century," with Carole Lombard, and Binnie Barnes was an exciting import from England. Barbara Barondess was in a picture called Eight Girls In a Boat." Lionel Barymore had a great role in "Treasure Island," and talented little Freddie Bartholomew was looking forward to "David Copperfield." Carol Ann Beery, now a full-fledged nightclub singer, was promised a role with Wally Beery in "China Seas," which was to be one of the greatest successes for Jean Harlow.

John Boles was trying to avoid singing roles and concentrate on his acting talents. And death had just taken William "Stage" Boyd, ending the similarity in names which had caused so much confusion between him and the William Boyd who, as Hopalong Cassidy, was later to rate a half-interest in the United States Mint. Only, those days, "Hopalong" Boyd was glad to be playing in "Flaming Gold" and "Cheaters." Alice Brady was trying for a comeback, and Mary Brian was called the "sweetest girl on the screen." That was the year, too, that Carl Brisson was making feminine hearts flutter, little thinking that his son Freddie would some day be a producer. Rita Cansino (that's how she was billed) was appearing in "Under the Pampas Moon" and "Charlie Chan in Egypt." An Italian named Tullio Carminati started to do big things. Whatever happened to him after Ellis Island? Lew Cody didn't realize that the Great Stage Manager had already put his number up on the board and was working hard. And one of the real good actors of the day was Walter Connolly.

Marion Davies, Andy Devine

Others at the top of the ladder included Marion Davies, Andy Devine, Louise Dresser, Dolores Del Rio, Jimmy Dunn, Irene Dunne ("This Man Is Mine"), Jimmy Durante, Sally Ellers, Douglas Fairbanks ("The Private Life of Don Juan"), William Farnum (fighting for a comeback), Alice Faye, Peggy Fears, Stepin Fetchit (who owned two limousines), W. C. Fields (just graduated from Mack Sennett comedies), Errol Flynn, Dick Foran (what a voice!), John Gilbert and Greta Garbo (in "Queen Christina"), Janet Gaynor, Alan Hale, Ann Harding, Helen Hayes, Ralph Holmes, Jack Holt, Miriam Hopkins. Hedda Hopper, Edward Everett Horton, Henry Hull, Dean Jagger, Buck Jones, Tim McCoy, Ken Maynard, Tom Mix, Yakima Canutt, Charles Laughton and Harold Lloyd. Myrna Loy hadn't yet heard about diplomacy on an international scale and was playing opposite Clark Gable in "Manhattan Melodrama," with William Powell.

Mitchell and Durant were still a team, and Jack Mulhall hoped he would have a return to the good old days. Eddie Nugent was an actor, Edna Mae Oliver was one of the biggest laugh-makers on the screen, and Franklin Pangborn was already a hotel clerk. Gail Patrick was a screen star instead of a store proprietess and baseball authority, and Joe Penner was asking everybody: "Wanna Buy a Duck?" while Jack Pearl was finding out that Baron Munchausen was okay for radio, but not so hot for the screen.

Tops on the star list were the Powells—Dick, Eleanor and William. Will Rogers was still top man in his field, and May Robson was the screen's Grand Dame. Cesar Romero hadn't attained the fame of whiskey advertising, as yet, but he was doing okay as an actor, while Mickey Rooney was just being graduated from Columbia shorts. The columnists were writing about "talented and beautiful" Barbara Stanwyck in "Gambling Lady," and Hollywood was enchanted with the English mannerisms of C. Aubrey Smith and Sir Guy Standing.

And there were Kent Taylor, Margaret Sullavan, Thelma Todd, Franchot Tone (playing in "Gentlemen Are Born"), Rudy Vallee, Henry B. Walthall, H. B. Warner, Alice White, Warren William, Fay Wray and the Youngs—Clara Kimball, Loretta, Robert and Roland.

And now of the inevitable. Where was I 17-18 years ago? Oh! I was a Metro guide taking sightseers through the studio.

Clippings Collector

By JO RANSON

Some muggs collect pocket fuzz. I manage to fill my pockets with a curious assortment of newspaper clippings and scribbled foolscap, a habit I picked up from an old managing editor of mine.

I have carried around as many as 33 cuttings and 17 notes in my pockets, vest included, at one time. Agate and Old Luce, my wife would say, as she went through my pockets in search of doubloons.

Collecting clippings can be a mighty messy business for a mugg with three pairs of slacks, three plaid sports jackets and one conservative blue serge suit with a vest and inside pocket. Comes the moment in the life of man when the good wife doth say how about sending all the pants and all the jackets and the one vest to the cleaners for a much-needed pressing.

The husband starts disgorging the contents of his pockets (there are approximately 16 pockets in the average man's suit, I heard tell on the Answer Man program) and 20 minutes later he manages to dig himself from under a Himalaya of mishmash cuttings. He finally extricates himself from a pile of N. Y. Times crossword puzzles, the Literati section of VARIETY, Winchell observations on the fragrance of New York City, other columns and scraps of paper bearing cryptic notations about certain good ones in the fourth and fifth at Pimlico.

I usually take these clippings and stuff them into the pockets of the suit I'm wearing at the moment. My pockets bulge like a busy bookie at the end of a betting day in the good old Harry Gross days. I know that when my other clothes return from the cleaners I shall once again distribute the clippings and the notes to their respective flannel-lined jungles. I've been known to transfer this strange and frequently unrelated material from one trouser pocket to another for months and sometimes years on end.

Tragedy In Flushing

I have carried a Meyer Berger N. Y. Times clipping in my pocket since Monday, Oct. 28, 1940. Can anyone else make that claim? Berger's story, beautifully written, tells of the last days of the World's Fair. Berger described the scene of the fair at Mad Meadow, Great Marsh, Tragic Tract, Purple Prairie, Fanciful Fen and other appropriate tags for the goings-on under the large shadow of the Trylon and Perisphere in Flushing Meadows.

There is a passage in Berger's piece I have reread many times, because it is that good. "Downcast and solemn, we trudged Fanciful Fen for the last time," the Times man wrote. "It was night. The fountains played, the buildings glowed. We thought, men will always remember these acres. They will recall how culture was spread among the peoples who stood here. Under Carl Milles' 'astronomer,' the heroic sculpture near the foot of the Helicline, we looked benevolently on a father instructing his son. The boy said: 'What's that pop?' Pop said: 'That's a statue of a man. Someone just threw a rock at him. He has picked up the rock and he is looking around for the guy that threw it.' The boy said: 'Oh!' We moved quietly on, up Petticoat Lane, up Long Island Ramp, forever out of the World of Tomorrow."

For a long time I housed various quotes of the late John Erskine, novelist, and English prof at Columbia University, and Henry Mencken, the belligerent Baltimorean bubble-burster. Erskine was in the habit of saying that if radio is an art "as I believe it is, you have to remember, first of all, that an art must give pleasure." The prof went on to say that there are many books on esthetics but only two problems in esthetics. "One is to get the audience to come in," he said. "The other is to get it to stay in. Radio is the easiest of all arts to walk out on."

The Mencken clipping declared that "what we need on the air is not more propaganda—but less. The proposal to turn over a quarter of all the broadcasting stations to educational agencies is one that points to a dubious conclusion. The people tire of being bombarded by arguments. The radio can best serve them by making them happy. It might achieve that business better. It might show them that there are nobler ways of being happy. But such attempts must be made with great care, lest the listeners be scared off." That Mencken feller, he's a real bird, I thought.

My vest pockets have been lined with Fred Allen gags. One of them dealt with an Allen visit to the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minn. After a checkup at the clinic, Allen cracked: "The Drs. Mayo certainly ran a tumor into quite a town." I used that gag, with credit to Allen, on a dozen medics I know. Another prize clipping I carried around for a long time came from VARIETY of 10 years ago. It was a lulu about Buddy Baer who, after a severe punching around by Joe Louis, got up from the canvas and groaned these press-agent syllables into the microphone: "I'll explain everything next Wednesday night on the Fred Allen program."

The trouble with accumulating newsprint clippings in your pockets is that they disintegrate before you can say Bodoni over bologna. On occasion, I've reached into my side pockets for a favorite clipping, only to discover that it had dissolved into hundreds of pieces. When these things happen my wife gets angry because the damn stuff gets all over the parlor rug and our vacuum cleaner doesn't pick up fragmented, flaked and yellowed clippings.

Several friends and some of my bored acquaintances have suggested that I microfilm the clippings in my pants pockets. They point out that on one small roll—no larger than a baby's palm—there are many hundreds of pages. Just think of the highly efficient stacking space in my side pockets, they say, and how much easier it will be when I have to empty my pockets before sending the clothes to the cleaners.

I must look into this microfilming biz. I hope they sell a film reader with a good screen that I can shove into a back pocket of my pants. This device could easily change my wife's whole outlook on the subject of clippings.

GBS and Winnie

Jerry Stagg, of the William Morris Agency, is a Shavian anthologist and his latest anecdote has to do with the time G. Bernard Shaw invited Winston Churchill to an opening, "Bring friend, if you can find one."

Churchill replied, "Sorry, I can't come for your premiere but I will attend some other night, if there is another."

'Best 73'

The telegraph code symbol "73," meaning "Best regards" or "My best compliments," came into being in the 1870s when representatives of a dozen commercial telegraph companies worked out a list of arbitrary numbers which could be used by telegraph operators to express common phrases or instructions in brief form, thereby speeding up the handling of messages. Other symbols included "1," which meant "Wait a minute," and "7," which was flashed to mean "Am busy on another circuit." And "30" which now everybody knows, means "the end."

These coded symbols were quickly adopted by press service telegraph operators who already were masters in the art of dot-dash abbreviation. And when wireless came into being its operators also adopted most of these symbols.

A good example of the use of these coded abbreviations is found in a message which Harry Sadenwater, Navy wireless operator on the NC-flying boats, flashed in 1919 on the first transatlantic flight: "Great biz, OM, 73"—which meant: "Great Busi Old Man, Best Regards."

The Day Hollywood Stood Still

DR. SPACE

I'm not talking about sailing but about budgets. You can't do much about overhead, or actors' salaries; some are still worth $400,000 a picture. But the waste lies, as we see it, in the Writing Costs! In the early days the D. W. Griffiths depended very little on the writer. Then came the talking picture and suddenly, God only knows why, the screenwriter became a necessary thorn in your side—and the bank's side, too! He organized the Screen Writers Guild—he got himself agents—he wanted Saturdays off—came in all hours—but that was the least of it! He wanted pictures based on adult themes——

(There are low mumblings, "Dirty intellectual troublemakers!")

DR. SPACE

Instead of good old fashioned showmanship, insisting that there isn't just one public with the taste of a teen-ager, but many publics, some with an appetite and appreciation for intelligent entertainment. (low murmurs and curses) The result—overpaid underworked, rebellious writers. Now are you going to keep on taking that hooey from them?

EXECUTIVES

(in chorus)

No!

A LEVEL HEADED PRODUCER

But what are we going to do? We're too busy or we'd write the scripts ourselves.

DR. SPACE

I believe we have the answer. (he turns and calls towards the ship) Hack! Platitude, Cliche, Showmanship, Know-how——

(There is the SOUND of The Thing's crate splintering, then a second, and a Huge Steel Robot appears and clanks with measured mighty tread down the ramp to the side of Doctor Space.)

DR. SPACE

Gentlemen, you see before you the first Mechanical Screenwriter, Robert Robot, or as the board of the bank calls him —"The Thinking Machine." (There is an awed silence.)

2D LEVEL HEADED PRODUCER

But—does it really work, Doctor?

DR. SPACE

Robert is a man of millions of words based on your favorite seven plots, everything classified and cross-classified. If you want a story with heart you just press the button marked HEART (presses button over Robot's heart). And every classification is subdivided. For example—under Heart, there is B. HEART WITH AFFLICTIONS. Then the kinds of afflictions. You'll find "Of Human Bondage" under Clubfoot in love with tart—the button reading simply HEART AND TART.

3D LEVEL HEADED PRODUCER

(excitedly examining buttons)

You've got all the neuroses and complexes indexed?

DR. SPACE

They're all here. Under N, for instance, you'll find NOSE. (presses Robot's nose)

ROBERT ROBOT

(speaking in mechanical tones)

Theme—Boy is born without nose. Girl has faith in him and teaches him how to smell.

DR. SPACE

For the TITLE (presses another button)

ROBERT ROBOT

"Night Without Nostrils."

DR. SPACE

They're all here. Foolproof. Adventure yarns—Westerns (indicates another row of buttons) Meaty dramas like "King Solomon's Delicatessen," psychological stuff like "Nancy Goes to Pieces"—You want a Big City Triangle? Just press it. (Presses triangular shaped button on Robot's groin) You can listen to the big finish without having to wade through the whole script.

ROBERT ROBOT

(a mechanical throb in his voice)

FADE-IN: INTERIOR PENTHOUSE LIVING ROOM NIGHT—TWOSHOT—JOHN AND BETTY. Betty: "John I'm fed up with this tinsel existence—the jewels the theatre these thick carpets, where has it all gotten us? What do we add up to? Mr. and Mrs. Zero. Is it any wonder I turned to Leland? I'm going away with you, John. He's so much more fun than you in every way——"

(A bell inside the Robot's brain rings interrupting.)

DR. SPACE

This is the Breen Office warning bell. It rings automatically—(to Robot) Rewind, Robert.

(The studio brass crowd forward, their interest mounting.)

ROBERT ROBOT

(after a pause)

"I was going off with him, John but I realize what a fool I've been and I want you to take me back—" John: "Take you back! A girl no better than those I could find on the streets! What have you done to pay for your sins?" Betty: "Look, John." John: "My God, two broken legs!" Betty: "He pushed me off the ladder as I tried to get on that plane that's taking him to South America." John: "And you crawled to me from the airport like that?" Betty: "Yes, you know how hard it is to get a cab at this hour." John: "You have suffered!" Betty: "Oh, John, be careful, my arms are fractured too." John: "I'm afraid my heart is the same." Betty: "Let's grow well together, shall we, John?" Music Up. Fade Out.

DR. SPACE

There—and we're working on "Melody Max," a musical robot to replace composers.

(The astounded executives and producers press forward with eager cries.)

1ST EXECUTIVE

I'll take a dozen!

2D EXECUTIVE

Me too! (There is a chorus of "Me toos.")

DR. SPACE

Don't crowd! I'll take your orders—we're gearing for production——

1ST LEVEL HEADED PRODUCER

Can I order a woman writer—I need someone who understands the feminine angle?

DR. SPACE

I'm afraid Fanny Robot is still in the experimental stage. We haven't found an iron figleaf that will stand the gaff.

POINTED-HEADED PRODUCER

Will they come in on time?

DR. SPACE

Six a. m. on the dot. No lunch, or sick leave or holidays— (several producers clap their hands in glee).

(Breen Office bell rings in the Robot.)

It's all right, Robert.

2D LEVEL HEADED PRODUCER

Who are you?

SAM ROBOT

(in raspy voice)

Sam Clinchmetal, Bob's agent. My boy is loaded with talent but remember he's a member of the Screen Robot Writers Guild so we gotta have iron clad contracts! Get the picture?

(The earth starts to tremble. Then suddenly from over the horizon come clanking thousands of mechanical agents. The producers shriek, collide and run amok. The three Doctors defending themselves with their Flit guns gai the safety of the ship and take off once again, this time in search of a finish. MUSIC UP.)

FADE OUT. THE END

From Rugs to Riches

By BURNET HERSHEY

Some future chronicler of obscure footnotes to history may one day record the recent passing of Sam Tatarian in England, about the same time that the London Minister's Conference passed from the front page into history.

When I covered the Versailles Conference for the N. Y. Sun I ran into a swarthy little Armenian rugdealer, Sam Tatarian, who had amassed a respectable half million or so dollars in a lifetime of scouring the Near East for rare loomings to cover the varnished new floors of Western oil magnates. Like Lord Balfour, Sam, too was elegant in a snug cutaway, an over-burnished limousine staffed with footman and chauffeur, and an extraordinarily large and ornate dispatch case of tooled leather.

This Armenian appeared wherever the more important gatherings took place in Paris, Versailles, Geneva, Locarno, and although no one knew exactly who he was, his general getup swept him past guards and lesser functionaries as though he were a Balkan diplomat. Even the grim old tiger, Clemenceau, once cordially shook hands with him under the somewhat mystified impression that he had something to do with Bessarabia, then under discussion.

But the payoff came on the day the Treaty of Versailles was signed, when our Saroyanish friend, sleekly encased in his custaway, and with his incredible leather portfolio under his arm, rolled up to the Palace of Versailles, past the glittering ranked guard, through the great grille, right on to the entrance in the Cou du Marbre, where shortly the Big Four and all the scores of lesser signers would descend to perform their historic function. Waving off all proffered arms, the pompous little man ceremoniously opened that mysterious dispatch case, took out a superbly beautiful prayer rug and laid it reverently on the door sill of the palace.

Lesser attaches were stupified. Only the Chef de Protocol himself recovered quickly enough to bustle forward and demand what sort of thing was going forward and why it should permit itself to happen at this so solemn moment. The Armenian tried desperately to oblige. In most atrocious French he excitedly made clear that he, too, had "a solemn mission." He had been discharging it with faithfulness at every preliminary meeting—the Crillon, the Ritz, the Palais Bourbon, everywhere—and now here was the supreme moment! "But why?" demanded the Chef de Protocol. "What is this rug?" Could it not be some species of electrical device—a Communist devilment to mass-assassinate the leaders of the democratic world? (In 1920 all mysteries were divided equally between "Bolshevists" and impossible electrical contrivances.)

"But no," pleaded the Armenian. He had all the credentials necessary. See, he had a letter from the Quai d'Orsay. However, was it too much to ask that this certified, but undelegated individual explain the purpose of his attendance at this great gathering—and what was the meaning of the rug?

It was very simple, he explained. All he wanted was to have the great men of the world walk on his rug—a small affair, but the finest example of rug-making in existence and worth not less than $10,000. As soon as all the Great Ones had arrived, walked on his rug into the palace, he would fold it up, rush it back to his apartment in Paris and then instantly pass over it a vacuum cleaner, taking careful note as to whose foot had been placed where. Each footprint would be carefully vacuumed by itself, and the resultant dust, extracted from the cleaner separately, would be placed in its own special urn, elaborately labelled with the pedestrian's proud name and titles.

And so, when Sam Tatarian died not long ago, there passed from the world stage the first—and last—of the Great Dust Collectors. But the Treaties and Pacts devised by the Treaty-makers—they, too, will go on collecting dust.

'THEY LOVED US IN YAZOO CITY'

By MAXWELL SHANE

Hollywood.

Yes, it's true what they say about Dixie. Recently returned from a Movietime U.S.A. tour of Louisiana and Mississippi with a group of 17,000 Hollywood stars, producers and writers, if we had any cynical conceptions of southern hospitality before we went, we lost them from the moment we stepped off the train and found a yelling mob of film-lovers greeting us with a huge banner which read, "Welcome to the South, Movietime U.S.A., You-all!"

Maxwell Shane

We went there worried about what we were going to say, primed with statistics which would show that Hollywood people were just as simple, as moral, as normal, as any Americans anywhere. We found that such statistics were entirely unnecessary. They loved movies and just want more of them and they knew more about Hollywood, its customs, its mores, its people than we did. We came back feeling that the famous VARIETY headline should be rewritten to say, "STIX LOVE PIX; NO HIX IN DIXIE."

We hit towns where the population was 6,500 and where 10,000 jammed the street to greet us. In one town, the Mayor told us that everybody was there except two people, and he apologized for these two, one old lady in the hospital with a broken leg and one town boozer who was sleeping it off in the hoosegow.

In the Hollywood medicine show were Irving Asher and Robert Fellows, producers; George Murphy, Julia Adama, David Brian, Adrian Booth, Bruce Bennett, Charlton Heston, Lydia Clark, Robert Stack, Preston Foster, Sheila Darcy, players; Leonard Stern and Dorothy Hughes, writers; Fred de Cordova and Joe Lewis, directors. One of the most interesting phases of the tour was the gradual evolution of the directors, producers, and writers, who started out with palpitating hearts and dry lips at the first stop, unaccustomed as they were to public speaking, and who, by the end of the tour, had accumulated so much material and were so prolix that it was quite a chore to drag them away from the microphone. It proved that, given the opportunity, there is a bit of ham in all of us.

Prestons and Fosters

One of the most amusing phases was the recurrent mixup of the Prestons and the Fosters in our business, with whom Preston Foster was confused wherever he went. Foster made this a sock bit of material, when he said, "I am grateful to the master of ceremonies for getting my name right. Because I am forever being confused with Robert Preston, Preston Sturges, and Norman Foster. I am forever being congratulated for Robert Preston's good acting, for Preston Sturges' fine direction, and then there was the time I was given credit for Norman Foster's baby." That always got a yock. But in Jackson, Miss., the confusion was really topped, when the guest listing on the menu of the Governor's dinner stated that Catherine Craig was there with her husband, Preston Foster. (Catherine Craig happens to be Robert Preston's wife, Sheila Darcy is Preston Foster's.) Later, an assistant room clerk at the Heidelberg Hotel discovered this mistake and rushed over to the desk clerk worriedly. "Hey," he yelped, "Catherine Craig isn't married to Preston Foster." The room clerk shrugged. "It's too late now," he said. "They're up in the room together."

We also found that the yen to become a Hollywood star has become no less powerful in recent years. Wherever we went mothers would push their little curly headed moppets at me and urge, "Go on. Act for the gentleman. Make like Tallulah Bankhead."

But this, too, was topped. In Starkville, Miss., I was sitting on the flat bed of a truck which had been converted into a street platform and was waiting for my turn to speak when a cocker spaniel walked up in front of me, sat down, looked into my eyes for attention, and then proceeded to do a handstand.

At one spot, a town of about 5,000, where 15,000 jammed the town square, Robert Stack was mobbed—all 15,000 wanted autographs, all at one time. Stack was squeezed up against a stone wall and all but torn apart. Then suddenly he became aware of a small voice calling, "Help, help." He looked down and there at his feet was a 10-year-old girl who had fallen under the feet of the mob. Bob pulled the kid to her feet gallantly and asked, "Do you want an autograph?" "No," gasped the kid. "I want to breathe."

Writer Leonard Stern made friends and influenced people when he told them that, since coming down to Dixie and listening to their drawl, he went out every morning looking for coffee in a Rex-you-all Drug Store.

In Durant, Miss., we were addressing the crowd from a small park bandstand when it started to rain. Instead of leaving, the crowd moved across the street, about 100 yards away, and stood under store awnings. Not one person left. We continued to speak via loudspeakers and could only tell that they were alive and listening by the waving of their hands when they applauded.

We learned a lot on that trip. We learned that Hollywood has nothing to apologize for. They love pictures in Dixie, and neither rain, nor sleet, nor storm can keep them home when picture people are in town. They loved us in Yazoo City.

Pix Realty

burden representing a substantial part of its entire cost. This penalty overhead is the amount of income taxes paid by the so-called "high priced talent" and which must be included in production costs to assure these superior creative artists "take home pay" worthy of their great talents and boxoffice value. Those who cry for reduced production costs should try and answer that problem first.

Although a realist, aware of the problems that face us, the hazards that must be met and conquered, the diverse interests that dictate our sometimes selfish (but always self-preservation) actions, I am still a confirmed optimist about the motion picture industry and believe that it will always be able to adjust its differences and continue to progress.

What the next half century of technological progress will bring is anybody's guess. Whether or not customers will be airborne on atom-driven flying machines to landing stages atop tomorrow's movie palaces—whether motion pictures are on film, tape, television or delivered by mental telepathy—whether there are screens, prisms or huge vacuum tubes for projection—one thing is certain—there will always be a theatre and people to fill it. Man, the social animal, has from the beginning of time nurtured two institutions—a temple for his religious worship and a theatre where, with the companionship of his kind, his imagination finds boundless freedom.

We have learned many things during the first half century of motion pictures—how to make photographs move, how to make them talk, how to give them color, how to build great palaces and to fill them with happy people. We learned many things, but it took us 50 years to learn how to work together for the common good of the industry, the first demonstration of which took place with the 1951 Movietime U.S.A. Campaign.

Just as in the world around us we are learning the hard way of the dependence of nation upon nation, so have we learned the hard way the interdependence of one-another in this industry. Regardless of the brick and mortar and the visible assets of the business we are still a house of cards, each dependent upon the other for structural stability. Only by standing together and fighting together can we meet the new challenges that come each day. Now that we have learned the power of cooperation let us hope that the spirit of Movietime can be converted into Moneytime for all.

Turner in 'Melody'

Hollywood.

Lana Turner will play the opera star in Metro's "Interrupted Melody," the life story of Marjorie Lawrence, songbird who was stricken with polio. Miss Lawrence will record the songs.

Other important castings over the weekend at Metro were Elizabeth Taylor in "The Girl Who Had Everything" and Eleanor Parker in "Eagle On His Cap."—

Episodic Films In Hollywood Growth

By MIKE KAPLAN

Hollywood.

After a score of years of repetitive cycles of all kinds, the film industry has come up with a new trend—the episodic picture. Originally a British import (viz "Quartet" and "Trio"), it is reaching its highest state of development in Hollywood with no less than seven slated for release this year, and probably more to coi .

Strangely enough, although the only American episoder to hit the nation's screens last year didn't fare too well, there appears to be growing optimism in the film factories that this type of screen product provides a definite boxoffice lure. The ability to load a film legitimately, with top names making comparatively brief appearances, coupled with a diversified group of stories one package, is regarded as one answer to the encroachment of television. Last year's entry, "Queen for a Day" (later retitled "Horsie"), isn't regarded as typical and some filmsters contend that the Robert Stillman production was hurt rather than helped by its tieup with the radio show of the same name.

Certainly Metro seems to have no misgivings about the vignette form. With "It's a Big Country" completed and ready for release, the studio is readying two more in the same vein—"Mexican Village" and "Three Love Stories." "Village" will be a solo direction job by Norman Foster, but "Love Stories" will follow the "Country" format with separate directors as well as casts for each segment.

20th's Pair

Twentieth-Fox has a pair coming up "We're Not Married" and "The Full House," latter a collection of O. Henry stories. And United Artists (which released "Queen") will be represented with the Ben Hecht package of "Actors" and "Sin," and the Alexander Paal film, "Tale of Five Cities," lensed against European backgrounds.

Cinema cynics maintain the episodic device is a bulwark against the day when films will be thrown wholesale into television, pointing out that each episode could be sold separately for additional coin after the regular theatrical release has been completed. Actually, such a stunt has been attempted by Robert Lippert, but with such little success that the project was abandoned. Lippert's episoders, "Fingerprints Don't Lie," "Mask of the Dragon," "Danger Zone," "Pier 23" and "Roaring City," were actually packages of two 30-minute films each. Pix were carefully sliced so that they could subsequently be sold for video sponsorship.

Lippert also whipped together a pair of film revues tagged "Yes, Sir, Mr. Bones" and "Varieties on Parade," which, like RKO's "Footlight Varieties," were designed to provide continuous but not necessarily connected divertissement.

From the talent standpoint, the current cycle is a healthy omen. If it continues at the present pace, it will do much to ease the sporadic belt-tightening that has always plagued supporting and bit players. None makes a fortune out of the episoders, but the available work is being spread out among larger numbers of thesps.

Meantime, there appears to be no truth to rumors that exhibs in scattered areas are planning to do their own editing and throw selected episodes in as teasers with name talent to bolster a weak bill.

Hollywood's Mad Search For Story Material

By WILLIAM ORNSTEIN

Film producers, still holding to "the story's the thing," continue to bemoan the shortage of the basic ingredient for making "good" pictures. The dearth has created a do-or-die attempt to search every avenue which might lead to possible screen material.

Wm.

Exactly what is Hollywood doing about developing new writers? Dore Schary, v.p. and production head for Metro, blesses the originals, with emphasis on writers developing their own babies for screen maturity; Joseph H. Moskowitz, 20th-Fox v.p. and eastern studio rep, and Bertram Bloch, 20th's eastern story head, both lean to greater subsidizing of writers and creation of a workshop for the craft; Alan Jackson, eastern story head for Paramount, sticks to "slicks" and affinitive media as worthy solutions to the material problem.

"Metro's experience," Schary reveals, "has been more and more to buy original material and then engage its author to develop it, rather than put a different, already seasoned screenwriter on it automatically. Having hit upon fresh talent in the first place, we now take the chance of letting him develop in a field perhaps new to him—screenwriting. There is a distinct value in an author's working into screen form his original material, because to distribute any material over a number of writers almost certainly will water down the things about the story which attracted us in the first place."

For the year ended Dec. 1, 1951, Metro bought 36 original stories, constituting 60% of its overall literary deals. Fiftynine properties were bought, of which 11 were short stories, seven novels, three stage plays, one a TV play, plus an original.

One of the ways of overcoming the material shortage, according to Moskowitz and Bloch, is to establish a workshop where authors can fit into the film medium with a little financial and moral encouragement.

The Laboratory

"Every big industry has experimental or laboratory grounds, but ours is the only one that hasn't," stated Bloch. "Our industry lacks proving grounds to give stimulation to writers. We need more and better stories, and this in the face of a shrinking literary market. We cannot expect others to do the spadework for us."

Bloch points out how 20th-Fox helped finance the "Dragonwyck" and "Centennial Summer" authors after publisher advance payments ran out. Elliott Arnold is now being financed while completing "Sante Fe," tentatively titled novel for Knopf. Hildegarde Dolson, author of "The Form Divine," presently is at the studio developing a screen play on option.

With David Brown added to 20th-Fox's studio story staff under Julian Johnson, a more intensified study of all possible sources will be started. During his past three years as managing editor of Cosmopolitan, and for seven years before that in various editorials swivels at Liberty, Brown spent considerable time working with writers in developing ideas.

The non-fiction field is being widely combed for new writers and ideas. Twentieth recently bought "The Man Who Fooled Hitler," which appeared in Reader's Digest. Four articles bought from The New Yorker point up the fact that any idea that lends itself to film fabric will not be overlooked in the maddening search for material and new writers.

Par's Jackson finds the "slicks," such as Saturday Evening Post and Collier's, with circulations running into the millions, as the more likely source for the film medium. "Quality" magazines like Harper's and Atlantic Monthly are better designed for the little theatre, Jackson feel. Chances of a writer attracting film interest after appearing in the long-haired magazines are remote, he added.

The New Yorker, Jackson opined, is in a class by itself and often has furnished excellent stories for the screen, such as "The Man on the Ledge" and "Mr. 880," which 20th-Fox produced in the past year or so.

The best avenue to pictures for new writers, Jackson figures, is to take an indirect route and first appear in printed form, either in magazines, book or newspapers. This way the author will be studied by those interested in his work for what it may be worth.

"At one time," the Paramount executive continued, "the studio had a junior writers school, but this was discontinued after a few years." (Ditto Metro, 20th-Fox and others). "Today," Jackson added, "Par is studying every field for possible material. Very often we see things on television we like and arrange for either the writer, the story itself, to join our studio lineup. Other times writers or their agents will call for an interview with a specific idea in mind. We invite them up, talk to them, see what they have worth considering, and when there is something we like we will go to work on it."

Continuing the searching process, Jackson cited the instance of Kem Bennett, whose two-part article, "Death at Attention," attracted his eye when it appeared in This Week magazine last May 13 and 20. The weekly supplement is distributed to 31 newspapers with a circulation of 10,500,000, the largest of its kind. Jackson contacted the author in London, but learned Metro had beaten him to the punch. Kenneth MacKenna, Metro's studio story head, was in London at the time and had already bought the article with the proviso Bennett would work on the script i Hollywood.

Jackson stated the average purchases for originals at Paramount varies, but for the last year they amounted to 50%. While the general impression appears that anyone can submit an original for reading, etc., this practice was stopped by the studios some years ago. Too many nuisances (plagiarism) suits cropped up from would-be writers who submitted mss. unsolicited. Such mss., when received by studios, are returned unopened for protective purposes, and while the influx continues, despite discouraging warnings, the pyramids are almost as high as they used to be. Originals submitted by pros and agents are given careful consideration, it is stated, because writers of past experience know what studios want, are in the know-how and understand production from an inside vantage point. Agents are also in touch and know better than to submit non-pro stuff.

past year. If the freeze on television broadcasting stations is lifted during this year, we shall witness the beginning of the rapid expansion of that medium to its full stature. It would be utterly unrealistic to ignore the implications of this development. It is bound to have its repercussions upon our industry. But they need not be adverse.

I agree with the statement made by one of the leaders of the Theatre Owners of America. He said, in substance, that we must look upon television as an "opportunity." Television is Show Business, and we're all in Show Busi

We live in a changing world, and he who clings to the past is doomed to failure. We have the imagination and know-how to adjust ourselves to changing circumstances. We have a constructive contribution to make to television and, in making it, we can serve own enlightened self-interest.

As 1952 lies before us, we must keep our eyes focused on the horizon. The future is in our hands. We can make of it what we will. As for Paramount, we intend to play a constructive part in the moulding of that futur..

MY FAVORITE STORY

Gracie Fields

Years ago, when I was touring in revue, whenever we visited Plymouth, we always stayed at Ye Olde Ship Inn at Corsanne Bay, which is nearby. This inn is a well-known hostelry, made famous by the fact that whenever Nelson spent any time in Plymouth, he always stayed there. The late proprietor, Fred Eteson, was very proud of this fact, and used to show visitors the bedroom where Nelson slept. One day, when showing a family, which included a small child, this room, he mentioned that another famous person had slept there too, namely Gracie Fields.

When this family returned home after their holiday they were telling a neighbor that she must go and see this famous inn whenever she was in Plymouth, when the child interrupted and said, "And don't forget to ask the gentleman to show you the bed where Nelson slept with Gracie Fields."

Claude Binyon

This actually happened in the early '40s, when I tipped the beam at 277 pounds. Fred MacMurray and I were on a hunting trip in northern California, sharing our beer with an old gent who had consented to show us where the birds were flying. The old man looked me over as he guzzled his beer. "What do you do for a living?" he asked finally. "I'm a writer," I answered.

"Holy mackerel!" he exploded. "A guy your size!" Then he looked at MacMurray. "What do you do?"

Fred considered his own 220-pound frame—and dared not tell. "The same as Binyon," he said finally.

Bennett Cerf

What if you found yourself in Algiers on Christmas Day? That's where one tourist wound up last year, and he told his guide, "This is one day when I don't want to be dragged to places you show every other American. Tonight I want to see the real Africa!" The guide said, "I will take you to the wildest, most exotic cafe this side of the Sahara. Holidays are celebrated there as they are celebrated nowhere else. You will never forget it." The two men repaired to a dark, forbidding house on the edge of town, and, after some mysterious mumbo-jumbo at the gate, were admitted.

A tree with some ratty trimmings had been propped up in one corner, and several nondescript natives seemed to be celebrating in their fashion. What immediately caught the tourist's eye, however, was an English colonel, impeccably attired, swagger stick and all, who, believe it or not, was only six inches tall! As the tourist stared in wonderment, the bartender threw a red silk cord over the edge of the bar, the colonel shinnied up, perched on the top, and demanded a double whiskey and soda.

The guide was delighted. "You're in rare luck," he told the tourist. "You're about to meet Colonel Pringle, one of the rarest sights in all Africa!" Then he turned to the six-inch figure, and boomed, "Be a good fellow, Colonel Pringle, and give my tourist friend here the details of Christmas Day in '43—the day you told that witch doctor to go jump in the lake!"

Bored and unhappy, a moneyed femme thought something was the matter with her, and consulted one psychiatrist after another. She paid them huge fees, but they were honest men and told her there wasn't anything awry. She kept on going to psychos until she met a phoney; frock coat, pointed beard, black ribbon specs. He said his fee was $500 per consultation. "Never mind that," she said, "When can I come?" The phoney rubbed his hands together, "Madame, come to my office at 11 o'clock tomorrow sharp. Wear a black hat, a black dress, with a red belt, and green shoes." Next morning she showed up as ordered and entered the inner office. He stood her beside a table. "Now, madame, put your right leg on the table." She did. "Now, madame, put your left legt on the table." She did and, of course, she went ker-boom on the floor. The phoney looked at her, rubbed his hands, and said, "Tell me, madame, how long have you been having these spells."

Sam Levenson

A man called me to engage me to perform at a wedding anniversary, "Please don't charge me too much," he said, "I'm giving you as a present to the couple."

My mother-in-law came to my opening at the Latin Quarter in N. Y. As I walked off to a nice round of applause I heard my mother-in-law, at ringside muttering: "I don't know, maybe I'm wrong!"

At the opening of my own TV show, the agency men were peeking through the curtain announcing: "Look who's out there!" Then came a list of "prominent people." I took a peek myself, turned to the agency guy and said: "See that guy in the third row, fourth seat? That's my seltzer man!"

Bernard Sobel

Years ago, when Texas Guinan was operating her nitery, my parents came from Indiana to visit me. Tex called up to invite me to bring them to the club as her guests.

We accepted, and when we arrived she gave my mother and father the places of honor, right next to the chair on which she acted as mistress of ceremonies.

As soon as the show opened, Texas began, characteristically, to show my parents special attention. As soon as an act was over, she would say:

"How did you like that Father Sobel?" How did you like that Mother Sobel?"

And when the show was over she called out to the crowd: "Give Mother Sobel a hand!"

Some night after, I took mother to the Metropolitan Opera House. We were togged up in our formal clothes, walking with dignity through the lobby when, all at once woman rushed in front of us and caught hold of a man standing nearby.

"Look John," she shouted. "Look. There's Mother Sobel from Texas Guinan's."

Gilbert Miller

Douglas Fairbanks, Sr., was constantly annoyed by people who came up and said, "Mr. Fairbanks, do you remember me? We met at so and so—" and would then say, "I bet you don't remember my name." This happened to him so often on a steamer trip from Italy to New York that after the 20th alleged acquaintance in a row had tackled him, he could hardly contain himself when a rather dark man approached him and said, "Mr. Fairbanks, of course you don't remember me—" Whereupon Fairbanks exploded. "No, I don't remember you," he said, "and I am sick and tired of being annoyed by a lot of people whom I am sure I have never met anywhere." Whereupon the little man replied, "Mr. Fairbanks, I couldn't understand better. My name is Marconi."

Harry Foster

I once booked a well-known American act into Rome. On its opening night it just died and went off without a hand to a deathly hush. As they left the theatre, to their amazement, they saw a character slipping on the bills with paper which read "Grando Successo." On asking the meaning of this, they were told in voluble Italian that they were really a "grando successo." If they had not been, the audience would have spat and blown raspberries!

Bernard F. Gimbel

A wife was modeling a new hat before her husband and in answer to his comment that he thought it was extravagant, she said, 'It didn't cost a thing. It was marked down from $20 to $10, so I bought it with the $10 I saved'."

Tallulah Bankhead

One of my favorite stories concerns the divine remark of my very good friend Estelle Winwood. As you may know, Estelle was one of the founders some years ago of that illustrious theatrical establishment, the Liverpool Repertory Co. At its inception many of the artists involved were, shall we say, impoverished. A particularly impecunious pair, who were engaged in some sort of dalliance at the time, decided that Paris was the place for them. Their disappearance noted, a friend inquired for news of them and Estelle said, "Why, my dear, they were so poor they went to Paris as artists instead of people."

Roger Imhof

A young fellow who had been visiting his girl friend at her home was about to say "Good Night." They opened the front door and it was raining. His girl said, "You can't go home on a night like this, it's raining cats and dogs; I'll run upstairs and prepare a room for you." When she came down, wondering where he was, the door bell rang. She opened it and there he was shivering and soaking wet. "Where were you?" He said, "Well, I had to run home and get my pajamas."

Jim Jordan

Here is a yarn we picked up in Hawaii last summer. It's called "How Waikiki Beach Got Its Name."

It seems that when the missionaries came to Honolulu, the royalty there reserved the beaches for their own use and did not allow the common people or peasants to use them. But they did extend this courtesy to the missionaries.

The missionaries brought a number of Chinese coolies to work in the fields. These coolies were tired after a hard day's work, and seeing this beautiful beach below them, they decided to go down and take a swim.

The royalty and the missionaries came charging down to the beach where they were and started pushing them around. The Chinese started running up the hill, and as the royalty would give them a kick, the coolies—not knowing what was going on—would jump and holler, "Why kicky—why kicky?"

Benedict Gimbel, Jr.

A Carolina mountaineer cornered a chap who had been courting his daughter.

"See here," he said, "you've gone with Annabelle for three years. What are your intentions—honorable or dishonorable?"

The young man's face brightened as he asked, "You mean I've got a choice?"

Sophie Tucker

A woman driver was passing in and out of the white line, scraping every fender that she passed, passing red lights and breaking every rule. Finally a cop caught up with her. "Show me your license," he screamed. "You mean," she cooed, "with that kind of driving they'll give me a license?"

Coleman Jacoby, the Broadway-Hollywood gag writer, was going over his usual first-of-the-month batch of bills. All of them were usual formal statements—except The family physician had decided to get personal.

He had added a reminder. "Tomorrow," the doctor had scrawled at the bottom of the statement, "this bill will be a year old."

Jacoby returned it to the doctor with his own notation. He wrote: "Happy Birthday!"

Joe E. Lewis

Walking to work in my black tie, an elderly colored man on the sidewalk of 6th Ave. asked to shine my shoes. I sat down on the box, and as he was shining my shoes, he looked up and saw me in a tuxedo, and said, "Waiting tables?" I said, "Sure, don't you know a waiter when you see one?" He said, "I sure do, I used to be one myself." When he was through, I gave him a half-a-buck. He was surprised and he said, "My, my, where are you working at?"

Bert Lytell

There are certain "hams" who revert to type no matter what the situation. One such was walking down Broadway muttering to himself and with a look of despair. A friend halted him and asked the reason of his mood. He got this reply: "Two weeks ago, my aunt died and left me $100,000. Last week, my uncle died and left me $200,000. This week, NOTHING."

Danny Kaye

Two starlets were discussing a newly arrived star at the Brown Derby whom they felt had gotten places on very little talent. Danny Thomas, joining the two, listened and said, "How did you hear that, via sour grapevine?"

John Kieran

I still like the ancient one about the old lady down front at a political meeting, very attentive to the orator. At the conclusion he came down and thanked her for her great attention. "Well, you are now my second choice," she said. "Who's your first?" asked the startled candidate. "Anybody else," she answered.

Jesse Block

We played the Palladium in London in 1930. After our last show, we returned to our dressing room and discovered that a thief had taken all our valuables, which included a diamond necklace. We called Scotland Yard and they sent over one of their men immediately. He looked like the conventional movie detective, derby, pipe and the umbrella. He questioned us and everybody connected with the theatre for about two hours, and it seemed so thorough and complete, we left relieved and quite sure the valuables would be recovered.

The following day, we arrived at the theatre and the doorman said, "Phone for you, Mr. Block, from Scotland Yard. They've been trying to reach you all morning." I turned to Eve and said, "Aren't they wonderful!" I picked up the phone, full of confidence and a voice said, "Mr. Block, this is Scotland Yard." I said, "Yes, yes." And he replied, "I lost my umbrella!"—— P. S. We found the umbrella, but not the necklace.

This story happened in the old days at the Yankee Stadium when the Yankees were slaughtering all the opposition. At the time they had Murderer's Row. It was when Babe Ruth was in his heyday. The opposition was trailing by almost a dozen runs, and the manager looked at the bull pen for another pitcher. He gave the sign to a young rookie who was warming up and had been munching on a hot dog. When he started to walk in, he looked to see who was up to bat and saw Ruth, Gehrig and Meusel coming up in that order. He handed the hot dog to the catcher who was warming up and said, "Hold on to that, I'll be right back."

A ticket broker who died went to Heaven, over Commissioner Murtagh's objections. Being a broker he was admitted without having to pay the 90c extra fee and St. Peter saw to it that he got an aisle seat in Heaven.

One morning the broker got a notice from the front office that applications for reincarnation were being accepted. The ticket broker was one of the first to apply and asked that he be reincarnated as a ticket to "South Pacific." However, he made one additional request. He asked that after he was reincarnated he be permitted to stay up in Heaven as a ticket to "South Pacific" instead of going back to earth. "Why?" asked St. Peter. "Because," he answered, "It'll drive Rodgers and Hammerstein crazy when they see that empty seat all night."

I happened to be in Canada just before Britain devalued its pound, and heard many interesting theories on how the Empire could be saved this desperate move. The best, I believe, concerns the Canadian Prime Minister, who called in staff accountants in order to come up with a solution that would help Britain, as well as its colonies. The suggestions were entirely unsatisfactory, so the Minister called in a small-time accountant and pleaded for help.

After being closeted in a room for five hours with mountains of books and papers, he came out triumphantly. "I've got it!" he exclaimed. "If you want the Empire saved, just tell the King to put Canada in his wife's name!"

Like millions of other Americans, I was a great admirer of the late President Roosevelt. Consequently, I was thrilled to be invited to entertain at a luncheon in his honor in Washington. The President was a wonderful audience. He had a hearty laugh, and roared his approval of jokes which particularly pleased him.

After the luncheon, word was sent to me that the President would like to talk to me for a moment. I hurried over to him. We exchanged pleasantries, then the President's face took on a solemn look and he beckoned me to lean closer. I leaned closer.

"Mr. Amsterdam," whispered the President, "do you know any good Eleanor jokes?"

The late Ned Wayburn was producing a show for the Shuberts. After hammering away for days and nights in strenuous rehearsals, the cast went into a dress about three in the morning. One of the chorus boys had become so weary and unstrung, he shouted, "Give me liberty or give me death!"

Wayburn heard the remark, stopped the rehearsal cold and said, "Who said that?"

One of the other chorus boys who still had a sense of humor replied, "Patrick Henry." Whereupon Wayburn yelled, "Throw that blankety-blank out!"

WHY PUBLISHERS GO BROKE

Some Notes on the Economics of Book Publishing

By K. S. GINIGER

Editor-in-Chief, Trade Book Division, Prentice-Hall

Ken Giniger

The starving author writing his heart away in a garret is a picture treasured in the minds of many who value equally the cliche of the wealthy publisher gorging himself on chateaubriand at "21" and washing it down with some rare vintage from his private bin in the Kriendler-Berns cellar.

The truth does not conform to either stereotype. The obituary columns carry few notices of authors' deaths from starvation; and "21" would soon shut its doors if it had to depend on book publishers. However, book publishers emulate really weathly men in one important way: their philanthropies are so great that they require large business organizations to carry them out.

The comparison of book publishing with philanthrophy is not too far-fetched if we limit our discussion of book publishers to those who publish only what are quaintly known as "trade" books, that is, fiction and non-fiction for the general reader. A reading of the slim statistics the industry gets up for itself quickly brings home the astonishing truth that the average publisher makes less than 6% before taxes on his gross sales. In other words, if the publisher were to invest his capital in, say, bonds or some equally conservative investment with a low but safe rate of return, he could stay home in bed and make more money than he does now by going to the office every day. Therefore, he must be considered a philanthropist because, apparently, his sole function is to assure a living (however poor) not only to authors, but to editors like me; sales staffs; advertising, promotion and publicity people; bookkeepers. In addition, he assures printers, binders and paper manufacturers of a profit far in excess of his own. If this isn't philanthropy, what is?

Let's take a simple case history to prove the point. Joe Remington has been starving in that attic of his, writing his masterpiece on his machine of the same name. Finished, he carts it over to Maecenas House, Publishers. They love it; they offer him a contract with advance of $1,000 against a royalty of 10% on the first 5,000 copies, 12½% on the next 2,500, and 15% thereafter. He gratefully accepts the check and retires to a somewhat plusher garret to await his royalties.

To make the arithmetic easier, let's make Joe's book a very short one, the kind no one in their right mind would pay more than a dollar for. It gets published and the very first customer puts down his dollar. We want to see where that dollar goes.

Mathematics

First, Joe collected 10% of the dollar in advance. Next, the printer, binder and paper manufacturer got 20% for manufacturing the book. Another 10% must be allocated for advertising if anyone is to buy the book. Then approximately 17% must go to pay the salaries of the people employed by the publisher, his rent and the other items which go to make up his overhead. And, last, but far from least, the bookseller gets an average 43%. Now, let's add up our dollar:

Royalty	$ .10
Manufacturing	.20
Advertising	.10
Publisher's overhead	.17
Bookseller's discount	.43
	$1.00

In this particular case then, the publisher, if he sold 10,000 copies of Joe's book, could break even! If he didn't, he would lose a great-lesser amount of money.

Aha! you say, I can't fool you. Printing costs go down as soon as new editions come along or as the size of printings grows larger; advertising costs tend to decrease; less overhead need be expended on a particular book. And, too, isn't there income from other things, those mysterious "subsidiary rights" which include, among other items, books, clubs, paper reprints, the Reader's Digest and what not?

All those things are true. But, first, by his sliding royalty scale, Joe has added to his own take a good proportion of any savings on production if the book goes over. And, if it doesn't, the publisher can't possibly avoid a large manufacturing loss. He can very easily overspend on advertising, an advance to the author not earned by sales represents another loss. Consequently only the really successful book is profitable at all and only the extremely successful book makes a profit for the publisher comparable to the profit he might make in many other businesses.

How to make a profit? Try to raise prices and the customers vanish. Try to cut royalties and breakpoints and authors run screaming to the Author's League with the charge that you're a pirate. Try to shave manufacturing costs and the book doesn't look worth the money. Try to cut your overhead and your best employees quit and go to work for motion picture studios or advertising agencies. Try to cut the bookseller's discount — bookselling is already, according to Department of Commerce figures, the least profitable of retail businesses.

Despite all this, some publishers actually manage to show a profit on publishing trade books at the end of the year. More however, remain in business only because of their success in other publishing ventures to which these strange economics don't apply. Why be a trade book publisher? Philanthropy must get in the blood.

Skiatron

Par's reply, which was that it "will not discriminate" between Subscribervision (Skiatron's system) and Phonevision. Par asked, however, for certain assurances.

These, as disclosed by Paul Raibourn, Par v.p. in charge of tele, to VARIETY Friday (28) were that Skiatron, in using the pix, in no sense indicate that it is doing so at the representation of Paramount and that there will be no unusual movements of Skiatron shares on the security markets.

Par has more than passing interest, of course, in subscribervision in that it owns a half-interest in another subscription video system—Telemeter. Latter issued a large, descriptive brochure last week explaining its pay-as-you-see device and answering many questions about it.

Raibourn said the pamphlet was issued merely as a convenient way of answering many queries being received. Although in the colloquy in the book it is stated that financing for Telemeter may eventually be sought on the open market, Raibourn declared no money is being looked for now.

Telemeter itself is making engineering field tests currently in Los Angeles, but has made no move to the FCC as yet regarding commercial use. Raibourn indicated it felt there was no need to make the kind of public tests that Phonevision did in Chi and Subscribervision proposes in New York. Pamphlet declares Telemeter can be in action within 90 days of permission to operate in any area.

"We felt the Phonevision test was completely useless," Raibourn declared, "and we want further details on Levey's proposal. If it is the same as Phonevision's, we'll give them the product. We won't discriminate. But we feel, the experiment will be equally useless."

Along with other majors except 20th, Par provided pix for the Phonevision test. Films were made available following a nudge to the companies by the Dept. of Justice. Matter has been in the news recently as a result of testimony by James P. Finnegan, ousted St. Louis Federal tax collector, that he got $50,000 from Zenith prez Eugene F. McDonald to "help" get the pix. No one who provided films appears ever to have heard of Finnegan.

be a governing factor in all of our future thinking.

We must recognize the change television has made on the home life of the public, reducing the number of occasions on which they visit theatres. Even though we have seen a rise in theatre attendance recently we have no guarantee that this is a permanent trend and that once the people feel the pinch of more and more taxes and less and less luxury money they may again find themselves in front of the TV screen with greater frequency.

In the meantime we have a -sponsibility to offer the public something bigger and better than anything they can get on TV.

The exhibitor, too, has a grave responsibility in this struggle for the public's support. He must exploit and promote productions with greater vigor and ingenuity than ever before.

I have great confidence in the captains of our industry, both in exhibition and production, and I am sure that by a mutual trust and understanding we can work out any difficulties that now exist or may arise.

I approach the new year with a realization that we are faced with vexing problems yet with a certainty that we shall meet and solve them with the same courage, determination and ultimate triumph that has made our industry one of the greatest success stories in the history of free America.

Will Somebody Please Put Back The Manhole Covers?

By HORACE McMAHON

Horace McMahon

Harry Bestry, the veteran agent, calls me "The Cat," the inference being that, as an actor, I've got nine lives. Harry doesn't know the half of it. I've used up the feline quota a long time ago.

The way I see my professional life, it has been one long vista of open manholes. Everything looks fine. I traipse along with my head up high, my eyes fixed on the golden reward at the end of the street. I reach out for it, I touch it, and right then is where I connect with the manhole cover that isn't there. So I climb out of the sewer. . .

Here's what I mean:

I go to Hollywood back about 15 years ago, I make my first movie, a B-minus called "Westside Miracle." I get rave notices. The studio is so surprised and delighted they hang photostats of the reviews up in the commissary. I'm I sit back and wait for the deluge of offers. For six weeks there isn't a drizzle. Then I get a call from the same studio. They have a role for me. At $100 less per week than before I got the rave notices. I take it.

There's a play called "Dear Mr. President." I have a minor part. But during rehearsals there are drastic revisions, and I end up with what amounts to the second lead. Biggest part I ever had. Now I'm set. We have two previews, and I'm great. We close the afternoon of opening night. Total performances, zero.

I get called in for a comedy burglar bit in a Cagney picture about the OSS. The rushes are great, everybody dies laughing. But the bit comes too early in the picture, the bigwigs decide the laughs set the wrong mood for the picture. McMahon is out. On the floor again.

I'm in "Three Men on a Horse." The three men are Teddy Hart, Sam Levene and me. Hollywood comes calling. They sign two of the three men. Teddy. And Sam. Who does that leave out?

At the start of the war, I work up a night club act. I break the act in at 50 consecutive benefits. I kill them at one of Eddie Davis' Sunday nights. Then I'm booked into a club in Baltimore for a three-week engagement at the highest salary I've ever gotten. It's great, it looks like the beginning of a whole new career. But the afternoon of the day I sign the contract I'm sitting by the radio and I hear they've imposed a 12 o'clock wartime curfew. End of new career. I make the familiar non-stop descent into the sewer.

Ward Bond is my friend and benefactor. Never stops doing things for me. He gets me a part in a picture in which he has a featured role. The producer gets a brainstorm, tosses out Ward and gives me his part. I feel like I'm stabbing him in the back. My benefactor. My best pal. I'm miserable, I feel like a Judas. But it works out fine. The producer gets a look at the way I play the part, and he fires me. And Ward is back in.

I haven't got any complaints. I've worked out a technique for going down the manhole without bumping the sides. Then I climb out, head high, eyes on the golden reward.

Paris: 2,000 Years of Show Biz

By NORMAN READER

Julius Caesar, bon vivant and man-about-the-world, put the velvet finger of approval on Paris more than 2,000 years ago. And here was the beginning of a marathon love story and the greatest tourist bonanza ever to strike our somewhat screwy planet.

That Emperor Julius knew a good thing when he saw one is completely borne out not only by all those spicy tales anent Cleopatra, but also by modern-day Paree's ability to draw Americans to her bosom with the same walloping whoosh of a jet's intake.

Ever since 53 B.C., when she was born on an island in the Seine, Paris has exposed a shapely limb, a lively mind and wit, and an inexhaustible joie de vivre. These attributes have proven irresistible enough to win her more constant lovers than the combined lot of Circes who have made the bestseller lists and raised man's blood pressure down through the ages.

When a sly sage said, "Paris is the Christmas carol of the world, a beautiful Sunday poised on the destiny of men," this s.s. really uttered the poetic McCoy—and made good sense to boot. For Paris, at 2,000 years of age, moves along with the same booming wave of her much younger and perhaps only real rival, Tallulah Bankhead.

The City of Light, center of a great river basin, crossroads of waters, routes and the hopes of free mankind, holds fast to her reputation of being a vast market place of ideas, the crib of civilization, and the home of everyday humanities.

The postwar traveler, sparing a modicum of time from the chic cacophony of the George V or the warmth of the Ritz Bar, will discover that in appearance Paris continues to reflect the Technicolor temperament of the city; gay, serious, intellectual by turn. It doesn't take long to realize that from the four corners of the earth to Paris still come the artists, the entertainers, philosophers and just plain people to breathe the zestful atmosphere and become a living, integral part of it.

The streets of Paris are her provinces and, to those who will venture forth to seek and learn, a compact kaleidoscope of France entire. The rambling visitor with an adventurer's eye and curiosity will meet along his way a Perigord restaurant, a Breton pastry shop, an Alsatian delicatessen, not to mention the thousand-and-one influences of other countries, other peoples. The rising tide of Americans who visit each year is proof-positive that in Paris there is a lilting rhythm, a balance, a harmony and a delicacy that only 2,000 years of living through fair weather and foul can give to a city.

Where in the world but in Paris can the visitor discover that names of her streets are often as charming as the winding alleys and broad boulevards themselves. The busiest corner in the city, for instance, is not identified by a prosaic phrase like 42d and Broadway. Paris traffic churns at its most intense where the Champs Elysees (Avenue of the Elysian Fields) enters the Place de l'Etoile (the Place of the Star). Such titles as the Rue de Chat-qui-Peche, or Street of the Fishing Cat, and the Rue des Puits de l'Ermite, or Street of the Hermit's Well, have a fetching oddity whose origins are obscured in antiquity.

Another Kind of Postcards

One of the unchallenged charms of Paris is that nothing dies there completely. The very look of the city reflects her mood and history. Her monuments seem as sensitive to the 20th Century visitor as the artists who came long years ago to absorb the wave of creative thought which pleased them more than any other. Notre Dame, the Sacre-Coeur, the Arch of Triumph, the Place de la Concorde with its 3,300-year- old Obelisk of Luxor stretching toward the French-blue sky, give the city a grace and charm which cannot be found anywhere else in the world. Paris at age 2,000 remains the kind of city where the Pont Neuf or "new bridge" built in 1578 is the oldest in the city.

She is also the kind of city where today you can walk in the Place Dauphine and still get a fairly good idea of what Paris was like in the 17th Century. Close by the Place Dauphine is the Palais de Justice, a big black building flanked by two towers which jut out and a third which forms the corner of the Boulevard. St. Louis lived there and had built within its boundaries the Saint Chapelle, that slender gem of Gothic architecture. Within the same limits, at the Prison of the Conciergerie, some of the most dramatic scenes of the French Revolution took place and on the Quai du Marche Neuf beside the Prefecture of Police one can see the traces of the heroic stand made by the Parisian police against the Germans at the time of the liberation of Paris in 1944.

So, as Francis I, King of France, said of her, "Paris is not a city, but a world." That she floats but never sinks is also true. And this year, on the occasion of her bimillenary, the world can only lift its hat in tribute, and wish her 2,000 years more of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Projectionists Strike At 13 St. L. Theatres

St. Louis.

Failure to reach an agreement on a wage hassle, 40 projectionists, members of Local 143-A, IATSE, walked out of 13 houses catering to Negro trade last week. Notice of the impending strike was given the owners of the houses, most of which are indie-owned, a week before the walkout. The Aubert, a St. Louis Amus. Co. unit, originally included in the wage hike hassle, reached an agreement and is operating.

The houses dark are the Circle, Amythis, Carver, Regal, Star, Douglas, Marquette, Criterion, Comet, Laclede, Roosevelt, New Movie and Strand.

A REPUBLIC PRODUCTION

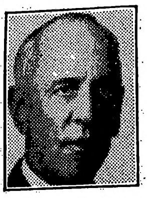
Overly Rugged Individualists

By EARL J. HUDSON

(President, United Detroit Theatres Corp.)

Detroit.

To a far greater extent than ever before the destinies of the motion picture industry depend on showmanship in production distribution and exhibition. Public interest in attractions that are ordinary or generally similar to previous stories and themes has become negligible.



Hudson

This fact spells out its own answer. Exhibition has to give top attractions longer playing time. This can be made profitable for those concerned in proportion to the extent to which public interest is aroused by the pre-opening ticket-selling campaigns. Penetration cannot be accomplished for an important picture by merely two or three advance display ads on consecutive days. Ticket-selling activity should be started on the local level well in advance of an opening, and national advertising by the producers and distributors should be well in advance of initial openings, wherever they may be.

It is the belief of many exhibitors in the Detroit area that the so-called "fringe" theatres have a dubious future, particularly those of small capacity and which, in physical appointments, are antiques and which reflect low maintenance expenditures.

The public trend away from ordinary pictures or those that do not offer impressive advertising and exploitation angles, will result in many changes in theatre policies as to matinees, continuous shows, and even continuous operation. These will be problems for individual determination and many of the answers probably will have to be the product of the proverbial "trial-and-error" procedure.

Arbitration gives the industry a private laundry for its soiled or torn linen. Litigation brings our differences and problems into public view and generally with the most sordid elements receiving highest visibility. Arbitration, like unity, will be the product of long-range effort because litigation for years has been the habit of rugged individualism.

Boxoffice prospects for 1952 will be in direct proportion to Hollywood's accomplishments and to showmanship on the exhibitor level. There are many "ifs" in this prognosis. "If" producers can achieve more originality in story treatment and in characterization; "if" production and distribution create impressive and intriguing national advertising and publicity campaigns, and "if" exhibition pinpoints its ticket-selling efforts on the local level with equally impressive campaigns pre-opening, and "if" the ratio of top pictures to the total of releases is reasonably increased, 1952 should show substantial improvement over 1951.

UA Sales Chief's Pitch

which spelled h-i-t boxoffice. Each was daring, each paid off and each showed the way to the rest of the industry.

Take Ben Hecht, for instance. He is generally accepted as one of the great talents of our time. Yet only as an independent producer could he have considered writing, producing and directing so unusual a film as his forthcoming Edward G. Robinson-Eddie Albert-Marhas Hunt starrer, "Actors and Sin." Conversely, as an independent producer, he had to make a picture that breaks with much that even he himself has done in the past.

So, too, with such newcomers as Clarence Greene and Russell Rouse, the writing-producing-directing team that made "The Well" for Harry Popkin. So, too, with Kenneth McEldcwney, a producer who had the determination and spirit to make "The River," an unusual story in an unusual setting, without a single star name. McEldowney demonstrated that the old pioneering spirit of the film industry is still alive, for he put together the only Technicolor picture ever filmed entirely in India.

What McEldowney did is now being done by others. The independents are making movies all over the world: David E. Rose produced "Saturday Island" with Linda Darnell on the West Indies island of Jamaica; Sam Spiegel got John Huston, Humphrey Bogart and Katharine Hepburn to go to the African jungle to make "The African Queen"; Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., brought Bette Davis and Gary Merrill to England for their first film since "All About Eve," a drama titled "Another Man's Poison"; Glenn Ford, Sir Cedric Hardwicke and Geraldine Brooks went to France to make "The Green Glove" for Benagoss Productions; producer Benedict Bogeaus took Evelyn Keyes and Dennis O'Keefe on a tour of Mexico to film "One Big Affair," and Alexander Paal, carrying this global technique to its logical conclusion, accomplished something unique in producing "A Tale of Five Women" in five European capitals—London, Paris, Berlin, Rome and Vienna—with five separate casts, writers, directors and production crews.

What's more, outstanding Hollywood talents continue to develop new independent production companies. Among the latest are Mark Robson and Robert Wise, young directors with pictures like "Champion" and "The Day the Earth Stood Still" to their credit, who have formed Aspen Productions and have their first film, "The Tightrope," in production; Samuel Fuller, writer-director, who has become a producer and is preparing "Park Row" as his initial effort; Andrew Veiller, who made the forthcoming "Red Planet"; Frank Ross, veteran producer of such dramas as "Of Mice and Men" and such comedies as "The More the Merrier," and John Stillman, Jr., who formed Ross-Stillman Productions, whose first film is the Joan Caulfield-David Niven comedy, "The Lady Says No"; the writing-producing-directing team of Peter Berneis and John Reinhardt, whose Arrowhead Pictures started out with "Chicago Calling"; and the producer-director combination of Frank Melford and John Rawlins, who set up Ventura Pictures to make the outdoor dramas, "Rogue River" and "Fort Defiance" as an initial effort.

The independent producer not only is blazing a production trail. He is also showing the way in the merchandising of his films. COMPO's excellent campaign of bringing producers to the public through special tours is something independent producers have been doing for years. They follow through on their pictures, right into the smallest situations.

Clarence Greene, for example, went into an entire chain of situations in advance of openings of "The Well," working out problems, supervising premieres, meeting the press and the public.

Realistic Pulse-Feeling

As in their production ideas, this participation in the merchandising of their films is not something altruistic on the part of independent producers. It's a necessity, for the simple reason that they want to be sure to get the most out of every situation.

While out selling his picture in person, the independent producer is enabled to keep his finger on the public's pulse. He gets out of Hollywood and meets the people who "go to the movies" and he sees how they react to his pictures.

This field work also provides independent producers, who have a very personal interest in their films, with the opportunity of meeting exhibitors right in the theatre. The independent producer gets to talk to exhibitors, to discuss common problems, to hear the theatreman's squawks and to let the latter hear a few of his own. The result of this face-to-face relationship is better movies and better merchandising.

More Flexible Playdating

By BEN KALMENSON

(WB Sales V.P.)

For the greater part of the last year we have been operating with a slogan that has been widely advertised and publicized the trade papers, asking the nation's exhibitors to "Look Forward and Go Forward" with Warner Bros. This slogan was launched in every exchange center the country with a special of trade-showing at a time when the industry was operating in an atmosphere of nervousness and anxiety about the future. These "Look Forward — Go Forward" showings attracted the greatest number of exhibitors ever to attend trade screenings and resulted in a wave of confidence throughout the motion picture industry.

With other companies also coming through with top successes at the same time, exhibitors had ringing assurance that the foundations upon which our industry is based are strong and solid.

I look forward to a very healthy boxoffice in the future. I base my optimism on two factors: one, the product that is coming up; two, the close cooperation between exhibition and distribution that has been developing during the past year.

With the important product on the 1952 agenda of Warner Bros., I look forward to the discarding by all exhibitors of their present ideas of fixed playing time. I believe the properties to be presented by our studio will go a long way towards changing the fixed policy of pre-limited time for a picture engagement, a booking system which so often curtails the earned run of a picture to conform to pre-conceived time limitations.

A more flexible policy of playing a picture strictly according to its performance at the boxoffice would certainly mean better business for everyone. The recent and current engagements of "Streetcar Named Desire" are good cases in point, where so many exhibitors have continued the run of this attraction with profitable extensions for maximum returns.

I also look forward to the day when every exhibitor will show his own confidence in the product he is putting on his screen by getting out and selling that product himself to the public. If you've got a valuable piece of merchandise to sell, you should let your prospective buyers know immediately and with every possible medium at your command. Tell them you've got it and tell them in a big way. And make sure that you know all about the product yourself.

There are still exhibitors who don't go to the trouble of seeing their own merchandise at the trade screenings which are arranged for their convenience all over the nation. How can anyone convince the buying public of the excellence of product he has not taken the trouble to look at himself beforehand? An exhibitor's confidence in his product reflects itself in the public; and his lack of confidence also finds its way to the potential ticket buyers. I see exhibitors becoming more alert to their key position in this respect.

I also look forward to the results of the studios' complete awareness of the changing tastes and reactions of the public. Our studio, along with the other major plants, is constantly checking the pulse of the person who buys a ticket at the boxoffice. That person's type of entertainment is our type of entertainment. The public's taste, as it changes and as it remains constant, is a healthy challenge to the inventive minds of our production talent. The studios have definitely taken up that challenge, and are meeting it with a range and scale of entertainment appeal that no other entertainment medium, I feel, can offer.

Chain Operation Discourages Showmanship; 'Roadshow' Prices Fallacious -- Berger's Beefs

By BENJAMIN BERGER

(Northwest Exhibitor Leader)

Minneapolis.

Television is without doubt the toughest competition to motion picture theatres that has come up. It, however, is not the death knell of motion picture theatres. A number of smaller, so-called fringe operations will be eliminated. Theatres and motion pictures will undoubtedly live forever.

Everyone is familiar with the facts. The question is where do we go from here, and what is basically wrong with the business that makes it necessary to give these constant hypodermics?

My answer is very simple. The motion picture industry is a great industry. Motion pictures are a commodity which is as much of a necessity as any other commodity. However, they do not lend themselves to large chain operations. The development of the large chains almost eliminated creative showmanship and greatly damaged our industry.

The distributors' sales policies are predicated on discouraging showmanship, rather than encouraging it. There is no industry, to my knowledge, which does not offer an incentive in the sales of its product in order to encourage a greater desire for its merchandise.

The present percentage policies are most damaging. The rank and file exhibitors do not wish to exploit these top pictures since they know that the distributor will get the lion's share of the receipts and, in addition, use those percentage receipts as a yardstick to measure what the exhibitor should pay for its "B" pictures, which makes for an unprofitable operation for the theatre.

From 'Nation' to 'Wind'

An extra large number of motion pictures are now being released and labeled roadshows. The origin of the name "roadshow" goes back to "Birth of a Nation." When it was first released, it was accompanied by a large band playing on the stage accompanying the picture. Later, the film companies began releasing pictures and calling them roadshows without an accompanying band and insisting on advanced admission prices.

Of all such pictures released, in my opinion, there was only one picture that merited advanced admission prices, namely, "Gone with the Wind." I feel that these pictures currently called roadshows are a menace to the business. It implies to the customers that all the other pictures released are not very good. I can see the advisability of showing a so-called top picture at advanced admission prices in one showcase in each territory, thus giving the picture added prestige, but in the rank-and-file theatres all pictures should show at regular admission prices.

I feel that intra-trade unity is a must for this industry. COMPO is the beginning of it and undoubtedly has done some good. Due, however, to the many diverse personalities and conflicts, it will take some time for the establishment of a real unity in this industry.

Grassroots Not So Pessimistic

By M. LOEWENSTEIN

(Pres., Theatre Owners of Oklahoma, Inc.)

Oklahoma City.

Having just completed a three months face-lifting job in my one-house, 37-year theatre operation, and paid the terrific costs of today's remodeling, I feel quite qualified to "crystal-gaze," with my now glassy eyes, and expound upon the past, present and future of our industry with an unusual assurance that time always proves all things, right or wrong.

Today's principal upset and dilemma seems to revolve about the future of our latest bugaboo, TV. Television is picture business in reverse. It came along, sold millions of sets, and, to date, is trying to justify itself and produce satisfactory programs, with some questionable results. The cost to the set owners is luxurious as compared with the popular-priced theatre tickets. The cost to the advertiser is almost prohibitive.

Theatre owners must recognize TV as competitive. So was radio in its beginning. As long as we are in business we'll have competition of sorts. It's our place not to get panicky, and to firmly meet the new challenge, which may yet prove itself somewhere a boon. As tax sources lessen, advertising will tighten expensive installation costs and retreating enthusiasm may land this new art squarely "piggy-back" pictures.

The present trend to allocate special TV channels to theatre use is highly desirable as special attractions can prove boxoffice. And as theatres already provide better film attractions, they may hold the final key to success of this type of broadcasting.

Exhibitors have a correlated obligation in shaping their own destiny, and what may be primary to this is the trend toward "super" pictures and the dropping of "B" pictures. Our business prospered highest in mass appeal. This must never be lost sight of by exhibitors, and while some houses cater to class trade others could not exist long without the bread-and-butter type of productions.

The theatre owner often is his worst walking advertisement. I met one the other day, who queried, "How's business? TV's hurting us, isn't it?", and in the next breath, "There haven't been many good pictures lately, have there?" What a catechism of gloom?

Is it any wonder the public takes up this thinking, loses interest, and our boxoffices decline? We should exude enthusiasms, or at least not radiate self-criticism. Not everyone likes the same woman nor the same film; else critics would be doing more just reviewing instead of criticizing.

It goes without saying that while our methods of trading are unorthodox, as compared with general business, yet we surely are not the crooks that extremists in both groups would lead us to believe. These rabble-rousers frequently make impression through their vociferousness, but the final measure of our business relationship is determined by the prevailing human desire to deal above the table. To follow any other course defeats its own purpose.

Having traveled part time with a "Movietime" unit I am convinced that here exhibitor and producer spent wisely together and profited. More tours and convention appearances for exhibitor contact would prove profitable, more profitable than much so-called exploitation effort. Show business is glamor and we shouldn't let it tarnish.

Par Brochure Woos Newsreel Interest

Paramount is aiming to hypo interest in newsreels via publication of a brochure which argues that surveys and "careful" analysis prove that TV cannot take the place of the film reels in theatres.

Outfit makes the pitch that only the newsreels "have the advantage of expert editing, the finish and polish that results in patrons getting the important highlights of events that interest them rath than having to sit through endless, dull footage before getting to the heart of the matter."

Par further contends that the newsreels have the advantage over TV in the sports field, citing the National Collegiate Athletic Assn.'s limitation on football games which may not be televised. It's said that TV spot news comes at unannounced times and not practical to catch.

Chi Perking Up With Arrival Of Year-End Holiday; 'Dreams'-Vaude Bright Near $50,000, '10 Men' Tall

Chicago.

Grosses here have reached a new low in the last three weeks. If it hasn't been deep snow one day, it's below zero the next. While the usual pre-Xmas lull is expected, the blizzards on top of everything else are making theatre owners shudder.

Pickup of biz after Christmas is being tempered by a cold wave and snow over the weekend. About the only thing to offset the blasts is the flock of new product and New Year's Eve usual price hike. Chicago is opening with "I'll See You in My Dreams" coupled with a Danny Thomas personal for one day. State-Lake brought in "Ten Tall Men" and "Fort Defiance" which should hit a tall $18,000.

Other product falls in the holdover class with the best appearing to be "Callaway Went Thataway" with Ames Bros. onstage at Oriental for excellent $50,000. Action fare of "Distant Drums" and "The Highwayman" should reach nice total at Roosevelt while "Cimarron Kid" and "Finders Keepers" shapes passable at Grand.

"Two Tickets to Broadway" and "Whip Hand" at United Artists seems among better grossers with brisk take, also in second round. "Detective Story" at the Woods should hold staunch. "Emperor's Nightingale" at World appears neat for first holdover week. Only long-run pic is "The River," at Ziegfeld with trim fifth week at upped admissions.

Estimates for Last Week

Chicago (B&K) (3,900; 55-98)—"I'll See You in My Dreams" (WB) with vaude. Looks bright $50,000. Last week, "Man in Saddle" (Col), $23,000.

Grand (RKO) (1,200; 55-98)—"Cimarron Kid" and "Finders Keepers" (U) (2d wk). Passable $10,000. Last week, $13,000.

Oriental (Indie) (3,400; 55-98)—"Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G) with Ames Bros. in person. Heading for great $50,000. Last week, $40,000.

Roosevelt (B&K) (1,500; 55-98)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "The Highwayman" (Mono) (2d wk). Nifty $14,000 looms. Last week, $18,000.

State-Lake (B&K) (2,700; 98-$1.25)—"Ten Tall Men" (Col) and "Ft, Defiance' (UA). Tall $18,000 possible. Last week, "American in Paris" (M-G) (7th wk), $8,000.

United Artists (B&K) (1,700; 55-98)—"Two Tickets to Broadway (RKO) and "Whip Hand" (RKO) (2d wk). Fine $14,000 in sight. Last week, $18,000.

World (Indie) (587; 80)—"Emperor's Nightingale" (Indie) (2d wk). Fine $4,000. Last week, $6,000.

Woods (Essaness) (1,073; 98)—"Detective Story" (Par) (2d wk). Strong $30,000 likely. Last week, $35,000.

Ziegfeld (Lopert) (434; $1.25-$2.40)—"The River" (UA) (5th wk). Neat $4,000. Last week, same.

'Racket' Lusty $7,500, Omaha; 'Tickets' Wow $8,200, 'Elopement' 8G

Omaha.

Despite improved opposition "Two Tickets To Broadway" at the State ran off with top biz honors last week when it hit smash total. Of the others "Too Young to Kiss" at Orpheum did a fair session. Severe cold, winds and intermittent snowfall was a handicap most of week. Practically all new programs opened on New Year's eve or New Year's day.

Estimates for Last Week

Orpheum (Tristates) (3,000; 16-70)—"My Favorite Spy" (Par) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono). Last week, "Too Young To Kiss" (M-G) and "Red Badge Courage" (M-G), fair $9,000.

Paramount (Tristates) (2,800; 16-70)—"Starlift" (WB). Last week, "Elopement" (20th), mild $8,000.

State (Goldberg) (865; 25-75)—"American in Paris" (M-G). Last week, "Two Tickets To Broadway" (RKO), smash $8,200.

Omaha (Tristates) (2,100; 16-70)—"Flame of Araby" (U) and "Fury of the Congo" (Col). Last week, "Tanks Are Coming" (WB), good $8,000.

Brandeis (RKO) (1,500; 16-70)—"Double Dynamite" (RKO). Started Monday (31). Last week, "The Racket" (RKO), aided by two holiday stageshows, nice $7,500.

Grosses This Week

Film grosses in this issue, because of early presstime, are limited to recapitulation of last week's business. In some few instances details of how new pictures opened are indicated.

'Drums,' 'Women' Bring Det. Cheer

Detroit.

This motor capital is piled to the radiator cap with snow. A bundle of it arrived Christmas Day, smothering biz. Exhibs are hoping that new product and a herculean snow removal job will bring forth a Happy New Year. Last reports, however, were that more snow and subzero temperatures are on the way. "Distant Drums," "Westward the Women" and "Submarine Command" shape as top newcomers.

Estimates for Last Week

Fox (Fox-Detroit) (5,000; 70-95)—"Fixed Bayonets" (20th) and "Japanese War Bride" (20th). Last week, "Elopement" (20th) and "Magic Carpet" (Col), slow $21,000.

Michigan (United Detroit) (4,000; 70-95)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "Lady Pays Off" (U). Last week, "Starlift" (WB) and "Darling, How Could You" (Par) (2d wk), slow $7,000.

Palms (UD) (2,900; 10-95)—"Submarine Command" (Par) and "Big Night" (UA). Last week, "Raging Tide" (U) and "Lady From Texas" (U), fair $7,000.

Madison (UD) (1,900; 70-95)—"Native Son" (Indie) and "Angelo" (Indie). Last week, "Close To Heart" (WB) and "Wooden Horse" (Indie), slight $6,000.

United Artists (UA) (1,900; 70-95)—"Westward Women" (M-G) and "Calling Bulldog Drummond" (M-G). Last week, "Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G) and "Lilli Marlene" (RKO), dull $5,000.

Adams (Balaban) (1,700; 70-95)—"American in Paris" (M-G) (6th wk). Last week, okay $6,000 for fifth round.

'Quo Vadis' Pacing Hub Upbeat Despite Storm; 'Drums' Looks Bright

Boston.

Icy road conditions bopped Christmas Day biz at downtown majors with the exception of "Quo Vadis," which opened that day with fat b.o. at Orpheum and State. "I Want You" at Astor which was fairly good, was not up to expectations on first week. "My Favorite Spy" at Metropolitan looms nice while "Distant Drums" at Paramount and Fenway, shapes big. "Double Dynamite" at Memorial, so-so for opening week, is holding.

Estimates for Last Week

Astor (B&Q) (1,200; 50-95)—"I Want You" (RKO) (2d wk). First week was stout $11,500.

Boston (RKO) (3,000; 40-85)—"Cimarron Kid" (U) and "Unknown World" (Lip). Not too staunch. Last week, "Cave of Outlaws" (U) and "Diamond City" (Indie), tepid $7,000.

Fenway (NET) (1,373; 40-85)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "St. Benny the Dip" (UA). Shaping for sturdy week. In ahead, "Crosswinds." (Par) and "Highwayman" (Mono), sluggish $4,000.

Memorial (RKO) (3,000; 40-85)—"Double Dynamite" (RKO) and "Whistle Eaton Falls" (Col) (2d wk). First round was so-so $11,500.

Metropolitan (NET) (4,367; 40-85)—"My Favorite Spy" (Par) and "New Mexico" (UA). Nice week likely. Last week, "Man With Cloak" (M-G) and "Mr. Imperium" (M-G), very dull $9,500.

Orpheum (Loew) (3,000; 90-$1.50)—"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (2d wk). Opened very strongly on Dec. 25. May go as high as $45,000.

Paramount (NET) (1,700; 40-85)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "St. Benny the Dip" (UA). Looms big. Last week, "Crosswinds" (Par) and "Highwayman" (Mono), fair $10,500.

State (Loew) (3,500; 90-$1.50)—"Quo Vadis" M-G) (2d wk). Hefty takings in first week with over $20,000 hoped for.

'CALLAWAY' THATAWAY IN DENVER, FINE 10G

Denver.

In a lukewarm week "Callaway Went Thataway" was the only film rating a holdover. It did fine at the Broadway. String of new pix open for New Year's. Three houses used dual reissue setups while two others had a reissue for half of their bills. "I'll Never Forget You," at Denver and Esquire, proved fair.

Estimates for Last Week

Aladdin (Fox) (1,400; 40-80) — "Weekend With Father" (U). Last week, "Drums Deep South" (RKO) and "Hard, Fast, Beautiful" (RKO), day-date with Tabor, Webber, fair $5,500.

Broadway (Wolfberg) (1,500; 40-80) — "Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G) (2d wk). Last week fine $10,000.

Denham (Cockrill) (1,750; 40-80) —"Detective Story" (Par). Last week, "Birth of Blues" (Par) and "The Virginian" (Par) (reissues), fair $9,500.

Denver (Fox) (2,525; 40-80) — "Distant Drums" (WB). Last week, "Never Forget You" (20th) and "Jesse James" (20th), day-date with Esquire, fair $12,000.

Esquire (Fox) (742; 40-80) — "Distant Drums" (WB). Last week, "Never Forget You" (20th) and "Jesse James" (20th), fair $2,500.

Orpheum (RKO) (2,600; 40-80)—"American in Paris" (M-G). Last week, "Hitler's Children" (RKO) and "Behind Rising Sun" (RKO) (reissues), poor $5,000 in 6 days.

Paramount (Fox) (2,200; 40-80)—"Lady Says No" (UA) and "Badlands Dakota" (U). Last week, "Slaughter Trail" (RKO) and "On Loose" (RKO), fair $8,000.

Tabor (Fox) (1,967; 40-80) — "Weekend With Father" (U). Last week, "Drums Deep South" (RKO) and "Hard, Fast, Beautiful" (RKO), also Aladdin, Webber, fair $5,500.

Webber (Fox) (750; 40-80) — "Weekend With Father" (U). Last week, "Drums Deep South" (RKO) and "Hard, Fast, Beautiful" (RKO), also Aladdi , Tabor, fair $2,500.

'Drums' Rousing Leader in Philly

Philadelphia.

Rain over the holiday cut down the Christmas week take in first-runs here, but most houses held over their bills expecting a strong New Year's weekend. In most cases, pix ran below expectations. "Elopement," at the Fox, fell off after nice start to land a mild total. "Distant Drums" started out very big and seems sure to be the Xmas-New Year's week standout.

Most houses have skedded all night shows for the advent of 1952 and Mummers Parade, the following day, generally brings crowds of 1,000,000 and more into the city.

Estimates for Last Week

Aldine (WB) (1,303; 50-$1.30)—"Man in Saddle" (Col). Though not an action house this western was okay at $8,000. Not up to hopes, however.

Boyd (WB) (2,360; 50-$1.30) — "I Want You" (RKO). Very strong considering conditions with $18,000, below expectancy. Some public resentment against price hike.

Earle (WB) (2,700; 50-$1.30) — "FBI Girl" (Lip) plus Lionel Hampton orch, Clark Bros. onstage. Good $20,000, over hopes.

Fox (20th) (2,250; 50-99)—"Elopement" (20th). Wound up much less than expected with mild $12,000. Expect to top this in current week.

Goldman (Goldman) (1,200; 50-$1.30)—"Double Dynamite" (RKO). Looks to land strong take. Last week, "On Loose" (RKO), mild $9,000.

Mastbaum (WB) (4,360; 50-$1.30)—"Flame of Araby" (U). Last week, "Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep), slow $14,000 in 12 days.

Midtown (Goldman) (1,000; 50-99)—"Weekend With Father" (U). Last week, "Slaughter Trail" (RKO) and "Whip Hand" (RKO), fair $6,000.

Randolph (Goldman) (2,500; 50-$1.30)—"Two Tickets to Broadway" (RKO). Hefty week looms. Last week, "American in Paris" (M-G) (7th wk), sluggist $7,500 in 5 days.

Stanley (WB) (2,900; 50-$1.30)—"Distant Drums" (WB). Likely will lead town. Last week, "It's a Big Country" (M-G), slow $13,000 in 9 days.

Stanton (WB) (1,473; 50-99) — "Flight to Mars" (Mono). Fair $7,500 and below expectancy.

Trans-Lux (T-L) (500; 85-$1.20) —"Detective Story" (Par) (6th wk). Fine $7,300, a bit over hopes.

World (G&S) (500; 50-$1.20 — "Lavender Hill Mob" (U) (5th wk). Solid $3,500 after $3,700 for fourth round.

Broadway Continues Holiday Surge; 'Dynamite'-Vaude in Smash Opening, 'Spy' Big $33,000, 'Drums' Loud 45G

Although badly hurt Christmas Day by the snow and steady rain at night, Broadway first-runs then swung into high gear. Five new bills launched prior to Dec. 25, plus the four that opened Christmas Day, naturally are whetting appetites of prospective patrons.

Most big N. Y. theatres counted on trade to pick up late Christmas Day, but the rain that day arrived just when film houses were looking for the upbeat. As a result grosses for the day were much below hopes, being especially disappointing after Sunday trade had soared above Saturday (22).

Current session carrying through New Year's will be helped not only by the holiday scale on Jan. 1 but also by the usual kited prices for New Year's Eve shows.

Outstanding grosser obviously is "I'll See You in My Dreams," with the annual Xmas stageshow, although bill is in its fourth week, at the Music Hall. Strong combination hit a great $151,500 in the third session ending Dec. 26.

Of the new bills which wound up last Wednesday, Thursday or Friday, "Death of a Salesman" looks tops at the Victoria. It hit a terrific $37,000 in its first week, very socko for this house. Just a step ahead, but in the much-larger Rivoli, is "Decision Before Dawn" with a big $40,000, or close to it. Also very strong is "I Want You" at the Criterion, which is looking for $34,000 in initial round ended Friday (28).

"Elopement," with Guy Mitchell heading stageshow, was a good $70,000 in opening round at the Roxy and likely will go far ahead of this in the second week. Bill perked so much in last four days of the past week that the house decided to hold it for a third round. "Flame of Araby," which only did a good $17,000 in first week at the State, is shaping comparatively stronger in the six-day holdover frame. "Wild Blue Yonder" was pencilled in to open Jan. 1.

Smash stagefilm combo opening on Christmas was the Paramount's "Double Dynamite," plus a stageshow headed by Joey Adams, Tony Bennett, Art Mooney band and the Five De Marco Sisters. Lineup was heading for a terrific total as it went into Saturday (29), first three days being well ahead of corresponding week last year.

"Distant Drums," which also teed off Dec. 25, is heading for a loud $45,000 or better at the Warner. "My Favorite Spy" is comparatively as big with $33,000 possible on initial round at the Globe. "Tales of Hoffmann" is doing surprisingly smash trade at the Sutton in first week despite its very long date at the Bijou.

"Pandora and Flying Dutchman" wound up its third stanza Dec. 27 at the new Normandie Theatre with a big $9,700. "Detective Story" in its eighth round is soaring ahead of its big $18,200 registered in the seventh week at the Mayfair. It may run as much as $10,000 better than the previous round.

"Quo Vadis" also is racing far ahead of its previous week in the seventh round at the Capitol, with a smash $56,000. It stays three extra days to open "Westward the Women" Dec. 31. "Vadis" continues at the Astor, switching to continuous run Jan. 1. It also is running better than the seventh frame at the Astor.

Estimates for Last Week

Astor (City Inv.) (1,300; $1.25-$1.80)—"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (8th wk). Current week ends Jan. 3, with sharp upbeat anticipated via New Year's Eve and fact that house went continuous-run Jan. 1. Seventh session was $24,000.

Bijou (City Inv.) (589; $1.20-$2.40)—"Henry V" (UA) (reissue) (2d wk). Initial round ending Monday (31) heading for okay $7,000, based on first few days trade. Last week house was shuttered.

Capitol (Loew's) (4,820; 95-$1.80) "Westward the Women" (M-G). Opened Monday (31). In ahead, "Quo Vadis" (M-G) (7th wk-10 days) appeared likely to wind up great engagement with sock $56,000 for seven-day period ended Thursday (27). Sixth week was $35,000.

Criterion (Moss) (1,700; 50-$1.80) —"I Want You" (RKO) (2d wk). First week concluded Friday (28) was big $34,000, but below hopes. In ahead, "Strange Door" (U) (2d wk), $9,000.

Globe (Brandt) (1,500; 50-$1.80) —"My Favorite Spy" (Par) (2d wk). Initial round ending Monday (31) was pushing for possible smash $33,000. In ahead, "Capt. Fabian" (Rep) (2d wk-5 days), was fine $9,000 with boost from preview of "Spy" on final day of run.

Fine Arts (Davis) (468; 90-$1.80) —"Lavender Hill Mob" (U) (12th wk). Improving sharply in 11th stanza ended Monday (31) to easily top the sturdy $8,000 for 10th week.

Mayfair (Brandt) (1,736; 50-$1.80) —"Detective Story" (Par) (9th wk). Eighth round ending Monday (31) pushing near fat $29,000 after big $18,200 seventh week, over hopes.

Normandie (Normandie Theatre Corp.) (592; 95-$1.80)—"Pandora and Flying Dutchman" (M-G) (4th wk). Third week ended last Thursday (27) pushed up to big $9,700 after $7,500 for second round. First week at new house on West 57th St. got off in smash style with terrific $10,500.

Palace (RKO) (1,700; $1.20-$2.40) — All-vaude, two-a-day policy topped by Judy Garland (12th wk). Current frame started yesterday (Tues.). The 11th week ending Sunday (30) was heading for giant $58,000, way ahead of the big $35,000 done in 10th stanza. House getting $7.20 top for New Year's Eve with big advance sale.

Paramount (Par) (3,664; 70-$1.80) —"Double Dynamite" (RKO) plus stage bill topped by Joey Adams, Tony Bennett, Art Mooney orch, Five De Marco Sisters (2d wk). First round ending Monday (31) headed for terrific total and a figure ahead of the corresponding week a year ago. Combo started out with smash totals and maintained pace, and, of course, was aided by New Year's Eve, when house got $2.20. In ahead, "The Racket" (RKO), with Pearl Bailey, Henny Youngman, Bernie Mann orch heading stageshow (2d wk-6 days), okay $40,000 with boost from previews of "Dynamite" on final day of run.

Park Ave. (Reade) (583; 90-$1.50) —"Clouded Yellow" (Col) (8th wk). Seventh session ending Sunday (30) appeared likely to get up to $5,000 or better after good $4,300 for sixth week.

Paris (Indie) (568) (1.20-$2.40)—"The River" (UA) (17th wk). The 16th round ending Sunday (30) also building up past the fine $7,500 registered in the 15th week.

Radio City Music Hall (Rockefellers) (5,945; 80-$2.40)—"I'll See You in My Dreams" (WB) with Christmas stageshow (4th wk). Current session ending today (2) seems certain of topping the third week's total by a large margin. Third week hit great $151,500. Fourth week helped by fact that the Hall, as usual, is getting $3.60 for reserved mezzanine seats on New Year's Eve performance.

Rivoli (UAT-Par) (2,092; 90-$1.80)—"Decision Before Dawn" (20th) (2d wk). Current frame winds up Jan. 3. First week climbed to big $40,000, with boost from fine critical appraisal.

Roxy (20th) (5,886; 80-$2.20)—"Elopement" (20th) plus Guy Mitchell and annual spectacle, "Ave Maria," topping stageshow (2d wk). First holdover round ending Jan. 2 seems assured of topping initial week, with big boost from New Year's Eve and tilted scale. Set to go a third. First week good $70,000, considerably below hopes, and disappointing for Xmas week.

State (Loew's) (3,450; 55-$1.80)—"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep). Opened Jan. 1. Last week, "Flame of Araby" (U) (2d wk-6 days) held about even in abbreviated session with first week's good $17,000.

Warner (WB) (2,756; 85-$2)—"Distant Drums" (WB) (2d wk). Initial session ending Monday (31) appears likely to reach sock $45,000. In ahead, "Starlift" (WB), fair $22,000 in 11 days.

Sutton (R&B) (561; 90-$1.50)—"Tales of Hoffmann" (Indie) (2d wk). First round ending Monday (31) headed for smash $15,000. In ahead, "Browning Version" (U) (8th wk-6 days), $4,000.

Trans-Lux 60th St. (T-L) (453; 90-$1.50)—"Galloping Major" (Indie) (3d wk). Second frame ending Friday (28) seems assured of topping $4,000, not far from opening week's $4,500.

Trans-Lux St (T-L) (540; 90-$1.50) —"Man With Cloak" (M-G) (6th wk). Fifth round ending Monday (31) likely will hold near previous week's okay $3,000.

Victoria (City Inv.) (1,060; 55-$1.80)—"Death of Salesman" (Col) (2d wk). Initial holdover week ending Jan. 2 probably will beat opening week's terrific $37,000.

6 New Films, Brisk H.O.s Lift L. A.; 'Streetcar' Starts Out Sock, 'Women' Opens Stoutly, 'African Queen' Same

Los Angeles.

New product and several strong holdovers will make the first week in the New Year here unusually big. Many theatres launched fresh, strong films Xmas Day or a few days afterwards.

New entries started during the last seven days were "Model and Marriage Broker" in four houses, "Westward the Women," which started strongly at Loew's State and the Egyptian; "Favorite Spy" at L. A. Paramount and Hawaii, "Streetcar," which opened its downtown run in smash style at the Rialto; "African Queen," which was launched strongly at Wilshire, and "Flame of Araby," in new three-house unit.

"Distant Drums" went into its second frame in three Warner theatres Dec. 29 after a sturdy $40,000 opening week. "Two Tickets to Broadway" started its initial holdover round the same day at Hill street and Pantages following a socko $37,400 in first week, over expectancy. "Decision Before Dawn" launched its second session Dec. 28 after neat $20,600 opening stanza in three houses. "I Want You," rated good in opening frame, went into second week Dec. 28 at Hollywood Paramount.

Estimates for Last Week

Seattle Soars; 'Drums,' 'Tall Men,' 'Want You,' 'Spy' Fast Newcomers

Seattle.

Cool weather and new, strong product helped biz over the year-end holidays. "Double Dynamite" moved from Orpheum to the Blue Mouse for second stanza. "Elopement" held over at Fifth Avenue even though it fared mildly in first week, "Callaway Went Thataway" is taking a second week at the Music Hall but otherwise all pix are new.

Estimates for Last Week

Blue Mouse (Hamrick) (800; 65-90) — "Double Dynamite" (RKO) and "Overland Telegraph" (RKO). (m.o.). Last week, "Raging Tide" (U) and "Not Divided" (UA) (2d wk), nice $3,500.

Coliseum (Evergreen) (1,829; 65-90) — "10 Tall Men" (Col) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono). Last week, "Flight to Mars" (Mono) and "Highwayman" (Mono), oke $8,700.

Mpls. Willing to Pay Higher Admish Prices For Outstanding Pix

Minneapolis.

Though the boxoffice generally is plenty depressed hereabouts it is being demonstrated that the local public is willing to fork across advanced admissions for outstanding pictures.

The 400-seat World upped its night price from 76c. to $1 for "An American in Paris" (M-G), which it landed on competitive bids, and the picture packed 'em in from the very outset, shattering the theatre's boxoffice record. It's in its fifth week currently, with no slackening of attendance, and indications are that it may run for anywhere from two to four months longer. In newspaper ads, in fact, house now advertises "second month" instead of fifth week. Grosses have been fluctuating between $6,000 and $9,000, not even the traditional pre-Christmas adverse influences or sub-zero temperatures being able to squelch patronage.

Paradoxically, M-G may wind up with more rental revenue for the picture in the 400-seater than if it had gone into the Paramount circuit's 4,000-seat Radio City. In latter house it likely would have had to bow out after two weeks, industry leaders here believe, and M-G does not permit moveovers for any of its releases here.

'Vadis' May Hit Record in K. C.

Kansas City.

"Quo Vadis" dominates the picture here currently, with new record and smash biz opening week at Midland. Playing at advanced admission with $1.24 top, film looks good for several weeks. Among regular runs "Starlift" is strong, closing out 9-day run at Paramount Monday with nice total. "Distant Drums" opened at Paramount Jan. 1 as did "Elopement" in its four first-run theatres after satisfactory week with "Weekend with Father."

Estimates for Last Week

Esquire (Fox Midwest) (820; 50-75)—"Jungle Book" and "Thief of Bagdad" (reissues). Opened Christmas Day (25) and runs through Jan. 2. For the 9 days looks okay $4,500.

Kimo (Dickinson) (504; 75-99)—"Fantasia" (RKO) (reissue). After several times in this house, pleasant $2,000.

Midland (Loew's) (3,500; 90-$1.24) —"Quo Vadis" (M-G). Opened Christmas Day (25) to sock biz, and heading for giant figure and may top anything to play here. Holds over.

Missouri (RKO) (2,650; 50-75)—"Man in Saddle" (Col) and "Son of Dr. Jekyll" (Col). Moderate $8,000 looms.

Paramount (Tri-States) (1.900; 50-69) — "Distant Drums" (WB). Opened Tuesday (1). In ahead, "Starlift" (WB), brisk $12,000 in 9 days.

Tower, Uptown, Fairway, Granada (Fox Midwest) (2,100; 2.043; 700; 1,217; 50-75) — "Elopement" (20th). Opened Tuesday (1). Last week, "Weekend With Father" (U), oke $13,000.

Vogue (Golden) (550; 75-85)—"Lavender Hill Mob" (U) (7th wk). With holiday trade may top previous week's big $2,000.

Yuletide, New Year's Boost Cincy; 'Dreams,' 'Spy,' 'Kiss' Shape Sturdy Cincinnati.

Major houses ushering in 1952 with fine assortment of pix and prospect for an improvement over the sharp upsurge which started Christmas Day. New Year's Eve prices were tilted to 85c at Lyric and $1 at other theatres. Strong lineup of new films for New Year's Week includes "I'll See You in My Dreams" at Albee, "My Favorite Spy" at Palace, "Fixed Bayonets" at Keith's, and "Too Young to Kiss" at Grand. All four RKO theatres had Monday (31) openings for current week.

Estimates for Last Week

Albee (RKO) (3,100; 55-75)—"I'll See You in My Dreams" (WB). Last week "Double Dynamite" (RKO), okay $12,000.

Capitol (Mid-States) (2,000; 55-75)—"Elopement" (20th) (2d wk). Should top last week's fairish $7,000 bow which was retarded by pre-Yule handicap. "Sailor Beware" (Par) was inserted New Year's Eve.

Grand (RKO) (1,400; 55-75)—"Too Young To Kiss" (M-G) and "Bulldog Drummond" (M-G). Last week, "Aladdin Lamp" (Mono) and "Elephant Stampede" (Mono), moderate $7,000.

Keith's (Mid States) (1,542, 55-75)—"Fixed Bayonets" (20th). Opened Jan. 1. Last week, "Crosswinds" (Par), moderate $7,000.

Lyric (RKO) (1,400; 55-75)—"Ten Tall Men" (Col) (m.o.). Last week, "Hotel Sahara" (UA) and "Chicago Calling" (U), five days, and "Body Snatchers" (RKO) and "Isle of Dead" (RKO) (reissues), three days, mild $5,000.

Palace (RKO) (2,600; 55-75)—"My Favorite Spy" (Par). Last week, "Ten Tall Men" (Col), eight days, socko $15,000.

Mpls. Digs Out of Snow, Pre-Xmas; 'Spy,' 'Drums,' 'Racket' Solid New Pix

Minneapolis.

After sinking to the depths during the pre-Christmas period, the boxoffice here now is in the process of staging its usual holiday week comeback. Brutal weather continues to be a bane, but is being offset to some extent by the school vacation and the return to more normal biz stride. Stronger boxoffice ammunition is being fired, too, notably "My Favorite Spy," "Distant Drums" and "The Racket." "Westward the Women" is at the Gopher. All looks like they would surmount the snow and extreme cold.

Estimates for Last Week

Century (Par) (1,600; 50-76)—"Unknown Man" (M-G). Last week, "Christmas Carol" (UA), light $1,600 in 4 days.

Gopher (Berger) (1,000; 50-76)—"Westward the Women" (M-G). Last week, "You Never Can Tell" (U), mild $1,900.

Lyric (Par) (1,000; 50-76)—"Cave of Outlaws" (U). Last week, "Bride of Gorilla" (Indie) and "Panch Villa Returns" (UA), anemic $2,500.

Radio City (Par) (4,000; 50-76)—"My Favorite Spy" (Par). Last week, "Elopement" (20th), slight $11,000 in 10 days.

RKO-Orpheum (RKO) (2,800; 40-76)—"The Racket" (RKO). Last week, "Captain Blood" (WB) and "G-Men" (WB) (reissues), okay $3,500 for 4 days.

RKO-Pan (RKO) (1,600; 40-76)—"Aladdin" (Mono). Last week, "Isle of Dead" (RKO) and "Body Snatcher" (RKO) (reissues), lean $2,500.

State (Par) (2,300; 50-76)—"Distant Drums" (WB). Last week, "Raging Tide" (U), okay $4,000 i 5 days.

World (Mann) (400; 65-$1)—"An American in Paris" (M-G) (7th wk). Last week, satisfactory $2,000.

Estimates Are Net

Film gross estimates as reported herewith from the various key cities, are net; i. e., without the 20% tax. Distributors share on net take, when playing percentage, hence the estimated figures are net income.

The parenthetic admission prices, however, as indicated, include the U. S. amusement tax.

D. C. Pace Faster After Xmas; 'Quo Vadis' Nears New High; 'Dynamite' Big

Washington.

Midtown big pace is showing signs of considerable speeding up since Christmas Day. Most main-stem houses revised schedules for openings Dec. 24 or on Xmas Day, with new weeks preeming for New Year's Eve. Clear weather and four-day government holiday both helped jam the big houses. Outlook for New Year's Eve is very bright. "Quo Vadis" is heading for new record at Loew's Palace, while "Double Dynamite" looks sock at Keith's.

Estimates for Last Week

Capitol (Loew's (3,434; 55-90)—"Red Badge Courage" (M-G) plus Blackstone magic show onstage. Sole newcomer holding to conventional Thursday opening. Wound up with fine $19,000, very good considering that most of week was pre-Christmas.

Dupont (Lopert) (372; $1.20-$2.40)—"Tales of Hoffmann" (Indie) (2d run). Very solid $5,000, with most seats at $1.20 despite $2.40 top. Holds.

Keith's (RKO) (1,939; 44-85) — "Double Dynamite" (RKO). Sock session looms. Last week, "Tap Roots" (U) and "Brute Force" (U) (reissues), okay $5,500 in 5 days.

Metropolitan (Warner) (1,200; 44-74)—"FBI Girl" (Lip). Nice week in prospect despite thumbs down from crix. Last week,, "Criminal Lawyer" (Col), lean $4,000 in 4 days.

Palace (Loew's (2,370; 90-$1.50) —"Quo Vadis" (M-G). Christmas Day preem at highest scale since "Gone With Wind" (M-G) was show biz sensation of year here with gross skyrocketing and wham week in prospect admission scale goes to $1.50 top after 7 p.m., and grind policy. Last week, "Westward the Women" (M-G) (2d wk), fine $10,000.

Playhouse (Lopert) (485; $1.20-$2.40);"The River" (UA) (9th-final wk). Kept an additional session to get New Year's Eve trade. Last week, so-so $3,000.

Warner (WB) (2,174; 44-80) — "When Worlds Collide" (Par). Fine stanza is shaping. Last week, "Capt. Blood" (WB) (reissue), dim $4,000 in four days.

Trans-Lux (T-L) (654; 50-$1) — "Place in Sun" (Par) (13th wk). Still going strong as it segues into 4th month, with good $4,500 last week and signs of spurting this session.

'Drums,' 'Spy,' 'Dream' Robust Prov. Entries

Providence.

All exhibitors here are keeping their fingers crossed and hoping for an uplift as new bills usher in the New Year. Boff pix are booked all around to help drag in patrons. "Favorite Spy," "Ill See You in Dreams," and "Distant Drums" look ace newcomers.

Estimates for Last Week

Albee (RKO) (2,200; 44-65) — "Double Dynamite" (RKO) and "Unknown World" (RKO). Last week, "The Racket" (RKO) and "Young Scarface" (RKO), fair $8,500.

Majestic (Fay) (2,200; 44-65) — "Distant Drums" (WB). Last week, "Never Forget You" (20th) and "Steel Fist" (20th), fair $8,000.

Metropolitan (Snider) (3,100; 44-65)—"I'll See You In My Dreams" (WB). Last week, "Man In Saddle" (Col) and "Purple Heart Diary" (Col), weak $3,000.

State (Loew) (3,200; 44-65)—"Too Young To Kiss" (M-G) and "Girl On Bridge" (EL). Last week, "Elopement" (20th) and "Unknown Man" (M-G), okay $12,000.

Strand (Silverman) (2,200; 44-65) —"My Favorite Spy" (Par). Last week, "Family Secret" (Col) and "Harlem Globetrotters" (Col), good $7,500.

Frisco Picks Up With Holiday Session; 'Touch' NG 9G, 'Vadis' 21G, 5th

San Francisco.

All first-run biz on Market Street here in the past week was bogged down, with stormy weather blamed. An added factor is that the city traditionally is stay-at-home conscious on Christmas Day. A batch of new product is being launched near the end of week to take advantage of New Year's eve and Jan. 1 upbeat. Pix finishing their sessions are being paced by "Elopement" at the Fox, as far as total money is concerned. However, it was on the disappointing side.

Brightest holdover is "Quo Vadis," which held big in fifth stanza at the Warfield. "Light Touch" wound up lighter than expected at Paramount.

Estimates for Last Week

Golden Gate (RKO) (2,850; 60-85)—"On The Loose" (RKO) and "Dalton's Women" (RKO). Mild $7,500. Last week, "The Racket" (RKO), 5 days, $8,000.

Fox (FWC) (4,651; 60-95)—"Elopement" (20th) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono). Thin $15,000. Last week, "Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep), $11,500.

Warfield (Loew's) (2,656; 60-85) —"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (5th wk). Held to big $21,000. Last week, $22,000.

Paramount (Par) (2,646; 60-85)—"Light Touch" (M-G) and "Top Secret" (Indie). Very light $9,000. Last week, "Captain Blood" (WB) and "One Foot In Heaven" (WB) (reissues), $9,500.

St. Francis (Par) (1,400; 60-85)—"Man With Cloak" (M-G). Modest $8,000. Last week, "Detective Story" (Par) (5th wk), 5 days, $7,000.

Orpheum (No. Coast) (2,448; 55-85)—"Cave of Outlaws" (U) and "Mister Drake's Duck" (UA). Nsg $8,500. Last week, "Family Secret" (Col) and "Lady and The Bandit" (Col), same.

United Artists (No. Coast) (1,207; 55-85)—"Magic Carpet" (Col) and "Whistle At Eaton Falls" (Col). Lean $5,500. Last week, "Big Night" (UA) and "Chicago Calling" (Col), $6,500.

Stagedoor (A-R) (370; 85-$1)—"Fantasia" (RKO) (reissue). Modest $3,000. Last week, "The River" (UA), $2,800 with prices $1.20 to $1.40 (10th wk).

Clay (Rosener) (400; 65-85)—"Christmas Carol" (Indie) (2d wk) 4 days, $2,300. Last week, $3,300.

Larkin (Rosener) (400; 65-85)—"Orpheus" and "The Storm Within" (2d wk) (both reissues) 4 days, $1,900. Last week, $2,500.

Vogue (S.F. Theaters) (375; 1.00-$1.20)—"La Ronde" (Indie) (5th wk). $2,800. Last week, $3,400.

WE OBJECT

We object to calling this film "For Men Only."

We know its story... intimately. Sure it's a story of men. But its emotion is in the relationships of those men to three women.

Yes, we are the three women.

We ask you—are men or women the better judges of emotion? Take it from us... we'd call this picture For Women Only. Because we know. IT'S EVERY WOMAN'S PICTURE!

.Barnum &

"The Greatest Show On Earth" is as apt a handle for Cecil B. DeMille's Technicolored version of the Ringling Bros.-Barnum & Bailey circus as it is for the sawdust extravaganza itself. This is the circus with more entertainment, more thrills, more spangles and as much Big Top atmosphere as RB-B&B itself can offer. It's a smash certainty for high-wire grosses.

If the names best known to the aficionados who crowd the Ringling show each year prove insufficient for the marquee, DeMille has also provided Betty Hutton, Cornel Wilde, Charlton Heston, Dorothy Lamour, Gloria Grahame and James Stewart. Add to that the dozens of circus acts, the animals, music, parades, aerial specs and plenty of authentic sawdust "feel."

If this spectacle causes exhibs to do some palm-pounding of their own, they'll be plenty justified. B.o.-wise, its attraction is for sophisticates as well as the hordes who've traditionally so well patronized DeMille epics of the past and/or any circus in sight.

As has come to be expected from DeMille, the story line is not what could be termed subtle. While it may draw some critical catcalls, it does effectively serve the purpose of a framework for all the atmosphere and excitement of the circus on both sides of the big canvas. In any case, what bleacher fan wants to get mixed up with a plot he's going to have to wrestle with?

The RB-B&B end of the cast—actually some 85 acts, including vet clowns Emmett Kelly and Lou Jacobs, midget Cucciola and aerialist Antoinette Concello — can well take care of itself. Surprise is how superbly the Hollywoodites come off. Thesping is extremely effective, particularly as a result of the way DeMille's cameras and the special effects men have meshed the doubling to give the appearance of reality to Miss Hutton's and Cornel Wilde's feats on the flying trapeze.

Miss Hutton is pictured as the "queen flyer" who has a yen for Heston, the circus manager. Lad has sawdust for blood, however, To strengthen the show and thus enable it to play out a full season, he imports another aerialist, the flamboyant and debonair Sebastian (Cornel Wilde).

Much as it hurts, Heston deprives Miss Hutton of the centre ring to give it to Sebastian. Latter promptly falls for her and she rifts with Heston. That's quickly exploited by elephant girl Gloria Grahame, who also finds Heston a pretty attractive guy. In turn, that makes her boss, trainer Lyle Bettger, jealous, resulting in one of the pic's big thrill scenes—a jumbo with foot delicately poised on Miss Graham's nose as the furious trainer threatens her with the word to the elephant that would mean death.

Bettger's a thoroughly hissable villain—with a Teutonic accent yet—and when he gets fired by Heston rigs a robbery of the circus train. That provides what must be one of the most spectacular railroad wrecks in the memory of Hollywood's oldest special effects man. Bettger gets killed and Heston badly hurt—not so much, however, that he can't shout directions in the best "show-must-go-on" style. A final parade and performance are given by the injured and tattered circusites in a nearby field for the happy ending.

Most spectacular of the aerial scenes has Miss Hutton and Wilde jealously vying to outdo each other on the trapeze. In the process, the film audience ganders such seldom-seen stunts as a double somersault through a hoop to a free-swinging bar. The aerialist misses and, working sans net, realistically crashes to the ground with a thud that can be felt in the theatre.

James Stewart is woven into the pic as an extraneous but appealing plot element. He's pictured as a police-sought medico who never removes his clown makeup. He admits his identity as a doctor at the finale to save the life of the injured Heston and pave the way for the latter and Miss Hutton to get together for the bowout. Likewise, he finds the cure for Wilde's paralyzed arm, hurt when he falls from the trapeze, enabling "The Great Sebastian" to walk off with Miss Grahame, who has switched affections under the circumstances.

DeMille has compounded the circus's own feat of piling too much too much. With plenty that's spectacular and exciting for anyone with any kind of affection at all for the Big Top, the train wreck sequence and the show that follows are excess baggage. Since the two hours and 31 minutes running time doesn't allow DeMille to exploit the wreck (wild animals are pushed meekly back into cages and no one but Heston seems really to have gotten hurt), the whole business could have been better forgotten.

Imaginative color camera work has derived real kicks out of the sight of the roustabouts pounding stakes into the ground with their rhythmic sledges and the canvas itself slowly and majestically going up the poles in the early dawn in preparation for another circus day. Long tour which DeMille made with the show last year has certainly paid off in all these aspects.

RB-B&B technical staff at Sarasota and on the road obviously made a mighty contribution, too. In addition to John and Henry Ringling, all seen in person in the film, they include general manager Arthur M. Concello and performance director Pat Valdo. John Murray Anderson has staged the circus numbers, just as he does for the show itself. Miles White, who regularly does the costumes, has contributed some special ones for the pic, although the parades and specs were shot on location and thus the original circus dress is seen.

Likewise, aside from some special, rousing and effective scoring by Victor Young and Ned Washington, ("The Greatest Show On Earth" and "Be a Jumping-Jack"), tunes are out of last season's circus. They include "Lovely Luawana Lady," by John Ringling North and E. Ray Goetz, and "Popcorn and Lemonade," "A Picnic In the Park" and "Sing a Happy Song," by Henry Sullivan and John Murray Anderson.

Among the entertaining gimmicks inserted by DeMille are the frequent closeups of the circus audience, among them the celebs of the Paramount lot. There's a sock laugh when two intent, peanut-eating bleacherites prove to be Bing Crosby and Bob Hope.

Gaumont release of Gaumont-Equipe Technique production. Features Francoise Arnoul, Nadine Alari, Maria Riquelme, Jacqueline Gautier, Paul Bernard. Directed and written by Christian Stengel. Screenplay, Rene Wheeler, Jean Ferry; camera, Rene Gaveau; editor, Charles Bretoniche. At Le Raimu, Paris. Running time, 102 MINS.

Francoise	Francoise Arnoul
Christiane	Maria Riquelme
Marie	Nadine Alari
Jacky	Jacqueline Gautier
Martino	Paul Bernard

This film is an attempted expose of the corruption and heartbreak behind trumped up beauty contests. Below par production, wooden thesping and a generally trite script make this only saleable on its exploitation pegs. Otherwise, it offers nothing for the sureseater or art houses.

Story collects a group of assorted lovelies who are chosen to participate in a hoked-up beauty contest. Though the situations are meaty, the film unfolds at a slow pace in a conventional, anticipated manner. The contest itself is overlong.

Lensing is murky and gives evidence of low budget. Editing is in need of drastic pruning to get some movement into the pic. Acting cannot overcome the obvious type casting but Jacqueline Gautier in the role of a disillusioned actress brings some poignance to her role. Francoise Arnoul, Maria Riquelme and Nadine Alari are properly decorative and the male roles are less than adequate.

Rasho-Mon

"Rasho-Mon," Japanese import which preemed at the Little Carnegie, N. Y., Wednesday (26), was reviewed by VARIETY at the Venice Film Festival in the issue of Sept. 19, 1951. Mosk stated "its brilliance of conception, technique, acting and its theme of passion make this a good art house bet in the U. S. Exploitation values are there and crix should go for it."

Grand prize winner of the Festival, "Rasho-Mon" is set in the 12th century Japan and relates a story of a killing told through the eyes of three protagonists.

RKO is distributing the Daiei Production in the U. S.

The White Hell of Pitz-Palu
(GERMAN)

Poor German remake of silent pic. Dubbed-in English dialog distracting.

Lux Film release of H. R. Sokal and F. A. Mainz production. Stars Hans Albers, Liselotte Pulver, Antje Weisgerber; features Ellen Widman, Heinrich Grettler. Directed by Rolf Hansen. Screenplay, Erna Fentsch; based on story by Dr. A. Fanck; camera, Richard Angst; editor, Anna Hollering; musical score, Mark Lothar. Reviewed in N. Y. Dec. 12, '51. Running time, 98 MINS.

Dr. John Jensen	Hans Albers
Marie	Liselotte Pulver
Peter	Antje Weisgarber
Mary Jensen	Ellen Widmann
Glooker	Heinrich Grettler

B. O. possibilities appear slim for this mountain-climbing saga, which never even ascends to the plateau level. Lux import is a modern version of the 1929 film made in the Swiss Alps by G. W. Pabst and Dr. Arnold Fauck.

Current version was filmed in German in Switzerland. Three leading characters—a middle-aged doctor and a recently betrothed couple—are pictured as Americans, who each, for his own reason, has an overwhelming desire to scale the hazardous Pitz-Palu mountain. English dialog has been dubbed in for the American parts while English titles are used for the supporting cast, made up mostly of inhabitants of the village at the base of the peak. Dubbing, done in Europe, is obvious and distracting, and the dialog appears to be a European's false idea of how Americans speak.

Scenarist Erna Fentsch and producers H. R. Sokal and F. A. Mainz evidently attempted to depict the almost unendurable hardship and danger encountered in climbing the frozen heights, but the feeling completely fails to get across. The doctor, it's noted, attempts the feat as an annual pilgrimage, since 20 years before his young bride had been killed during a climbing trek, for which he holds himself responsible. The motives of the young couple are vague unless it can be attributed to the impetuosity of youth.

It's not fair to judge the principals—Hans Albers, Liselotte Pulver and Antje Weisgerber—on the basis of this effort since the voices are not theirs. Voices employed are stilted, which is apparently due to the hokey dialog. Only natural-appearing parts are those spoken by the villagers in German.

Lone redeeming feature is the lensing by Richard Angst. Shots of mountain-climbing, rescue job of villagers and mountain scenery are excellent.

Dente Per Dente
(Measure for Measure) (ITALIAN-MADE)

Hoffberg release of Braglia production. Stars Alfredo Varelli, Aldo Silvani, Caterina Boratto; features Nelly Corradi, Carlo Tamberlani. Directed by Marco Elter. Screenplay and dialog, Guglielmo Usellini and Enrico Ribulsi, based on play by William Shakespeare; camera, P. Filippone and G. Borzone. At Cinema Verdi, N. Y., Dec. 7, '51. Running time, 88 MINS.

Marianne	Nelly Corradi
Isabella	Caterina Boratto
Claudio	Carlo Tamberlani
Duke of Vienna	Alfredo Varelli
Angelo	Aldo Silvani

This is one of the more spectacular films to come out of postwar Italy, with lavish sets, lush costumes and hundreds of extras expended in a somewhat faithful translation to the screen of William Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure." Unfortunately, however, the result is a static effort, which may get by in the Italian-language art houses but will have trouble in other U. S. sureseaters.

Basic trouble with the film lies in both the adaptation and direction. Scripters took little advantage of the widened scope of the screen to dress up the Shakespearean original. Exteriors were shot on the exact locations described by the Bard in his play, but there are too few of them. And director Marco Elter, working with a competent cast, several of whom are familiar to Italian-lingo pix fans, apparently was so intent on sticking closely to the letter of the play that both the dialog and action seem stilted.

Story, which is hardly ever produced on the American stage, is about the 15th century Viennese nobleman who is appointed by the emperor as ruler of his duchy, although he would rather study the classics. Unsure of himself, he announces that he is taking a journey and appoints his aristocratic and power-hungry cousin to rule in his stead. Latter immediately sets up a police state, invoking ancient laws to consolidate his power. When a young nobleman abducts a girl whose parents have promised her to someone else, the new ruler sentences the abductor to death but makes a deal to rescind the sentence if the boy's beauteous sister will become his mistress. The true ruler, who has been watching from behind the scenes in the disguise of a monk, arrives in the nick to save the young nobleman's life and himself marry the sister.

While the film is notable for its richness, it suffers from poor lighting in some spots and from a poorly-recorded soundtrack. English titles (for which no scripting credit is given) are inadequate. If the producers had spent some of the coin they obviously lavished on sets and costumes on better writing, the effort could have paid off much more.

Paris.

Discina production and release. Stars Pierre Fresnay. Directed by Yves Ciampi. Screenplay, Pierre Very, Ciampi, Very; camera, Marcel Grignon; editor, Roger Dwyre. At Helder and Balzac, Paris. Running time, 95 MINS.

Delage	Pierre Fresnay
Florence	Renee Devillers
Jacques	Roland Alexandre
Catherine	Claire Duhamel
Tonan	Marcel Andre

This is a talky, slow-moving story of a famous surgeon and how he lives and works. Labored in exposition and obvious in unfoldment, film does not hold much for the American market.

Pierre Fresnay shapes outstanding as the doctor who subordinates everything to his work. His fine acting makes the obvious characters around him seem shallow and unreal. Complications in his personal life are old hat. There's his wife who never had a real honeymoon, his disciple who can't stand blood, and a stray waif who is finally adopted by the childless couple. Film unfolds at a dull pace and dialog is flat. Direction is slow while lensing and editing is ordinary.

Fresnay is handicapped by the script drawbacks but manages to get a lifesize portrait of a doctor in love with his work. Renee Devillers has nothing to do but smile and bear up as the neglected wife. Roland Alexandre as the squeamish medical student has a tendency to overplay his role.

A students' medical party has some bare breasts as the boys strip the girls, but even this section is stilted and poorly executed. Pic will do well here on the Fresnay boxoffice pull, but does not have much to offer for the U. S.

Gaumont release of S. N. E. G.-Paul Wagner production. Stars Michel Simon. Written and directed by Sacha Guitry. Camera, Jean Bachelet; music, Louigny. At Colisee-Gaumont Palace and Le Berlitz Theatres, Paris, Nov. 30, '51. Running time, 85 MINS.

Amelie	Luce Fabiole
Mr. Brun	Jacques de Feraudy
Ernestine	Yvonne Hebert
Gandin	Mercier
Blandine	Germaine Reuver
Julie	Marthe Sarbel
Paul	Michel Simon

Neither the buffoonery of Michel Simon nor the obvious intentions of Sacha Guitry to do an iconoclastic film in the witty French manner can hide the artificiality and dullness of this effort. At best, it may get by in U. S. arty houses on the Simon draw.

Using as his essential gambit the sentiment "who among you has not wished that his wife were dead," Guitry runs through his paces of having the hero commit a perfect murder, having him confess the deed frankly and then having his man acquitted in court.

The film never rises above the macabre mood, and its direction is spotty. The domestic squalls are unimpressive and fail to advance the essential idea.

Simon, who exploits the grossness of his appearance, is prone to mugg too much while Pauline Carton's portrayal seems an assembly-line job. The introductory business of Guitry personally saluting the merits of each member of the cast is no help.

Marceau release and production. Stars Bernard Blier, Danielle Darrieux. Directed and written by Carlo Rim. Camera, Nicolas Hayer; editor, H. Taverna; music, Georges Van Parys. At Marignan and Marivaux, Paris. Running time, 100 MINS.

Felix	Bernard Blier
Gabrielle	Danielle Darrieux
Louisette	Francoise Arnoul
Pascal	Michel Francois
Moufe	Yves Deniaud
Grandma	Berthe Bovy

Film possesses the insouciance, charm, wit and tongue-in-cheek look at human foibles that most French pix have lacked of late. This treats the eternal problem of cuckoldry, being done with adroitness and taste. Though slow in spots, the characterization and interest hold up. Word-of-mouth and good placing in sure-seaters and special situations should make this palatable in the U. S. Danielle Darrieux name is the b.o. lure.

Film is a comedy-drama about a man's battle to keep a hold on his wife after he finds she has been carrying on with a young boy. Set in the 1900's picture has period costumes and customs. Dialog is witty and double entendre situations are well handled.

Bernard Blier as the adoring, gentle spouse seems destined to fill the shoes of the late Raimu as the eternal cuckold. He gives a depth and feeling to the role that makes him human rather than pathetic. Miss Darrieux as the graceful, flighty wife is delightful. The lesser roles are all well-rounded bits. Yves Deniaud is excellent as the wry, understanding friend. Berthe Bovy as the wily grandmother is fine. The youthful contingent is very capably filled by Francoise Arnoul and Michel Francois. Lensing is fine asset.

This turn of the century farce does not have the pace and sauciness needed to make it amusing. Pic maintains its staginess throughout and all the comedy and nuance is in its verbiage. Too slow for U. S. showing in all except possibly a few lesser spots.

The bedroom is the setting in this study of cuckoldry, with situation gags brought about by the sexy machinations of a group of cardboard, farcial characters. On tap is the skirt-chasing dandy, the amorous playboy, the trusting husband, the flighty wife and an assorted group of comic characters from a burlesque cavalry major and his deaf wife to a bellhop suffering from his first attack of sex. There are a few good moments but on the whole the pic lacks much.

Jacques Charon looms as standout for this type of farce. Most of the others are offkey in their playing. Direction by Claude Barma is static and does not take advantage of the many chances for some fast paced action. The turkey refers to the types who go about trying to seduce other people's wives.

Myriam	Edwige Feuillere
Bob	Frank Villard
Juliette	Cosetta Greco
Simon	Paola Stoppa
Pierre	Bernard Lajarrige
Captain	William C. Tubbs

This downbeat story of love i the criminal half world and its pitiful consequences has neither the depth or the profundity of character observation to make this suitable for art houses in U. S.

Plot becomes almost a parody on the prewar studies of despair and decadence in its story of a group of soiled characters. An aging beauty runs a bar in a port town and keeps a young gigolo. He in turn is planning a big gold robbery, and is carrying on with the daughter of the head safecracker. The robbery is successful, but one man is lost. Film concerns itself with the eventual death and capture of the others.

Edwige Feuillere gives nuance and poignance to the role of the aging saloon keeper. Frank Villard is properly despicable as the crooked lawyer. William C. Tubbs stands out in a comedy relief role of a rum-soaked American millionaire.

position was Henry Koster, whose three pix for 20th, plus "Harvey" for Universal, tallied to $7,500,000 in earnings.

Among the screenplay writers, it was "D&B" again that was decisive. Philip Dunne took top award for "Bathsheba" plus "Anne of the Indies," to give him a total of $8,550,000 earned in film rental. Running third was Alan Jay Lerner, who did "American in Paris" and "Royal Wedding" for Metro to the tune of $7,100,000.

Soaring—and admittedly somewhat surprising—success of "David and Bathsheba" means that for the second year in a row a Biblical picture has walked off with top hon- Last year's winner was "Sam- and Delilah" which, with money still coming in, will do close to $9,000,000.

For the first time in many years, Metro was shouldered out of first place as the company with most pix on the "Top Grossers" list and the company that got most money from them. 20th-Fox pushed M-G down a peg, partially through the success of "D&B" and partly because it released more films.

List includes all pix that do more than $1,000,000 in film rentals received by distributors from U. S. and Canada playoffs. In trade parlance that is "domestic gross." Figures are expert projections of the final tally, based on engagements played by the films to the end of the year.

20th-Fox landed 29 pix on the list for a total gross of $55,500,000. Metro was second with 21 films at $47,450,000. Warner Bros. was in show position, followed by Paramount, Universal, RKO, Columbia and United Artists in that order. Republic, which scored with "Iwo Jima" and "Rio Grande" last year, didn't make it this time.

Metro, in taking last year's sweepstakes, got 24 pix on the list for a total of $56,290,000. 20th was second with 19 at $42,950,000.

Floor on the list has been dropped to $1,000,000 this year from the $1,250,000 that was used as the 1950 base and the $1,500,000 the year before. The minimum figure is considered the point at which a film begins to make a substantial impact on theatre boxoffices, although not necessarily successful financially for the producer from the standpoint of cost vs. income.

There is a total of 131 pix on this year's tally. They'll bring in an aggregate of $247,900,000. For comparison with last year, there are 107 pix which will do $1,250,000 or over. Only 95 pix did $1,250,000 or more in 1950. This year's $1,250,000 and over pix will ring up $221,175,000 as against last season's $210,565,000.

That would indicate, however, that average income per film was higher last year—$2,210,000 in comparison with this year's 52,065,000. In other words, with the declining boxoffice, it takes more pix to get the same amount of money. However, the base of theatre-going appears to have widened somewhat during 1951 by the fact that more films garnered $1,250,000 or better. $1,500,000 or better, compared with 77 the previous year, 92 in 1949 and 93 in 1948. It is the first year there has been any such reversal since the big b.o. slide started after the war.

Six in 'Golden Circle'

There are six pix on the current list that enter the "Golden Circle"—those that do $4,000,000 or better. They bring the industry's alltime total in that rarified atmosphere to 87 films. Change in times, despite the difficult period the industry has gone through since the war, is best indicated by the fact that up to 1946 only 25 films in all had ever achieved the whopping $4,000,000 or better gross figure.

Eight pix made the "Golden Circle" in 1950 with a total take of $40,025,000 as compared with the current list's six at $29,600,000. However, 1950 had only one pic over $5,000,000 ("S&D"), in contrast to 1951's two—"D&B" and "Showboat."

Indicative of the trend of grosses in the past five years is a comparison of the number of pix in various

Using still another yardstick, there were 81 pix this year that did fiscal categories. Here's the lineup:

Over	1951	1950	1949	1948	1947
$5,000,000..	2	1	1	0	11
$4,000,000..	6	8	5	7	15
$3,000,000..	10	12	19	22	35
$2,000,000..	45	43	50	65	75

Figures VARIETY'S annual year-end tabulation are U. S. and Canadian only, since no reliable estimate can be made on foreign earnings of specific pix. Overseas income is generally running 40% or better of each distrib's total gross, but it varies tremendously from film to film and is next to impossible to compute in advance because of freezes, changes in currency rates and other problems of turning a peso, a franc or a pound earned abroad into a usable dollar in the U. S.

20th's Alltime Topper

"David and Bathsheba," which it is estimated will bring 20th-Fox $7,000,000 in U.S. and Canadian film rentals, is the company's alltime top-grosser. Previous record-holder was "Leave Her to Heaven," which garnered $5,550,000 when 20th released it in 1945.

"D&B" will take eighth position on VARIETY'S alltime industry gross list, between "Jolson Story" (Col), which got $8,000,000 in 1947, and "Going My Way" (Par), $6,500,000 in 1944.

Top-Grossers by Companies

Following are the number of films each company released during the calendar year 1951 that promise to gross $1,000,000 or more in U. S. and Canadian rentals. Also included is the total amount of coin each company will receive from the pix.

		No. of Pix Over $1,000,000	Total Rentals

Top Grossers of 1951

Following are the films sent into release during calendar 1951 that promise to gross $1,000,000 or more in domestic (U.S. and Canadian) film rentals. Any film not included, it can thus be assumed, will not earn $1,000,000. Pictures with too few dates at the year's end for estimating total returns include Metro's "Quo Vadis," "Westward the Women" and "Pandora"; Paramount's "My Favorite Spy" and "Submarine Command"; Universal's "Flame of Araby"; RKO's "I Want You" and "Double Dynamite"; Columbia's "Man In the Saddle," and 20th-Fox's "Model and the Marriage Broker."

'Streetcar' Wins N.Y Crix Award As Best in 1951

"A Streetcar Named Desire," Warner Bros.' film version of the Tennessee Williams Pulitzer Prize-winning play, was named last week by the New York Film critics as the best American motion picture of the year. "Miracle in Milan," Joseph Burstyn importation from Italy of Vittorio De Sica's fantasy, received the critics' accolade as the outstanding foreign film.

Vivien Leigh, currently appearing on Broadway in Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra" and Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," was named the year's best actress for her performance in "Streetcar." Best actor honor went to Arthur Kennedy for his work in Universal's "Bright Victory." Crix choice as best director went to Eli Kazan for guiding "Streetcar."

"Streetcar" nosed out the "The River," Ken McEldowney-Jean Renoir production being released by United Artists, on the sixth ballot. Count was 8 to 7. According to the rules of procedure, the sixth ballot is the final one if a two-thirds majority cannot be obtained up to that point. "Miracle in Milan" won on the fourth ballot with 10 votes as against five for "Roshomon," Japanese importation being released by RKO.

Miss Leigh took top honors on the fifth ballot, beating Shelley Winters, 10-5. Miss Winters received the votes on the basis of her performance in "Place in the Sun," Paramount's film adaptation of Theodore Dreiser's "An American Tragedy." Kennedy defeated Marlon Brando ("Streetcar") by 10-5 on the third ballot. Vote for best director went to final and sixth ballot with Kazan finally winning out over George Stevens, who directed "Place."

Selection of "Miracle" marked the fifth time that a Burstyn import has won the Critics' award. His previous winners were "Open City" (1946), "Paisan" (1948), "The Bicycle Thief" (1949) and "Ways of Love" (1950). "Miracle" also marks sixth time that the prize-winning foreign film was playing the World Theatre, N. Y.

DE ROCHEMONT SETS 4 FILMS ON BURMA

Four films depicting problems of real life in Burma have been screenplayed by the Louis de Rochemont organization and will be filmed in Burma as part of an effort to develop a film industry there.

Deal with de Rochemont was set by the Economic Cooperation Administration and the Burmese government. Pact reportedly calls for de Rochemont to receive a guarantee of between $200,000 and $250,000 convertible into dollars.

Project is viewed as part of the U. S. program to render technical assistance to undeveloped countries.

WB's Coast Meet

Meeting of Warner Bros. West Coast district and branch managers will be held in San Francisco Jan. 14 with Roy Haines, western division sales manager, presiding.

Haines held a two-day confab with midwest and prairie state district and branch managers in Chicago Friday (28) and Saturday (29).

Quota of 'New Faces'

Mayo, Doris Day, Shelley Winters and Elizabeth Taylor.

Kind of sandwiching that contingent are the new, unestablished (or only semi-established) faces and the oldtimers (more or less) who still count. Among the latter list Clark Gable, Bob Hope, Bing Crosby, Spencer Tracy, Errol Flynn, Abbott & Costello, Betty Grable, and Betty Hutton. The gals have faded faster than the males.

On the other side of the sandwich are the relative newcomers who've had star billing during the past year. Topping them was undoubtedly Judy Holliday, who secured a place for herself with the success of "Born Yesterday." Others include Steve Cochran, Howard Keel, Gene Nelson, Gary Merrill, Jose Ferrer, Dale Robertson, Jeff Chandler, Louis Jourdan, Tony Curtis, Debra Paget, Phyllis Thaxter, Jean Peters, Sally Forrest, Nancy Olsen and Leslie Caron. (For further sidelights on "new faces" see Whitney Williams' report from Hollywood this issue.)

A flock of other players fit in indefinite categories somewhere between those listed above. Same situation as with actors appears among directors and screenwriters. There are plenty of new ones getting a chance and lots of the older ones disappearing. Situation among producers shows less willingness to experiment, many vets still hanging on to the reins.

Players

Topping the list of male money stars is Peck, who was in "David & Bathsheba," "Capt. Horatio Hornblower" and "Only the Valiant," which racked up a total of $11,750,000. Femme list is headed by Miss Hayward, who was seen in "Bathsheba," "I'd Climb the Highest Mountai " "Rawhide" and "I Can Get It for You Wholesale." Together they grossed $12,525,000.

Among other players who were in more than one pic on the list are those below. Shown are how many pix they were in and how much those pix earned. That's not an indication, necessarily, of the player's drawing power, but of how many theatregoers he or she was exposed to during the year. That could have a strong effect on a player's future, of course. Here are the figures:

ACTORS

	No. of Pix	Total Gross
1. Gregory Peck......	3	$11,750,000
2. Steve Cochran.....	5	7,600,000
3. Howard Keel.......	2	7,450,000
4. Martin & Lewis...	2	7,150,000
5. Van Johnson.......	4	7,050,000
6. Gene Nelson.......	3	5,925,000
7. Kirk Douglas......	3	5,500,000
8. Clifton Webb......	3	5,450,000
9. William Holden....	2	5,350,000
10. Red Skelton.......	3	5,250,000
11. Brod Crawford.....	2	5,200,000
12 Burt Lancaster.....	3	5,150,000

15. Ronald Reagan...	4	4,925,000
16. Robert Mitchum.	3	4,900,000
17. Bing Crosby.......	2	4,850,000
18. Richard Widmark..	2	4,750,000
19. Spencer Tracy...	2	4,700,000
20. Gordon MacRae....	2	4,400,000

ACTRESSES

1. Susan Hayward....	4	12,525,000
2. Virginia Mayo.....	5	9,650,000
3. Doris Day.........	4	7,875,000
4. Ann Blyth.........	3	7,750,000
5. Shelley Winters....	4	6,950,000
6. Elizabeth Taylor...	2	6,600,000
7. Jane Wyman.......	3	6,450,000
8. Ava Gardner......	2	6,350,000
9. Kathryn Grayson..	2	6,300,000
10. Ruth Hussey..	2	6,100,000
11. Rhonda Flemi ...	5	6,075,000
12. Ruth Roman.......	3	5,900,000
13. Pat Neal.........	3	5,600,000
14. Gene Tierney......	3	5,475,000
15. Eleanor Parker....	3	5,350,000
16. Jane Powell.......	2	4,350,000
17. Betty Grable.......	2	4,175,000

That there are many elements beyond a star's draw that account for his or her success is seen by the fact that James Stewart topped last year's list with four pix that grabbed a total of $9,225,000. He appeared in only one minor entry released in 1951. That was 20th's "No Highway," which did a meagre $1,150,000.

Producers

Producer list, which was led last year by Jerry Wald (15th this year), Joseph Pasternak, William Jacobs and Darryl Zanuck, line up this way for 1951:

1. Arthur Freed......	3	$12,300,000
2. Leonard Goldstein.	5	10,075,000
3. Darryl F. Zanuck..	2	9,100,000
4. William Jacobs....	3	6,525,000
5. Hal Wallis.........	3	6,325,000
6. Joseph Pasternak..	2	6,250,000
7. Anthony Veiller...	4	6,250,000

Directors

Among the directors, Henry King (mainly thanks to "D&B") repeated last year's win. Henry Koster, who was second in 1950, gave way one place to Vincent Minelli, who was responsible for "American in Paris" and "Father's Little Dividend." Here's how the leaders line up:

1. Henry King.......	$9,150,000
2. Vincent Minelli....	7,600,000
3. Henry Koster......	7,500,000
4. Hal Walker........	7,150,000
5. Richard Thorpe....	6,300,000
6. Roy Del Ruth......	6,200,000
7. Henry Hathaway..	5,950,000

Screenwriters' competition is headed by an old Hollywood hand, Philip Dunne ("How Green Was My Valley), who scripted "D&B" and collabbed on "Anne of the Indies." Runner-up is Oscar Brodney, who's been writing on the Coast for some 10 years, but got his first big break doing "Harvey." In the trey spot with a profitable twosome ("American in Paris" and "Royal Wedding") is a fresh face, Alan Jay Lerner. He's from Broadway.

Here's how the screenwriters shape up, allowing them full credit for films on which they were only collaborators, as well as the pix on which they worked solo:

Writers

1. Philip Dunne...	2	$8,550,000
2. Oscar Brodney....	4	7,450,000
3. Alan Jay Lerner...	2	7,100,000
4. Ivan Goff & Ben Roberts		5,950,000
5. Harry Joe Brown..		5,500,000
6. Albert Hackett & Frances Goodrich	2	4,850,000
7. Liam O'Brien......		3,800,000

French Assembly Probes Film Biz

Paris.

A special subcommittee of the French National Assembly has been given powers to look into the film industry crisis. It started out by checking the books of the Centre National du Cinema, the government body which sets French production policy and handles various pix biz subsidies.

The group is reported interested in why only the picture companies alone, of all popular show biz branches, had failed to show any increase in attendance since 1938. Figures were given out showing that attendance at theatres and concerts had gone up 51,000,000 in that period and that variety show audiences had increased 29,000,000. Film theatre attendance in the same period declined 38,000,000.

Minister of Production Louvel did not reveal his plans for helping the pic business. However, one plan reported to be under consideration is a cash award for quality films to be paid from funds of the Centre National du Cinema.

The industry's public relations hit a new low when the Louis-Delluc cinema prize jury voted not to make any 1951 awards, deciding for the first time in 14 years to withhold this prestige award until the quality of French films improves.

Rogers Biog, 'Charley' In Aug. WB Release

Two of Warner Bros.' top pictures of the year are slated for release during August. They are "The Story of Will Rogers," starring Will Rogers, Jr. and Jane Wyman, and "Where's Charley?," with Ray Bolger and Allyn McLerie recreating their original stage roles.

Latter was filmed i England, enabling Warners to use frozen coin. Will Rogers yarn had been a Warner story property for a long time. Both films are in Technicolor.

Exhibs in 68 Cities Urged to Aid CD

Exhibs in 68 cities have been urged by the Council of Motion Picture Organizations to cooperate with the Civil Defense Administration in staging and promotion of civil defense exhibits in their communities.

Three motorized CD convoys will tour the country beginning in February.

MUNICH STUDIO BUYS U.S. SCRIBE'S NOVEL

Berlin.

German language film rights to "The Big Rape," a historical novel about the fall of Berlin to the Red Army by James Wakefield Burke, foreign correspondent for the Indianapolis News, has been purchased by producer Helmut Weiss of Orlando Film, Munich.

Weiss is reported to have paid $10,000 for the rights and intends to spend about $300,000 for the production. The City of Berlin and the Bonn Government are said to be financing over 80% of the film.

Battle of The Biblical Specs

Often, over past years, rivalry to ring up the biggest score has become heated between two companies with top-grossing pix. Prime instance was the competition in 1947 between Samuel Goldwyn with his "Best Years of Our Lives" and David O. Selznick with "Duel In the Sun." Currently, 20th-Fox is scratching to overtake the lead Paramount's "Samson and Delilah" holds over Darryl F. Zanuck's "David and Bathsheba."

"S&D," which went out in 1950, when business was a little better is expected to gross in U.S. and Canada between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000, nearer the latter. That's a lot different from the $11,000,000 Par was counting on at the end of 1950. 20th is figuring on $7,000,000—although the Par crew, with experience behind it, claims the figure is nigh impossible to achieve. 20th is citing lots of facts and figures to prove it should be easy.

"S&D" in its pre-release, upped-price engagements, garnered slightly over $5,400,000 in 2,100 dates. "D&B," which wound up its pre-release at the year's end, got just over $4,000,000 in 3,300 playoffs. Par expected $5,500,000 the first time around at regular prices, and will wind up with $3,500,000 or slightly less. "D&B," which goes into regular release next month, will have to get $3,000,000 out of that cycle to justify its estimate.

Upped Rentals

Year, incidentally, saw an exceptionally large flock of pix on which upped terms were sought. They included, aside from "D&B," Metro's "American In Paris," Warner Bros.' "Streetcar Named Desire," Columbia's "Born Yesterday" and Paramount's "Place In the Sun." That makes the standing of "Show Boat" as second in VARIETY's current list of 1951 top-grossers even more spectacular. It got $5,200,000—the largest sum ever rung up by Metro in selling a film at regular scale terms.

Incidentally, in the battle between Goldwyn and Selznick for top honors, "BYOL" edged "Duel" out by small amount. "Best Years" scored $10,400,000 against "Duel's" $10,000,000. Both pix were sold on a roadshow basis, however, making comparisons between them — and between them and other pix—very difficult. Much depends on individual bookkeeping on roadshow dates as to what is charged off in the way of advertising, house staffs, etc., against recorded rentals.

For the same reason, the gross of "Cyrano" (Kramer-UA) is difficult to figure. The $1,900,000 credited to it in the current tabulation is admittedly a compromise. It got about $600,000 via roadshowing, but expenses were extremely high, so it would be unfair to add that entire figure to expected gross from first regular release.

Other roadshow pix that went out during 1951 were "The River" (McEldowney-UA) and "Tales of Hoffmann' (Korda-Lopert). Some possibility is seen of "Hoffmann" hitting the $1,000,000 mark needed to get it on the VARIETY list, but experts hold out little hope of "The River" reaching that figure.

Blumberg, Bergman Out of the Hospital

Nate Blumberg, Universal prexy, and his aide, Maurice Bergman, were discharged from different N. Y. hospitals last week.

Blumberg was at Doctors Hospital for about a month on a "routine checkup" and Bergman at New York Hospital for two weeks with a virus.

1951 Did Well Springing New Faces on the Public

By WHITNEY WILLIAMS

Hollywood.

With fresh faces and new stars constituting motion pictures' hope for the future, the year 1951 did right well in springing enough upcoming talent to give 1952 a rosy hue.

The point of new-face development was strongly brought out during UI's December sales sessions in Hollywood, when division and district managers generally emphasized the value to the company of the studio having developed during past year a good half dozen new players.

Sales delegates stated that these had been accorded "terrific acceptance all over the country," and agitated for the studio to continue this type of activity. Concensus was that this is a "surefire method of helping business."

Other studios have likewise been aware of the value of new faces, for there has been a great display during the year past of unknowns and comparative unknowns drawing top spots in films.

Joining UI in such practice, Metro was a particular adherent to the theory, as well as giving other new talent an opportunity in smaller roles. Leslie Caron was brought from Paris to costar with Gene Kelly in "An American in Paris," and instantly registered. She followed this with costar roles in "The Man With a Cloak" and "Glory Alley." Pier Angeli is another import, from Italy, and after bowing in "Teresa," next teamed with Stewart Granger in "The Light Touch." Ralph Meeker, costar with Miss Angeli in "Teresa," followed this with a top spot in "Shadow in the Sky."

Vic Damone's 1st

Vic Damone, although a name in the singing world, screen-debuted as a costar in "Rich, Young and Pretty," and Fernando Lamas, after a top part in "The Law and the Lady," quickly was costarred in "Rich," following this opposite Lana Turner in "The Merry Widow." Dawn Addams, English actress, after appearing prominently in "Night Into Morning" and "Singi ' in the Rain," was teamed with Peter Lawford in "The Hour of 13." Doretta Morrow was rushed from the N. Y. stage to costar with Mario Lanza in "Because You're Mine," for her bow.

The names to which UI sales chiefs referred included Piper Laurie, Tony Curtis, Rock Hudson, Julia Adams, Joyce Holden, Peggy Dow. Miss Laurie and Curtis are becoming established both individually and as a team, in the latter category attracting particularly in their first, "The Prince Who Was a Thief," then in "Son of Ali Baba."

Hudson did yeoman service in "The Iron Man," following this as star in both "Bend of the River" and "Has Anybody Seen My Gal?' Miss Adams bowed as second femme lead in "Bright Victory," following this as costar in "Hollywood Story," "Finders Keepers," "Treasure of the Canyon," latter with William Powell, and "Bend of the River."

Miss Holden drew femme lead and registered solidly as a comedienne i "You Never Can Tell," after several smaller roles. Miss Dow, following a number of appearances on her own lot, was loaned to Samuel Goldwyn for a star role in "I Want You." Yvette Dugay another potential stellarite, having costarred in "The Cimarron Kid."

Paramount's Efforts

Paramount, in an earnest effort to develop fresh talent, has set up a pool of promising newcomers dubbed The Golden Circle. Additionally, studio set opera star Robert Merrill for one of the top spots in "Aaron Slick from Punkin Crick." After having made a brilliant impression in a brief singing sequence in "Here Comes the Groom," 15-year-old Anna Maria Alberghetti, from Italy, now is to star in "The Goddess."

Golden Circle personalities who already have started their upward trek include Barbara Rush, lead in "When Worlds Collide" and "Flaming Feather;" Michael Moore, costar in "Silver City," "Los Alamos;" Susan Morrow, "Warbonnet," "Giant Timber;" Joan Taylor, "Warbonnet."

Twentieth-Fox has fewer but none the less impressive new stars. Outstanding here are Mitzi Gaynor, Dale Robertson and Marilyn Monroe, with several others being accorded stellar opportunities.

Miss Gaynor, after a bright debut in "My Blue Heaven" and a followup in "Take Care of My Little Girl," won stardom in "Th Golden Girl" and "The I Don't Care Girl," biopix of Lotta Crabtree and Eva Tanguay, respectively. She also is one of the star names in "We're Not Married." Robertson, a Nat Holt discovery, was snapped up by 20th-Fox after a single appearance and immediately launched upon a series of top and star roles, including "Take Care," "Golden Girl," "Return of the Texan," "Lydia Bailey" and "Outcasts of Poker Flat."

Miss Monroe, a lush, sexy blonde who had done a number of pictures for both Columbia and 20th-Fox before her elevation to stardom, got her first taste of it on loanout to Wald-Krasna for "Clash by Night." Next came "Don't Bother to Knock," opposite Richard Widmark, and "We're Not Married."

Anne Francis caught studio attention in "So Good, So Bad" and "Whistle Stop at Eaton Falls," both produced in the east, was termpacted and immediately cast in top femme role with Clifton Webb in "Elopement." Jeffrey Hunter and Helene Stanley are being stargroomed, former having scored in "Take Care," latter in "Return of the Texan."

Columbia's Ray, Lawrance

Columbia is banking on a pair, Aldo Ray and Jody Lawrance, and Edward Small, who releases through Columbia, has Tony Dexter. Ray first attracted in "Saturday's Hero," following this with co-star role with Judy Holliday in "The Marrying Kind." Miss Lawrance, a Texas swimmer who was in Larry Crosby's "Aquacade," started out as a lead and appeared in five films before the first was released. These include "Mask of the Avenger," "The Family Secret," "Son of Dr. Jekyll," "10 Tall Men" and "The Brigand." Dexter, after bowing in "Valentino," seconded with "Brigand."

Warners crashed through with two who appear likely to develop into star names. Mari Aldon played opposite Gary Cooper in her first, in "Distant Drums." This film also offered Richard Webb, of much promise although not a Warner contractee. Miss Aldon followed with "The Tanks Are Coming," opposite Steve Cochran. Eve Miller appeared opposite Kirk Douglas in "The Big Trees" for her initial role.

RKO started off Elizabeth Threatt, a Gotham model, in costar role with Kirk Douglas in "The Big Sky," Howard Hawks production. Margaret Sheridan, also a model, likewise drew femme lead in another Hawks' production, "The Thing." Kenneth Tobey, following a few small parts, starred in thi film.

Muriel Lawrance, with grand opera experience, stars in Republic's "Bal Tabarin" for her first screen role. Beverly Michaels costarred with Hugo Haas for her screen launching, in "Pickup" and "The Girl on the Bridge."

PIX AID DEFENSE DEPT. IN FEMME RECRUITING

To boost enlistment of women in the armed forces, the film industry, in cooperation with the Department of Defense, is preparing a promotional campaign in which every branch of the industry will contribute. Exact nature of the promotional activities is expected to be set at a Washington luncheon in the Pentagon Jan. 18. Defense Secretary Robert A. Lovett will invite about 20 leaders of the pic industry to the luncheon confab.

Preliminary talks on films' part in the enlistment drive have been held for the last two weeks, with Arthur L. Mayer, exec v.p. of the Council of Motion Picture Organizations, conferring with Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, Assistant Defense Secretary, and other officers of the Defense Department.

LIKE BIRDS men must fly—soar higher ever higher—on the wings of their imaginations.

This of itself would be reason enough for motion pictures of increasing insight and originality But to the constant spur of men's imagination must be added the inspiration of new technics, new equipment and materials.

With this trend toward greater imagination in studio and laboratory has come greater opportunity for the manufacturer to cooperate. The Eastman Kodak Company for example, as a part of its service to the industry maintains the Eastman Technical Service for Motion Picture Film. Here, representatives aid the industry in the selection and exposure of film, black-and-white or color . . . help establish higher standards of quality and economy in processing work with exchanges and theatres, helping make sure that each foot of film gets best possible screening.

To maintain this service the Eastman Kodak Company has branches at strategic centers . . . invites inquiry on all phases of film use from all members of the industry Address:

Hollywood.

Let's see; there's Mother's Day, Father's Day, Most Valuable Player Award and the Academy Award. There's a day for everything including gorgonzola cheese and plastic mousetraps, and there's an award for anyone and everything that breathes in Hollywood, except, of course, the poor publicity purveyor's pilot.

Why not an award for this lost soul? We could call it The Most Courageous Man of the Year, or The Man With the Most Cuts, that is, after they remove the ulcers.

Spend a day with a studio publicity director and see for yourself. Come along for an ordinary day around the lot. You report at nine o'clock and rush to a meeting and while you are exchanging thoughts in the meeting room the phone back in the office is maki more noise than the proverbial tw skeletons playing canasta on a tin roof.

So you come back to your desk where the morning mail and th trade papers are waiting. Oops! Where did that son-of-a-misguided Moslem get that story? Pearl, get me that producer on the phone. I'll tell him off about calling the trades with that story. Listen, Mac. Don't be making announcements for us. Leave it to the publicity department. If you want to be a planter go buy yourself some seeds. Oh, you didn't know you weren't supposed to tell the press? Well, Mac, you know now.

So you hang up and get to the mail. What's that? Louella calling? Put her on, Pearl. No, darling, that is not so. I tell you she isn't. Definitely not. Absolutely. How can she be? She isn't even married.

Back to the mail. Who? Shelley Winters. Put her on, Pearl. Hiya, Shel. Now wait a minute, Shel, hold on, I didn't give that story to Hopper. I tell you I didn't. Don't call me that, Shel, I'm a respectable married man. All right, I'll find out. I'll ask her. Goodbye, Shel. Ouch! Pearl, make a note to put another piece of felt in this earpiece.

Get me Hopper. Hello, darling. Where did you get that item about Shelley and Vittorio Gassman? The one you headed "The Gassman Cometh." Oh, she did? That's all, sweetheart. Talk with you later.

Back to the mail. Next week there'll be two magazine editors out from the east. A guy from the New York office who probably wants my job. A guy from Washington who wants to tie up our players with deep freezers and mink coats. The movie critic of the Pratt Falls (Mo.) Bugle. And a couple of dozen assorted guys with introductions from people I'v never heard of. Pearl, get my calendar and tell my wife I won't be home for dinner next week. And you better order another bottle of bicarb.

More Ideas

Well, you've got a pretty good idea there, Joe, but I doubt if President Truman would really take the time to fly out here from Washington to accept the first bagel from Tony for National Bagel Week.

Sometimes I think you fellows are stressing too much sex in your ideas. What we need a good human interest angle that will really hit the wires. Now while you boys have been yakking for the past half hour it occurred to me that we might get the Midwestern Association of Tree Surgeons to name Tony the male movie star with the sexiest limbs of 1952. See what I mean, boys?

And while I've got you all together, boys, I might as well tell you that the little matter of expense accounts has come up again. The front office wants to know if the columnists out here are really worth their weight in gold as has been indicated by a few of the choicer bit of expense account prose during the past week. All I can say is that you planters had better begin reaping a little, too.

Okay, boys. What was it you wanted to see me about? Hey, Pearl, where did the gang go? Oh, it's six o'clock. Well, get the steam room, Pearl, and see if Frankie has the pressure up. Tell him I'm on my way!

Why No 'Oscars' For The Ballyhooists?

By TERRY TURNER

(RKO Exploitation Chief)

Every year I read about, or listen to, the interesting proceedings of the really great Academy of Motion Picture Arts Awards. This and that star gets an Oscar, and I even hear of some technical chap getting some kind of slap on the back for some benefit he has given to the industry. The quips are smart and splendid, the choked sobs and nervous laughter of the recipients of these awards are not to be sneezed at for their emotional content, but I am still waiting to hear or read about some odd form of Oscar or a tidbit of an award for a single, or even a collective, brainchild culled from the advertising, publicity or exploitation departments of the many companies turning out motion pictures. I have always thought that they may have had a lot to do with those Oscars and Awards so freely handed out to others.

Certainly we all know some "classics" that would have died aborning were it not for the advertising, publicity and exploitation that gave it life and wings to carry it to Oscarville and Awardland.

Let it not be said that there is no artistry in advertising, publicity and exploitation. True, it varies in its degrees and ofttimes outmatches and outsells the artistry found in story, talent, direction and production. I have known of more time, thought and energy being put into the advertising, publicity and exploitation of a motion picture than the production itself. That is particularly true when film folks start out to have pheasant production and wind up with turkey.

Let's get this straight, also, before someone gets the idea that this "jerk Turner" thinks he has been neglected in the matter of Oscars and Awards. I have never accomplished anything that I think deserves such encomium, so this article can have no personal application. Also, I know of no other single individual in advertising, publicity or exploitation, whom I could name offhand worthy of an Oscar or an Award. There might be, but I repeat, I don't know them.

But I do know of entire departments in advertising, publicity and exploitation who have in the past and will in the future earn recognition for their collective work in presenting a motion picture production to the public and I think it would be worthy and fitting of the great Academy to include that in their awards.

Never A Dull Moment

By TEET CARLE

Hollywood.

After 20 years as a Hollywood p.a., a guy ought to have plenty of highlights packed away in his memory bag. There is one drawback to reminiscing, however—you have to find time to relax and think of nothing else. Now if such a luxury were to come my way, I might remember a lot of things which I've experienced or seen happen to press agent friends during two decades. Like, for instance:

There was the producer who wanted an honorary college degree for making an epic. When the press department couldn't interest a big university, he said he'd settle for a degree each from two small colleges . . . The drama critic in Portland who gave a Paramount picture a bad review, then later ran in his column: "We're hereby getting back into the good graces of Paramount by printing the following recipe on how to cook carrots by Miss Betty Hutton of that studio." . . . And the press gathering to watch Dorothy Lamour give up her sarong forever by burning it. The cloth failed to burn, even when doused with gasoline. How'd the press agent know the wardrobe dept. had fireproofed it for safety? . . . The columnist who never would accept gossip handouts, saying she made up her own chatter so she could be sure it was exclusive . . . The time, too, when the gagster production man gave the unsophisticate p.a. from Harvard the story of having to make water wings for a herd of non-swimming cattle for a Hopalong Cassidy film—and the crazy item got printed!

Takes Yer Cherce

Oh yes, the astounding seriousness of the neophyte publicist who wrote three canned reviews for the press book—one a rave, one lukewarm and the other a vicious pan —and when told to quit kidding, replied, "Isn't this a service we give drama editors—what'll a person have to print if he doesn't like the picture?" . . . The day on "Boom Town" when we saw Gable step into bit player's punch and sustain the split lip that cost thousands in delay. Told it was our neck if anything got out on this, we rushed back to the office to find a newspaperman already on the 'phone asking for verification of the story. That was final proof how full of news-tippers Hollywood is . . . The hippo, imported for a jungle scene, which, the instant he was put into an ocean bay, sank and never came up. No one had told the moviemakers hippos can't live in salt water . . . The press agent who conceived the idea of combining features of 10 top he-men actors to make up Peggy Hopkins Joyce's ideal man. The result looked like a pansy but the composite job cost $50, and he had to get it printed, so sold his soul for its play in one edition . . . The femme star who telephoned the flack to come right out to the set. Girding himself for a beef, he listened in amazement as she said, "The lead in this pencil is too hard for keeping our gin rummy score; may I trade it to you for of those soft-lead ones?"

Among other events: our "last laugh" at the guy who used to kill all our cheesecake photos at the censor's office and who, after losing that job, went to work on a paper and telephoned to plead for art sexy enough to please his boss . . . The "drama editor" on a small southern paper who wrote frequently for personally autographed photos and who, when finally checked on by a field man, proved to be the office boy who, by that time, had the finest collection of inscribed photos in the country . . . The famous femme mind-reader, the chief peg for a campaign, who astounded the press by her "second sight" and then cooked everything nicely, when she lost some jewelry, by asking the cops to locate it for her . . . The gag expense account of $1,200 that a press agent turned in for courting the magazine editor he'd just married.

And how can we forget the little Swedish girl who was brought by stillmen to pose in shorts with the U. S. C. college track stars running and jumping and whom we, still a college senior, were told, "is some new actress named Greta Garbo" . . The wonderful line in a movie review: "The story's nothing much—just something O. Henry might have written" . . . The time our traveling pal, Rufus Blair, couldn't find a room in Cincinnati and booked himself into a hospital as a patient who recovered miraculously after a night's sleep . . . The life-size lobby cutout of Mae West with flaps patrons could lift to see what was worn below—which got killed, but fast.

SOUP TO NUTS!

(A Memory of Radio)

By JEROME LAWRENCE & ROBERT E. LEE

Hollywood.

Remember radio? That grand old cabinet that used to sit in your living room, and pour forth sounds of melody and laughter? It wasn't a demanding old friend. It didn't throttle conversation, tether your children, or hypnotize your household with eye-aching little blue lines. Radio would even let you read a newspaper once in a while. It encouraged you to close your eyes and imagine things. It declined to hog your attention, like a bratty child. And it almost never brought you Milton Berle.

Gone, gone are those dear old days! Gone the way of the hobble-skirt, the high-wheeled bicycle and the horse-drawn fire engine. So perhaps the hour has come for those of us who love the past to savour the sweetness of those televisionless times.

But it wasn't all sweetness, to be sure. There was a pitfall in the very simplicity of radio. A man stood in front of microphone and talked or played the flute, and people all over the country heard him. That was all there was to it. It was so elementary that almost everybody thought they knew how it should be done. Even sponsors. Today, of course, everything is different. In television, the mere mention of words such as "sync impulse," "spurious image" or "Put another silk on the key-light, Harry!" is enough to send even the most courageous sponsors scurrying back to their assembly-lines. And if the "expert" is wearing an exposure-meter on a string around his neck, he is well-night unassailable.

In the ancient days of radio, however, the so-called "creative people" never enjoyed this immunity. When a sponsor came on safari to Hollywood, anybody in the studio or control-room was fair game. Even from the remoteness of the eastern seaboard, a practiced sponsor could take pot-shots at his Hollywood drudges with a long-distance weapon called the "teletype." Woe unto the writer, producer or account executive who erred before the baleful eye of the man who paid the bills! One withering blast from the teletype—and he was doomed as surely as a limping pachyderm in the sights of Frank Buck's elephant gun.

It is with a sense of historical importance, therefore, that we bring to light this series of hitherto unpublished documents of the by-gone "Age of Radio." Believing that men are best understood from the letters they write, we offer the ensuing correspondence without footnotes or commentary. As memorabilia of a literary form now forever lost to us, this correspondence may well achieve a stature comparable to the letters of Samuel Johnson, or the Longfellow-Thackeray Correspondence. Only the judgment of posterity can decide.

There ensues what we shall call: "The Riddell-Wharton-Tashman-Welles Correspondence."

MEMORANDUM TO: Mr. Raymond Wharton
Wharton, Peabody & Clark
Equitable Bldg.
Hollywood, Californi

Dear Ray:

All of us here in Trenton want to be helpful in making our new radio show a hard-headed advertising success. Although I do not consider myself an expert on radio production, I am an average radio listener, hence feel fully qualified to pass judgment on what is good or bad i radio entertainment.

Feel "WHAT NEXT?" is great program title. Do not say this only because I though of title. Have taken a private pool of a number of people here in Trenton, including my secretary, my wife, and our vice-president i charge of new soups. All feel "WHAT NEXT?" has li less possibilities. It can mean anything. We can jump from a death-bed scene with Norma Shearer to Helen Jepson singing "Mighty Lak A Rose" (Incidentally, "Mighty Lak A Rose" is my wife's favorite piece of musi and I feel that it may be an ideal theme-song for the program. However, this is not a "must".)

As we discussed in my office last Thursday, the guest-stars on "WHAT NEXT?" must be absolutely topnotch Hollywood names. We are paying a lot of money for thi program, and will be satisfied with nothing short of the Clark Gables, the Rudy Vallees and the Greer Garlands. Also, the talk on the program must be very clever. As we all know, you can't make good soup out of second-grade spinach. Give us a program with real " " and everybody will be happy."

Regards,
J. B. Riddell, President

P.S.: Let me know immediately who you are hiring to write the talk.

TELETYPE TO RAYMOND WHARTON, WP&C, HWOOD, CAL. DEAR RAY: HAVE JUST READ SCRIPT FOR FIRST BRDCST OF "WHAT NEXT?" COMMERCIAL IS ALL WRONG. WHEN ANNCR SAYS: "OH, BOY, WHAT A TASTE THRILL" SHOULD READ "OH, BOY, WHAT A REAL TASTE THRILL". INSERT WORD "REAL" BETWEEN "A" AND "TASTE". RIDDELL.

Clipping from Art Crosley's radio column, syndicated 400 newspapers in the United States and Canada:

Hollywood, September 5

The new Riddell Soup program "WHAT NEXT?" preemed from Hollywood last night. It's one of the most lavish and star-studded ventures to hit the ether. I hate to think how many cans of chicken-noodle have to go across the counter to pay for this radi ish-mosh."

"WHAT NEXT?" has everything, and therefore it has nothing. It runs the gamut from the absurd to the ridiculous. Tashman and Welles, two able scripters, seem to have been——hurried into mediocrity. Their adaptation of "The Barrets of Wimpole Street" was over before I knew which character was Robert Browning. Brian Ahearne, Shirley Temple, Spike Jones, Andy Russell and Cottonseed Clark performed ably in a half-hour revue that was doomed to failure. The opening broadcast had everything including two kitchen sinks; and I suspect ther ight have been a third, if the network hadn't cut the show off the air for running overtime. It was the kindest cut of all. I've never been so glad to hear those three gongs.

Riddell Soup has succeeded in only one thing: they have put mulligatawny on the air.

I have asked myself: "Why was last night's broadcast a failure?" The answer is clear to me. The script was wrong. The wrong words were used. We are paying Tashman and Welles a great deal of money to use the right words. When we hire a chef to make our soup here at Trenton, we expect him to put in the right ingredients at the right time at the right temperature and to cook it into great soup. Tashman and Welles are not giving us great soup.

It is very unfortunate that the commercial announcement which I wrote was cut off the air from lack of time. This must not happen agai

MEMORANDUM TO: Mr. Raymond Wharton
Wharton, Peabody & Clark
Hollywood, Californi

Dear Ray:

Felt that last night's broadcast had more "sass" than opener. We are on the right track. However, I have made a list of a few logical rules which I want Tashman and Welles to follow from now on in writing the program.

(1) Program must have good taste, personality and sass.

(2) There is no place for anything artistic on "WHAT NEXT?" Radio listeners do not like art. Nothing artisti has ever succeeded on the air.

(3) The jokes must be funny. There is nothing less funny than a joke which is not laughed at.

(4) The guest-stars must be a surprise. There is no surprise to having Edgar Bergen and Charlie McCarthy on the same program. But it would be real showmanship to team up Rubinoff and Lassie. (By the way, why not team up Rubinoff and Lassie? My wife thinks it would be a very funny idea.)

(5) Feel we should use only familiar music on the program and be sure we hear the melody. People do not want to hear the harmony, they want to hear the tune. I would like to hear one broadcast where the whole orchestra played nothing but the tune, ithout any harmony. This could make radio history.

All right, Ray, let's pull this whole thi ith a bang.

Regards,
J.B.

TELETYPE TO WHARTON, PEABODY & CLARK, HWOOD C. L. HOOPER RATING OF 3.9 IS VERY UNSATISFACTORY. "HYMNS OF ALL CHURCHES" HAS BIGGER AUDIENCE THAN "WHAT NEXT?" FEEL THAT ROOT OF TRUBL IS WRITING. THE TALK ON THE SHOW IS NOT SASSY ENUF. THERE ARE NOT ENUF VERBS IN THE WRITING. VERBS ARE WHAT MAKE WRITING SASSY. TELL TASHMAN&WELLES WE WANT MORE VERBS & FEWER NOUNS & PREPOSITIONS. RIDDELL.

Dear Ray,

The folks here at the farm liked last night's show, esp. Mimi Benzell singing "Shortin' Bread". However, I felt much of the script was far below standard.

Take the place where Montgomery says: "Thank you, Frances, for singing a beautiful song." Is this supposed to be great radio talk? Is this what we are paying $3,000 a week for? Not a verb. No sass in it. What else could she sing but a song? And the audience has just heard it so why do we have to tell them it was beautiful? And why should we thank her? She is paid. From now on, nobody is to get thanked on the program.

My wife, who has had several poems published in the Trenton paper, pointed out that on last night's show the word " " was repeated three times. With all the words there are in the English language and for all the money we are paying Tashman & Welles, I say they should not repeat words. This is like selling the same can of soup twice. People will not stand for it.

Ray,

Have just read script for next week's broadcast.

My son Jonathan, who started in at Choate this fall, could write better talk for the radio. "WHAT NEXT?" is not giving people what they want. People are not listening, which is why we do not have a larger Cooper rating.

Dear Mr. Riddell:

During the past several months, we have been the re- ients of your helpful advice concerning our craft, i. writing talk for the radi We blush to admit that we have done nothing to repay you for your kindness. Believing that one good turn deserves another, we hasten to make amends for our negligence.

We freely admit that we are not professionals in the soup game. However, we have both been eating soup for years and feel that we are qualified to judge what is good and bad in soup-making. We pass on these objections to you in exactly the same spirit as your recommendations have been referred to us.

Feel that soup-making should be conducted on a hard-headed business basis. There is no room for art. Soup is either eaten or not eaten. To make eatable soup, the following logical rules should be followed:

(1) Soup must have body, flavor & sass.
(2) Soup can must be round. (People are distrustful of square soup cans.)
(3) There should be enough liquid allow the to be swallowed without chewing.
(4) A person should be able to eat the soup without thinking. People do not like to think while they ar eating soup.
(5) Soup should appeal to as nearly 100% of the soup-eating public as possible.

EARLY TO BED

By EDDIE DAVIS

AT RISE: MRS. JONES is at dressing table in silk nightgown and lacy negligee. She is making herself ready for bed.

JONES enters in night shirt & night cap. In one hand he carries book & in the other hand a hot water bottle.

JONES: Honey, I read this book and the author is perfectly right. "Go to Bed Early and you'll live to be a hundred," and that's what I'm going to do right now. (Puts hot water bottle in bed and then gets in bed.) This will keep my feet warm. (sticks pieces of cotton in each ear). This will keep out the street noises . . . and this will keep me from snoring. (Puts clothes pin over his nose, falls asleep immediately—starts snoring loudly).

WIFE: John, kiss me goodnight!

JONES: Please—I'm having a nightmare of my own.

WIFE: John, I insist that you kiss me now!

JONES: Sorry, I'm not facing that way. (She nudges him).

WIFE: You kiss me good night this minute.

JONES: (Eyes still closed, he begrudgingly turns around and kisses the bedpost. Gosh, but you've lost weight. (back to sleep and more snoring).

WIFE: OHHHHHH! Married to a Buzz-Saw—
(She starts patting a night cream onto her face rather noisily).

JONES: (Aroused by the sound, jumps up).
What was that?

WIFE: It's just me applying my cold cream.

JONES: Oh, for a minute I thought your fan belt was loose.
(back to sleep and more snoring.)

MRS. JONES: Good night. (disgustedly). (turns out lamp. There is a moment of silence, then—phone rings. Mrs. Jones and Jones jump up, Mrs. Jones picks up phone) (Into phone).
Hello— (to Jones).
It's "STOP THE MUSIC."

JONES: Tell him to go paddle his canoe.
(lies down, covers his head)

MRS. JONES: (Into phone).
Go paddle your canoe! What?!
(To Jones).
Honey!
(JONES jumps up)
That's the name of the song! You win a Bendix Washing Machine and 20 pounds of dirty clothes.

JONES: For that they wake me up in the middle of the night!
(Grabs phone out of MRS. JONES' hand, shouts into phone)
DROP DEAD! WHAT!!!! (To MRS. JONES)
Holy smokes! That's the name of "THE MYSTERY TUNE!" I win the jackpot!

MRS. JONES: Oh, darling, think of all the prizes!

JONES: I'll do that tomorrow. Tonight all I want to do is sleep and live to be a hundred. Good night.

MRS. JONES: Good night, dear. (Turns out lamp, lies down. There's a moment's silence, and then—DOORBELL RINGS. BOTH jump up).

JONES: (As HE starts for door).
With all these interruptions a fine chance I got to live to be a hundred. (HE opens door and a FELLOW with a package enters).

FELLOW: (Pompously)
Mister Jones! Because of your successful naming of the Mystery Tune, STOP THE MUSIC Awards you this beautiful prize of 24 diapers!

JONES: Diapers?!! What'll I do with them?

FELLOW: Don't ask me. You're the father.
(Starts to leave, says:)
Happy diapering. (Exits) (JONES, at door, calls to Fellow).

JONES: Hey, these are for a baby!! We have no baby!
(Enter MAN pushing a baby carriage with a baby in it).

MAN: Yes, you have! STOP THE MUSIC adopted one for you.
(Takes from pocket a large envelope).
Here's his adoption papers. (Takes from hook on baby carriage a container in which are six bottles of baby formula). And here is his food for the next 12 hours. (As HE starts to leave) Happy feeding. (MAN exits). (JONES rushes into bedroom, excitedly announces:)

JONES: Honey, honey, I just had a baby!

MRS. JONES: (Jumps up in bed)
What!!!

JONES: I'm a mother!—I mean, I'm a father!

MRS. JONES: What are you taking about?

JONES: In the living room, honey. (Leads wife by the hand into living room to baby carriage. Points to baby). There. A prize from STOP THE MUSIC.

MRS. JONES: (Looks at baby).
Isn't it wonderful! Just by guessing the name of a song you became a father.

JONES: Yeh, but on the next one I don't want any help from STOP THE MUSIC. (THEY wheel baby into bedroom, they tiptoe to their beds, lie down).

MRS. JONES: What a wonderful baby.

JONES: So quiet. (At this the baby lets out a loud yowling, JONES and MRS. JONES jump up). I knew it! Honey, what do you think he's crying for?

JONES: I'll give him a bottle, then change his diapers; that will take care of him from top to bottom.
(JONES gets out of bed, takes hot water bottle out of bed . . . takes baby bottle from container and warms it n hot water bottle . . . dashes a few drops of the milk on the back of his hand, then tastes the milk by sucking the nipple . . . says:)
Ah, good. (Takes baby from carriage in his arms . (baby is still crying. HE slams nipple in baby's mouth, sayss) Here, take! (Baby refuses) Look—it's good. (Sucks on the nipple till he drinks all the milk. Lets out loud burp. Puts baby in carriage. JONES gets into bed, and pulls the covers over his head, the DOORBELL rings again. At this, both jump up and simultaneously say to each other:)

JONES and MRS. JONES: It's your turn! (BOTH get out of bed, saying in unison) O.K. I'll go. (BOTH go to to door. Door is opened. A MAN is facing them).

MAN: I have a prize for you from STOP THE MUSIC. (Calls off) Come, Tiny. (He enters leading a dog as big as a horse. MRS. JONES jumps on couch and in frightened tone, asks:)

MRS. JONES: Good Heavens! What is that!!!?

JONES: I think it's a camel.

MAN: Neh-h—he only smells that way. He's a St. Bernard.

JONES: Aw, no he ain't! He hasn't got a whiskey barrel around his neck.

MAN: He did have before I brought him here. (Hiccoughs) Hick!

MRS. JONES: I don't care what he is! . . . Take him out of here.

MAN: Too bad, he'd enjoy playing in your yard.

JONES: No, he wouldn't. We don't have any trees.

MAN: Then I'll take him out—this house isn't fit for a dog to live in. (HE and DOG prance out.)

MRS. JONES: Oh, I do hope that was the last. (A FELLOW enters saying:)

FELLOW: Not yet, Mrs. Jones, another prize from STOP THE MUSIC! (TWO MOVING MEN wheel in a Frigidaire.) Courtesy of Freezie Food Refrigerators. (MEN exit.)

MRS. JONES: We already HAVE a refrigerator.

FELLOW: Not with THIS feature. (HE opens box door). Instead of an ordinary light when you open the door, this has a sun lamp. You look for the food and get a sunburn at the same time. And another thing— (HE takes out two salamis 5 ft. in lenth). A year's supply of Italian salami!

JONES: Oh! (Another FELLOW enters with a large carton and sets it down heavily) What's that???

2D FELLOW: A year's supply of bicarbonated soda. (HE starts to exit with 1st fellow) Happy indigestion. (BOTH OFF).

JONES: Well, as long as I can't sleep, I might as well eat something. (Helps himself to an apple from fruit bowl of wax fruit. As HE bites into the apple, MRS. JONES warns:)

MRS. JONES: Put down that wax fruit!

JONES: (Drops fruit).
Well—I'm hungry. I got to eat something.
(Goes to frigidaire, takes out big salami, hacks it in half with a knife and puts the half of salami in between two slices of bread. As HE brings the enormous sandwich to his mouth, MRS. JONES asks:)

MRS. JONES: What? Salami before going to bed?

JONES: You know of a better way to get rid of this bicarbonate of soda? Now to enjoy my midnight snack. (M. C. enters, shouts:)

M. C.: HOLD IT! You shall have entertainment with your meal! The next prize is the floor show from Leon & Eddie's. (MUSIC plays a corny chorus number. Six broken-down CHORUS GIRLS dance on, do a corny dance and at finish they exit).

JONES: Boy, that was great entertainment. (MAN enters).

MAN: You haven't seen great entertainment until you see the new super-duper television set you've just won—Boys, bring her in. (SIX HELPERS bring in an extra large television set and exit). This set has the largest screen in television.

MRS. JONES: Who needs such a large screen.

MAN: Comes in handy when Jane Russell goes on television—after all she's got a pretty face. Hasn't she?

JONES: I don't know. I never got up that far.

MAN: And that's not all—this set comes with a built-in repair man. (Turns set around. There is a mechanic sitting in it with tools in his hand).

MRS. JONES: Gee, it is a nice set. Look, it's got a tile cabinet.

JONES: Tile cabinet? What's the idea?

MAN: It's the only set on the market that matches your bathroom.

JONES: God, what a place to watch Milton Berle!

MAN: Happy listening. (Exits).

JONES: I hope this is the last.—(A literary-type DAME enters. Short hair, mannish suit, tortoise-shell glasses, She says:)

WOMAN: No, it isn't! (Holds up a book).
Here is the best prize of them all! That popular book: EARLY TO BED AND LIVE TO BE A HUNDRED. And we have the author right here to autograph it! (Calls off).
Bring him on! (A bed is brought on. We see the Author in the bed fast asleep. WOMAN shakes sleeping author, saying:)
Author! Author! Wake up! (Author waking up).

AUTHOR: (Sleepily). Oh you woke me up! How can I live to be 100 if people keep waking me up.

JONES: (Angrily) What are you complai ing, on account of you and your lousy book I didn't get any sleep either.

AUTHOR: Oh, another annoyer, I'll never get any sleep. I wish I were dead.

JONES: (Takes out gun, shoots author). Now you can sleep forever.

BLACKOUT

'Dear Irving'

By LESTER GOTTLIEB

Mr. Irving Mansfield
Producer, CBS-TV Network
New York 20, N. Y.

Dear Irving:

Around this time of the year it's only natural that you start thinking about your friends in show business. VARIETY's anniversary issue always makes me slobbily sentimental and when I'm on a sentimental kick I start writing letters.

Do you remember the good old days (b.tv.) when we both toiled in radio for Hubbell Robinson? Things were sort of cozy on the 18th floor. I miss the bull sessions around 6 p.m. which usually wound up with one of us rolling on Hub's thick veepee carpeting as Cy Howard would give us a colored report on a visit he had just paid to an advertising agency. We had time in those days to relax a bit.

I remember how I used to envy your newly acclaimed success with "Talent Scouts," and how we teased you about your original intention to put Al Jolson in the m.c. role instead of that redhead from Washington. It was all radio then, professional and profitable.

Then most of us segued into TV. It would be a cinch, we said. We scoffed at the TV stuff that was then current, puppets and homemakers and "Blue Angel type" comics.

We found a whole new crazy world and we stopped laughing. For not only did we carry with us the normal burdens of radio production—script and talent—but latched on the complexities of scenery, design, makeup, lighting, cameras, cathoid tubes, stagehands, truckers, and budget complications that would stagger the R.F.C.

Well, you stayed with TV, adding to your laurels and your ulcers. I returned to the mother medium.

And you wanna know something, Irving? You can have it! Keep your choreographers, your makeup men, your back lighting, your boom shadows. In radio we lead a simpler, less complicated life. When we do a dramatic show we can go "Outdoors" without worrying about a phoney landscape or film process. When we have a comic out "in one" nobody cares what the traveler looks like. What traveler? When a singer sings, he doesn't play hookey with a boom. He belts right into an old reliable microphone. And the orchestra isn't coming up from a pit deeper than a Scranton coal mine. It's right behind him. We can do a polished, professional rehearsal under three hours, relax in civilized fashion with little or no strain on ourselves or the sponsor's wallet. All around the values are realistic.

And the creative challenge is still lusty. You heard about our documentary series, "The Nation's Nightmare." It was so good even rich people with two TV sets were tuning in.

Oh, I confess it isn't as glamorous back here in radio. But it's still big time show business. Jack Benny, Amos 'n' Andy, "Our Miss Brooks," and "My Friend Irma" and Lux are still going strong and there's lots of new stuff too, imed at the ears of America and getting them.

I kinda thought you'd be interested and if you or any of the other TV producers want to come back, the door is always open.

I guess a lot of characters will think it kind of screwy for me to be writing you this way when my office is on the same floor with yours. But as you know, CBS is separated into divisions now and getting into a TV producer's office is a prodigious, time-consuming task. And I'll be darned if I'm going to stand on line behind a dance director, production assistant, a production assistant's assistant, agent with a dog act and two skaters from the Wivel.

As for putting this into the mail, I told you before we're cutting down like mad in radio and turning these savings over to advertisers. Stamps add up.

Drop me a line, sometimes. We'll be around for a long time. As a matter of fact use the next Anniversary issue of VARIETY. That will be around for a long time, too.

Contentedly,

Lester.

Of TV, Thurston and a Horse

By BOB HAWK

Hollywood.

One of my favorite stories is about the guy who knew everything. To every bit of choice information his friend brought him, Weisenheimer invariably said, "Yes; I know, I know." If the friend picked up a bit of startling information about an impending divorce of an important couple, he would no sooner start to tell of it than he would hear, "Yes; I know, I know." In desperation and to try to be ahead just once, this friend bought a horse and put it in his bathroom; then he invited the wise guy over for cocktails. The host waited all evening for his guest to go into the little boy's room. He finally did and then came running out, exclaiming, "Say there's a horse in your bathroom." Replied the host: "Yes; I know, I know . . ."

So, with me. When the gang sits around talking Television, I just wait for somebody to ask, "When did you make your first appearance on television?" and my nonchalant, conversation-stopper reply is, "Oh, in 1930."

Back in 1930 in Chicago we did experimental television broadcasting in conjunction with the regular AM channel. Our TV call-letters—I can remember them now—were W9XAA, and our little studio in back of the radio studio really was the dark ages of TV. The studio was about 10 feet square and was as black as the inside of a coal miner's glove. On a little platform about three feet square one performer at a time stood facing a piercing light about the size of a quarter. Each act had to be one that required no accompaniment (unless the accompanist could read in the dark). Ukulele players, monologists, a cappella soloists usually were the guinea pigs. When I say that studio was black, ~~it was~~ black. So black that when the announcer stepped up to relieve the performer, he might stumble on the platform.

One day, after many months of experimenting, the engineers announced that it was time to spread out and make it look like a big act. They had worked out a system for picking up two of us at the same time. I happened to be the announcer on duty and we brought i as our guest the great magician, Thurston, who was appearing that week at the Chicago Theatre.

Thurston brought with him his favorite rabbit and hid it in the huge cape he wore. He told me that he would use me as his subject and that while being televised he would plant the rabbit in my clothing and then extract it for all to see. ("All" consisted of one receiving set the south side of the City, about 18 miles away).

We went into the studio and started into the act, but as I was giving Thurston a most flowery introduction and was about to ask him to step onto the platform Mr. Rabbit decided to take a walk. He sneaked out of the cape to scamper around on the floor in the dark. My introduction stretched and stretched as the Great Thurston in his black cape in his black studio searched on his hands and knees on a black floor, muttering in a voice off the video but still good for the audio, "Where are you, you little so-and-so?" He finally captured the little monster and planted it in my clothing while I was still talking and then he went into his act.

I wish that at that time I had known the story about the horse, so that when Thurston said, "There's a rabbit up your sleeve," I could have replied, "Yes; I know, I know."

REQUIEM FOR A WRITER

By MILT JOSEFSBERG

Hollywood.

PROLOG: To anyone in radio, the coming of summer brings several occupational hazards, including layoffs, no salary, and visiting tourists from the east. I've endured this terrible trinity for many a year now without complaint. I've dulled the monotony of the long layoffs by learning how to play golf. I've balanced the absence of salary by making my family economize and go without such luxuries as bread. And I've learned to enjoy the locust like visits of friends and relatives by turning tourist with them.

And so it came to pass, last summer, I showed our glamorous town to my nephew Stuart. Our itinerary included the La Brea Tar Pits, Brown Derby, San Fernando Valley Country Club, Hollywood Racetrack, Grauman's Chinese, Hollywood Bowl, the Legion Stadium, and finally, Forest Lawn.

If it hadn't been for that visit to Forest Lawn, the following manuscript would not be published today. For it was while strolling through that neo-classic necropolis that some guiding hand led me to the grave of Herbert Jones.

I remembered Herbert vaguely. I had occasionally seen him in the Halls of CBS and NBC, and we greeted each other with that tight grim smile that comedy writers reserve for others of their ilk. A tiny stone marked his remains, and it bore the simple tale, "Herbert Jones, Feb. 5, 1912-Oct. 9, 1949."

While looking at his epitaph, I noticed a tiny gopher hole in front of the stone. As I watched, the earth seemed to move, but no rodent showed its head. Instead, envelope slowly slid out of the hole. I picked it up—and was amazed to see, written across the face, the words, "By Herbert Jones, Oct. 20, 1949." It was written nearly two weeks after he died! I looked back at the ground—the hole had disappeared. So now, with no changes at all, I pass on to you Herbert's final script.

I'd like to introduce myself, but I don't know whether to say my name is Herbert Jones, or my name was Herbert Jones. You see, I died two weeks ago.

They gave me a lovely funeral even though I was only a radio writer. Everyone was surprised at the tremendous turnout for the services. There were almost 10 people there. That is, including me.

I remember the services. I couldn't move; I couldn't breathe; and I couldn't speak. But somehow, I could see and hear. Like a supine Superman, I seemed temporarily endowed with X-Ray vision. I still remember the sad faces of the mourners as I gazed at them through the cover of my pickle-pine casket—a beautiful silver-handled item given to me several years ago for a plug on Utter-McKinley.

As I lay there in state, not only did I have X-Ray sight, but my hearing was more penetrating too. I could hear what everyone said, and I also heard their inner-thoughts too. It was like a scene out of "Strange Interlude."

So, for my final script, I am jotting down the various comments my supposedly unhearing ears have heard. And in parenthesis I'm also setting down the true thoughts of the speaker.

My agent, Harold McFagin, as usual, opened his mouth before anyone else got a chance to speak. "Poor Herbert!" he blubbered, "Ours was more than a business association. It's something rare in in Hollywood, but we were friends, do you understand that, friends! And now he's gone—and part of me has gone with him." (Sure part of me has gone with him, 10%. You work like hell to sell a client. You get him a swell job at more than he's worth. He keeps 90% of the money. And as though that weren't enough, the ungrateful louse dies—and during the second week yet.)

Then McFagin stopped talking. He had to; the interment started. Georgie Jessel wiped a tear from his eye and spoke softly. "We are consigning all the mortal remains of Herbert Jones to his Maker. Herbert Jones was a radio writer, unheralded and unsung. He hid his light behind the bushel baskets of radio's best comedians. The general public never heard of Herbert, so they won't miss him. But we—those of us who knew him well—we will miss Herbert Jones in a way that mere words cannot express." (Hmmm, what a life. Every time there's death in Hollywood, somebody says, Get Jessel—he's cheaper than a minister and sometimes he gets laughs! I don't mind doing it for a friend, but I never even met this stiff, Jones.)

While Jessel was speaking, my collaborator, Harry Creel, broke down and sobbed incoherently. "What'll I do? How I'll miss him. Come back, Herbie boy, come back." (I wonder if I could talk the boss into using an old script from last year—then I could run over to Las Vegas for a week. I hope they get me a good collaborator to replace Herbie. No more pigeons. I'm tired of getting mental hernias from carrying no-talent partners.)

My brother-in-law, Karl Weejum, took his great loss dry-eyed and stoically—a strange way for him to take it because I doubt if he knows what stoically means. Karl turned to Harry and said, "Usually in-laws don't get along. But me and Herbie was more than in-laws. We was pals. (If I told Sis once, I told her a hundred times not to marry this schmo. I warned her he couldn't hold a job, and I was right. Here he's been on the job for only two weeks and he dies. I wonder if I could work it so I could collect unemployment insurance for him. Eh, better not try—I'm having enough trouble getting my own.)

Holding Karl's hand was his son, my little 10-year-old nephew, Willie Weegum. At first glance, little Willie didn't look like much. But underneath that runny nose was a semi-intelligent face. He looked up at his father, wiped a tear from his eye and said, "Daddy, I've got to go." (Gee, Uncle Herbie is dead and I'll never see him again. He was nice—last Christmas he gave me a bee-bee gun. I wonder if Daddy will get mad if I ask Georgie Jessel for his autograph.)

I guess, excluding my wife, the one who showed the most grief was my boss, Rollo Glick. And Rollo had every right to be mourning. Yesterday his Nielsen dropped two points. Gee, if it gets any lower, they'll be shoving it in this hole with me. That's not much of a gag, I know, but what can you expect from a guy who's been embalmed.

Rollo cleared his throat, turned so the audience could see the profile he began to favor in television, and then said: "I didn't know Herbie long, but then it didn't take much time to learn what a swell guy Herbie was. I'm not much at making serious speeches, but then, you all know what I'm thinking." (I hope they don't know what I'm thinking. What a break. This stiff's scripts were so bad, no wonder my Nielsen nosedived. This saves me the trouble of canning him. I hope I leave here in time to get to Santa Anita. I want to put some dough on 'Hole-in-the-Ground'—what a hunch!"

My wife Dorothy shouldn't have carried on like that. After all, I was her fourth husband. I guess she was mad because I got away before she had a chance to divorce me. Oh, well, she's still batting .750. But honestly, the way she carried on, sobbing and screeching, you'd think the cemetery was loaded with talent scouts. "Herbert, my one and only, my darling, come back to your Soul Mate." (There's gonna be trouble if his mother is named as beneficiary in his insurance.)

Most of my friends couldn't attend the services because they were radio writers too—and you know, The Show Must Go On. But good old Johnny Smith was there because he happened to be out of work. Johnny choked and sputtered as he tried to smile through his tears. "Come on folks, look at the bright side of things—that's the way Herbie would have wanted it. He was like that ever since we started in this racket together 12 years ago, writing for Milton Berle." (I'm glad I was the first one Herbie's wife called after he kicked off—but then, she's always been kind of sweet on me. If my agent doesn't get me Herbie's job with Glick, I'm gonna get me a new boy.)

Somehow I didn't expect the Radio Writers Guild to send a representative to the funeral, but they did. Walter Quail, third assistant recording secretary. "Mrs. Jones, on behalf of Herbert's fellow Guild members, I extend our sympathy in your time of bereavement." (I wonder if I ought to ask her about the 76 bucks in back dues Herbie owed.)

And then, suddenly, it was all over—they all went away. I missed them terribly, and realized I was in a lonely place. And I said, "There they go. As nice a bunch of pals as anyone ever had in Hollywood. My only sorrow in dying is that I have to leave them." (Oh, this is wonderful, laying here, resting like this. Why didn't I die 10 years ago. I never felt as good in my life—and if I'm lying, may I drop dead.)

TV's 'Puffing Robe' Boys

New Findings in the Intime In-Between Numbers, Moods and Moves of Our Video Comics

By MANNIE MANHEIM

Hollywood.

In my previous papers on the habits and deportment of television comedians, certain startling data were revealed such as the fact that Comedian M. Berle shook hands with his guests twice as often as his nearest competitor, Ed Sullivan.

You also may recall that I was the first observer to record on VARIETY's pages that a certain CBS one-hour comic scratched himself 30% more than any given NBC comedian.

With my qualifications in order, I shall discuss the findings of another survey recently completed—this one discloses some mighty interesting figures on another phase of television—the bathrobe or dressing gown as worn by comedians.

If you have watched television as carefully as I have, you will agree with these facts: 97% of the television comedians at one time or another during their programs will appear before the traveler attired in a bathrobe or dressing gown.

This entrance generally is made (a) after said comedian has just completed a song whose lyric required more breathing power than the comic possessed; (b) after the star was involved in a time step; (c) when he has removed a female garment of some sort and is now ready to continue with his next sketch.

My associates and I have observed that 84% of the above 97% don the bathrobes when they are out of breath and for that reason we shall refer to them as "puffing robes." We were going to call them "Interlude Gowns" but someone suggested this was a bit too sexy for a research piece. Now come the figures as they pertain to the networks:

More puffing robes are worn by NBC comedians than their fellow comics over at CBS.

ABC is out of the running entirely as none of my group saw an ABC performer with a robe. Neither did we see one puff. This is something for Mr. Kintner and his staff to discuss over their paper cups of coffee. Of course we are not intimating that ABC isn't a big time operation. Our point is a simple fact: None of its comedians or even tragedians appear before the travelers in bathrobes or dressing gowns. Facts are facts.

Berle The Innovator

Milton Berle was the first to introduce the puffing robe on television. Eddie Cantor followed. And we don't mean to offend our friend Berle but with all his money and his high rating and his title of Mr. Television his puffing robe ran a bad second to Cantor's as far as quality is concerned. Besides, Cantor wore a Turkish towel around his neck to protect his throat while Berle just threw on any old thing that happened to be around.

Jack Carson, a comedian who can stand the rigors of television much better than almost anyone else because of his large frame and comparative youth, wears a daring, short robe to sing his signature and Carson doesn't even get out of breath. Our group concluded that Comedian Carson merely wore the habiliments of his calling, as a TV show isn't a TV show unless the star dons a robe.

Comedian J. Durante, on his program of Dec. 1, huffed and puffed in a robe that resembled the outer mantle of an ancient Roman citizen; only Schnoz's toga was of poor design, dragging in the rear and ultra-baggy over all. In the scene that Durante wore his robe, our observers saw no reason for the tunic—except that a directive may have been sent out by someone in the tower ordering every comic to get into a bathrobe.

Berle, Cantor, Carson and Durante certainly qualify for NBC's All Comic Bathrobe Team, but the captai of the squad should be the most habitual robe-wearer of all TV—Sid Caesar. Our charts (and they're pretty accurate) show that Caesar does not have a large collection of puffing robes—the truth is he wears the same gown on each show. Younger and probably more virile than his contemporary, Story-Line-Comic Carson, Caesar, nevertheless, appears in bedroom attire more often per program. NBC's answer to our survey could very well be that Caesar appears each week on an hour and half show while their other gasping comics turn up periodically, so to speak, and for this reason Caesar is entitled to adorn himself with the vestments of his office more frequently. That could be NBC's reaction—not ours.

To uphold the good name of CBS in our survey, Edgar Bergen showed his NBC rivals a thing or two. On one occasion last season, Bergen faced the cameras draped a brocaded affair with silk lapels and fluttering tassels. And Bergen wasn't out of breath either.

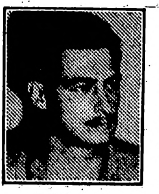
We have word from a Mr. Markson, large robe manufacturer who said in so many words, "If television continues the way it's going, I look for an increase in the robe business of over 30% and believe me I only hope these comics keep perspiring and if things go the way I think they're going to go, we're going to put out a special TV robe just for comedians. Yes, sir, you never know where your business is going to come from. Who'd ever think television would increase the robe business?"

To summarize: Our little group of intrepid researchers offers this word of hope to all young men who long for a comedy career in television—"Get yourself a bathrobe."

Voice From the Rear Of Room Re: Radio

By HAL KANTER

Hollywood.



Hal Kanter

Back in 1942, I accepted an invitation to participate in a symposium held at Denver University on the subject: "Looking Ahead in Radio." As an expert whose credentials were obviously forged, I was chosen to speak on the writing aspect of radio. At that time, I stated the only thing the radio writer had to look forward to was television.

There was one young man in the audience who later asked a number of intelligent, well-thought-out questions. Little did I realize at the time that young man would, only eight short years later, be George Kendall Marlowe—a very successful sheep farmer in Wyoming. Most of the others in attendance that evening went on to become radio writers, television writers and—in at least two cases—happy, contented housewives. (They were women.)

Today, I look back on what I said 10 years ago with a twinge of regret. Taking my own words too seriously, I eventually left radio for a season in television. Believing that radio was a dead dog being flogged with stale fish, I figured that the Winter of 1949 was a propitious moment to get into the new medium. I made the plunge on CBS via a comedy show which did 40 weeks of duty, selling watchbands the first 13 weeks and not enough cigarets the next 27.

During that 40-week period I kept up with the progress of electronic engineers and developed a life-sized 16-inch ulcer. But it was not all in vain. Looking back—an excellent way to view the TV scene—I have come to this conclusion:

The 14 years I spent writing radio scripts was excellent training for motion picture writing. Working in pictures is excellent preparation for television. And television is the best preparation I know for Forest Lawn.

(Internal Revenue Agents please note: this plug for Forest Lawn does not mean I get a free sarcophagus.)

To me—as a writer—radio shines like a torch in the smog of television and I, for one, am carrying the torch. It appears that the outlook for the writer in radio should be a brighter one than ever before. Because of slashed budgets in broadcasting, the writer is more important than he has ever been for one primary reason. Less money to be spent means that the idea must be of sufficient merit to attract listeners. The idea is the thing—and ideas come from writers.

NTG and Faye Emerson

It is inconceivable that television will shoulder radio out of the American scene. If nowhere else, it will always be in the several million automobiles of the nation—and you can bet that state laws will prohibit N.T.G. from appearing in the front seat of your Chevrolet. They'll also keep Faye Emerson out of your back seat . . . and now that I think about it, that's a pretty shoddy way to treat taxpayers.

In the coming years we should find radio growing up more than at any other period of its life. There was a time when it was a novelty—like Hadacol jokes. But the novelty, like Hadacol, wears off and today we find radio an accepted ingredient of our civilization. Now that it is so firmly entrenched, physically, it can—and must—broaden its intellectual scope.

Trouble with radio is that once it had reached the point where it was pouring into every home selling products and ideas, the people in control were content to allow the status to remain quo. They didn't want to experiment and try to improve a standard that was obviously financially successful and intellectually acceptable to the majority of listeners.

There were exceptions, of course—exceptions which showed that radio could grow up. But the need to make radio earn a living forced a behavior pattern on it and it became a series of variations on familiar themes. Now that radio will have to struggle for its listeners, writers will have to invent shows that are different enough to attract people from the one-eyed monster which has contributed the singing cigar and the square dancing pumperknickle to our native arts.

To be different now means that we must improve radio. We must improve the content of our shows. We must come up with better ideas, more searching ideas, more adult approaches to old ideas.

By "we," I mean writers, of course, because everything begins with the script. This is not a new conception. It goes back to Biblical days, when Moses walked up a mountai . There was a clap of thunder and a blast of lightning and a hand reached out of the sky with Script. Moses took that 10-line Script down the mountain and the people at last had something to go by.

And—by the way—if we'd stuck to that Script, instead of ad libbing around it so much, we'd all be in a lot better shape than we're in now.

It's Time For TV to 'Under-Produce', Give More Thought to Basic Ideas

By CARROLL CARROLL

Hollywood.

When you scan the TV prospect for 1952, you get the feeling that it's going to be a great year for the boys who think intelligently and constructively instead of those who just think big. It looks as if the scene painters and the set-builders are going to have to lose some of their budget-money to the writers. And the writers are going to have to invest most of this increased income in midnight oil.

There are certain clearly discernible signs that the big news is seeping through to the big brains that the big thing in TV—just as in radio—is not talking to the top row in the gallery but entertaining a few friendly people in a comfortable living room. And, just as they discovered it in radio, the top TV shows are finding out that you've got to get to these people fast with something good or they'll flip to something that seems planned more for them than for the late N. Y. Hippodrome.

If you analyze it carefully you'll find that the basis for the colossal impact of athletic events on TV is found in the fact that the icon tube has transformed a fairly remote and impersonal contest into an extremely intimate experience that you, your living room, share with the shortstop, the quarter-back, the pitcher, the wrestler or the boxer.

There seems to be abundant evidence now available that it's time the critics of TV stopped screaming for "more production" while ignoring the fact that the people they consistently okay for TV have captivated them with a minimum of production.

To start at the top there are the two who have unquestionably accumulated the most critical kudos since the course opened—Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca. These two top talents use very little production to put the comedy across with a crash. Sometimes they use no more than a couple of chairs and a table, maybe a minor prop. Most often all they need to make their comedy effective is each other. Frequently Caesar solos with no more production than a plain backdrop and what looks like a blue serge suit. Nor does Miss Coca go in very heavily for what could be called production effects. What both of these great performers do mostly is comedy that definitely seems to lack what the critics call "visual impact." There are no big sets, no lavish costumes, nothing but good ideas well executed.

Nod to Garroway

Even the dancing portions of "Your Show of Shows" rely solidly on intelligent, minimal production, modern in feeling and with economy of line, with frequently stunning effect. So, with a passing nod to Dave Garroway of Chicago, who also gave the big production cohorts the wink, we start off with the most lauded show of all the "big shows" of TV and go on to several more of the very top productions of 1951 that were distinctly under-produced in a year when anything less than the Rose Bowl Parade was shrugged off as "just a radio show with pictures" . "not visual."

If you were a girl-singer the critics felt you had to dance. If you were a girl-dancer you had to sing. And if the singers danced badly and the dancers sang hadly thy were severely criticized for incompetence. On the other side of the coin, there is no reason at all why any performer shouldn't broaden the scope of his appeal by adding new facets to his specialty.

But it's ridiculous for any artist to do something he or she is bad at just for the sake of "production" or "visual" value.

Dinah Shore has danced and jitterbugged and I'm sure everyone loved it. Not that she'll ever jitterbug herself into the Harvest Moon Festival at Madison Square Garden—she probably couldn't even make the waltz event—but the jitterbugging and the waltzing she did fitted in well with the mood of the show. She didn't just stand up and dance, for no apparent reason, with that "look-ma-I'm-dancing" expression that so many singers get on their faces when they move their feet above a shuffle. And when Dinah doesn't have some mood or action that calls for dancing, she just stands, or sits, or even lies down and sings. And the fact that she obviously knows what she's singing about and has a reason for singing what she's singing is sufficient production unto itself.

Moving on from Sid Caesar, Imogene Coca and Dinah Shore, we come to another outstanding entry in the intelligence rather than production department. His name is Red Skelton. Red gets more visual impact and more production value with a hat, a mobile face and a cast-iron body than anyone else in the field today. (You can throw out the "custard-pie" commercials he does on film as these are essentially film-type rather than TV-type production.) Red's first TV shows hit the entire industry with the force of a platoon of bulldozers and he did almost nothing but stand in front of a curtain and be entertaining. All he had was talent and that's something all the production in the world can't substitute for. I did not read one review or criticism of Red's first show that complained of it being "static" or "just a radio show with pictures."

The thing Eddie Cantor has been praised most for has been his character Maxie the Taxi. Maxie sit in a cab, talks to someone and pretends to steer. There's no change of scene, no great scope, nothing important except what he says. In fact, whenever Cantor's at his best on TV is when his production values are almost non-existent. Then there's the Perry Como Show with so little production that even I think it could use more and it's still a success. Jack Benny is at his best when the entire production rests on his expressions and the impact of his timing. The amount of production values and visual appeal in the much praised Groucho Marx Show could be dispensed with an eye-dropper . . . or an eyebrow dropper.

Production Only as Substitute

The fact is, production is what's needed when TV really hasn't much else to offer. It's positively amazing, the amount of production squandered on "The Hit Parade." "Squandered" because who in the name of every great talent ever to trod tin-pan alley needs 19 successive and different elaborate stagings of "Because of You." This isn't meant to be a reflection on the song. It's a nice song. But it has no production value. Yet, it is produced, over-produced, and re-over-produced ad infinitum. Someday maybe this type of show will not be done on TV. Perhaps straight pop music shows of this nature belong where they can be done best—on radio.

The point at which production and intimacy clash on TV is the point at which TV and cinema technique diverge. The TV frame becomes unbearably busy when there are too many people dancing or milling around whereas the cinema screen, as C. B. Do-You-Know-Who found out shortly after reading his Bible, handles vast crowds and distances with considerable comfort and effectiveness.

What all this is getting at is simply that once more the writer must be given his place as the most important cog in the TV machine just as the writer took his place as the most important person in the radio scene and, whether they'll admit it or not, on the cinema screen. In fact the only indispensible combination in the entertainment world is the writer and the performer. Sometimes the former makes the latter look better than he is. Sometimes a great performer can carry some mediocre writing . . . but not for long.

All the production in the world won't put inferior material across and so, as TV starts becoming more and more conscious of this, money must be channelled from the production of sets, scenes, and props into the production of better basic ideas and better words on paper. I have yet to see that one picture which is worth 10,000 words, but I can tell you one word that's worth 10,000 pictures. The word is "thought."

I Was Dropped By Jello – And I Saw Stars

By EZRA STONE

My own 13-year celestial trajectory as star of the radio "Aldrich Family" having ended where it started, in relative oblivion, I now find myself helping to guide the orbits of brighter and greater stars in the new spaceless heavens of television.

Ezra Stone

My indoctrination as a television producer was a limited hectic association with Olsen & Johnson in the early days of big, hour-long TV variety shows. In my book they had always been the masters of loud and fast nonsense. Now their stockpile of little people, skirtless ladies, swinging gorillas, spiders and growing plants was quickly expended, leaving only their arsenal of ammunition. TV never gave them time to broaden their talents, only their humor. One of their greatest arts is their ability never to be caught in the same room together lest they be forced to make a decision, whether major or minor. Our association ended amicably, though, and in true O. & J. style. At the signoff of the last show of the series, they led a finely bred Strathglass heifer calf into the control room and presented her to me for my pure bred Ayrshire herd in Bucks County, Pennsylvania. Also a shovel.

Next came Danny Thomas. Here I was faced with a performer who seemed to be undefined, even to himself. I soon found that Thomas has a strong acting talent, excellent singing style, physical grace and rhythm, an outstanding sense of comedy, warmth and sincerity, persuasiveness, eight brothers, and the inability to be awake before 1 p.m. We haven't yet fully exploited all these attributes, but it has been fun trying.

The television debut of Ezio Pinza came next. I envisioned strict, formal rehearsals. Quiet, no smoking, no laughing. From the first session Pinza was seldom quiet, seldom without a cigaret, never without a smile or a prank, a tireless worker, letter perfect by the second day of rehearsal, and a stickler for credibility. "If this whole program is supposed to take place in one evening," he once asked, "why does the girl wear a different gown at the finish than she was seen in when I called for her at her apartment? We must have returned there during the evening, and if we did . . ?" He wasn't happy until he had explored every delicious possibility of that off-screen scene.

Ed Wynn and Martha Raye

It was a pleasure getting reacquainted with Ed Wynn. I hadn't seen much of him since Keenan and I used to job-hunt together. My assignment was Ed's one show from New York this fall. In spite of its being a one-night stand I spent a great deal of time looking at all his old kines. (Wynn calls them his old kidneys.) He is a very funny man. Funnier than his material, in my opinion. Although his style seems to be out of the current "tempo" vogue, Wynn kids about this. "When I was first discovered," he recalls, "critics used to single out my unique hesitant delivery. Now I'm doing the exact same thing, and they just say I keep forgetting my lines."

Martha Raye's television debut with her own show was one of my most thrilling theatrical assignments. It felt like a good show from the first moment Leo Morgan, Nat Heiken, Billy Friedberg and myself sat own to plot it. Pinza was to be her guest. We decided to keep the story in good taste and physically exciting, but without a trampoline act. The two stars rehearsed harder than Theatre Guild apprentices. The usually frantic camera hours were a pleasure. Miss Raye and Pinza were always on their toes and clowning just enough in the breaks to maintain a spirit of easy good humor. Milton Berle dropped in with Dagmar, and, of course, the obvious

Pioneering in TV Reception

By FRANK SCULLY

Hollywood.

Back in the tail end of the first half of the 20th Century I took a left turn (which was much less suspect then than it is now) from Sunset Strip and found myself lost in the hills which flank Laurel Canyon, a faubourg of Hollywood, Calif.

I kept running into and backing out of dead ends. Observing that I was running out of gas and had long been out of food and drink, I hailed a lineman who was tugging 900 feet of wire up a hill. He was dusty and tired and in no mood to bother with jerks who didn't know their way around the Hollywood hills.

But there must have been something in my cry that convinced him that here was a man in genuine distress. He skidded down the hill and asked me what was the trouble. I told him I seemed to have lost contact with the outside world. This didn't strike him as unique. "I can't make contact either," he said.

He looked me over and said, "You look like a VARIETY mugg I knew. I thought you guys knew your way around."

He looked familiar to me, too.

"Are you Jack Paar?" I asked.

He nodded, sort of sadly, I thought.

"America's new, bright, young humorist?"

He shrugged, adding what might have been taken for either a smile or a snarl.

"In a new racket?"

"No," he finally said, "I'm pioneering in TV reception. I bought a house here and then tried to buy a TV set. No make would sell me one, for fear of kickbacks. They told me reception was deader around here than our dead ends. They put in sets to prove it. All we got were some long distance mental telepathy, left over I suspect from 1937 when Sir Hubert Wilkins and Harold Sherman tried to talk to each other between Point Barrow and New York.

"Finally I found a dealer who would sell me a set. With no warranty, however. I worked at the thing for weeks without success. But I was not giving up that easily. I finally found that I could get some reception in an empty lot at six feet off the ground. Higher I got nothing. Lower I got ground moles. But at six feet I got two stations."

They didn't include Faye Emerson, however, and the pioneer wanted to see eye to eye with her, as the phrase goes. He knew that radio waves bend, but TV waves, he now learned, travel in a direct line.

That meant if he were to see Faye Emerson at all he would have to get in a direct line with Mt. Wilson. He trudged up a hill behind his home and tried an antenna there. He got some sound but it didn't sound much like Faye Emerson. It kept repeating its signal. He looked down and discovered it was coming from the tail of a rattlesnake.

This practically scared him back to smoke signals as a source of entertainment. He dropped his equipment and scrammed down the hill for high boots, a gun and a golf club. Then he went after the rattler. He killed the killer, only to discover it was a typical Hollywood setup. The rattler had a girl friend. He went Cagney and beat her brains out.

It took 900 feet of cable, a telegraph pole and a special antenna to get reception. After that the picture came in clearer than it left the studio. He was a happy man. Friends came from everywhere to view his reception. His liquor bill was terrific.

Real estate people told him that his reception had raised the value of his property $10,000, but the heavy traffic and cigaret burns in his rugs and overstuffed furniture practically wiped out the increase.

Then a brush fire swept over the hill and burned out his line of communication to the top of the hill. The only consolation he got out of this was that there would be no rattlesnakes around to louse up his reconstruction project. He lugged 900 feet of new wire up the hill and built a new antenna.

He was so impatient to do this that he didn't wait for the ground to cool after the brush fire. This time he wore tennis shoes and felt as if he were being handed one hot foot after another. People thought he was doing an Indian war dance.

Some snoopers, suspecting subversive activity, notified the police. The cops absolved him of disloyalty but asked him if he had a license. A union man asked him if he had a card in the lineman's union. But he stood by his rights and invited them into his house to gaze with wonder on his perfect reception. They settled for that. In fact they congratulated him, confessing that when they tried to get Faye Emerson all they got was quivering lines that looked like the homeliest girls in the Waves.

He had offers to buy and could have made $10,000 more on his house than he put in it. But he feared he could never get such good reception elsewhere. So he didn't sell.

Little by little other people got better reception and his army of fair weather friends gradually diminished in number. Then the bottom dropped out of the real estate market. It dropped out of radio, too. His own show wasn't costing enough, so the sponsors dropped it. He thought he knew enough about television by now, so he made a pitch for that. But they told him he was too tall for TV.

In the end he sold his place and moved down to the flatlands. He lost $9,000 on the place but he's quite philosophical about the matter.

"After all," he will tell you, "I remain the first guy to get good reception around Laurel Canyon. They can't take that away from me."

'ALICE IN WONDERVISION'

By AL SCHWARTZ and SHERWOOD SCHWARTZ

Hollywood.

Every night Alice sat by the television set, kitten in her lap, watching all the wonderful programs. Alice and her kitten laughed with the comedians, sobbed with dramatic shows, and even grunted with the wrestlers. One night her kitten suddenly jumped off her lap and scampered toward the television set. Alice couldn't understand why until she looked at the screen and saw a large bowl of milk. "Come back you silly kitten," Alice laughed. "That milk is on television. You can't drink it."

But the kitten paid no attention to her. He poked his head right through the picture tube and started lapping up the milk. Alice rubbed her eyes in amazement.

"Goodness, if a kitten can do that, maybe I can do it too." With that, she cautiously stepped through the picture tube, half expecting it to break at any moment. But nothing happened. Alice started to search for her kitten, and the next thing she knew she was falling down, down, down. She plunged head over heels down a long thin tunnel, not knowing where she was or where she was going. She was falling so fast, she could just barely read a sign that said "Coaxial Cable."

"Coaxial Cable?" said Alice to herself. "I wonder what that means?" But before she could figure it out, she landed with a loud thump. "Ouch" said Alice, struggling to her feet. "I wonder where I am?"

"Well, let's look around," suggested the kitten, which had landed beside her.

They seemed to be on a large stage of some sort. All about them were spotlights, cameras and scenery.

"What a strange world," said Alice in awe. "I wonder where we are?" she asked again.

"This is the Center Theatre in Radio City," answered the kitten.

"Gracious me. How did you know that?"

The kitten shrugged modestly. "Well, after all, I'm part Shubert Alley cat."

"This must be where all the television shows come from," exclaimed Alice excitedly.

Just then large white rabbit hopped by, almost knocking Alice down.

"My, what manners," gasped Alice, "can't you say pardon me?"

"Pardon me? pardon me?" repeated the white rabbit twitching nervously. "I never heard of 'pardon me'—I'm a television producer."

Alice was puzzled. "What's a television producer?"

The rabbit blinked his pink eyes, and twitched twice more. "That's a radio producer who wishes he was back in radio."

Alice was puzzled. "Mr. Producer, you just said the same thing twice."

"Of course, of course. That's how I keep my job. It always sounds like someone's backing me up."

The rabbit took out his watch, and twitched so violently he set it back eight minutes. "Oh, dear me," he exclaimed, "I'm late, I'm late. I'd better jump along, or the sponsor will be on my tail."

Alice was curious. "Sponsor? Is he a rabbit, too?"

"No, but we rabbits like to stick close to him. He's got all the lettuce."

"Oh, is that so," interrupted a gruff voice from above.

"Oh, heavens, Oh heavens, there he is now." He pointed. There perched on a boom was a large Cheshire cat grinning wickedly. The rabbit was so terrified his pink eyes turned deep yellow, and he hopped off to his control hutch.

Alice looked up at the grinning Cheshire cat, and realized with a start, that he didn't have a body. She circled round and round, and finally bursting with curiosity, she said, "I hope you don't mind my asking, but aren't you an odd looking cat, Mr. Sponsor. You don't have a body."

The Cheshire cat smiled down at her. "It's elementary, my dear young girl. If I had a body I'd have a heart, and as everyone knows, a sponsor doesn't have a heart."

"Oh, well," said Alice, trying to make light of it, "heart or no heart, Mr. Cat, you still have nine lives."

"My dear girl," commented the sponsor wrily. "In television, nine lives last about one week."

Alice was eager to continue this enlightening conversation, but suddenly a loud voice shrieked, "Quiet, Quiet."

A strangely attired creature in a high hat was dashing madly about the stage, screaming orders at everyone in sight.

"My, you're the busiest man I ever saw," said Alice.

"Naturally. I'm the television director. I stage the show, rehearse the actors, and call the camera shots."

"Oh. Judging by your outfit, I thought you were the Mad Hatter."

"That's what a Mad Hatter is," he answered. "A television director who flipped his lid."

Alice giggled, "My, that's very funny."

The Mad Hatter turned to two worried looking creatures who were busily slipping last minute jokes into the teleprompters. "You hear that, boys?"

"Who are they, Mr. Director?"

"I'd introduce you to them, but they're writers," explained the Mad Hatter. "They're Tweedledee and Tweedledum."

"So that's what television writers look like," observed Alice. "Are they any different than writers in radio?"

"Not much," commented the Mad Hatter." It's just that their ulcers are more photogenic."

"Is writing for television such hard work?"

"It's not that it's hard," explained the Mad Hatter, "it's confusing. You have to order the scenery two weeks before you get the idea for the kind of scenery you need for the idea. You see?"

Alice didn't see at all, and decided to change the subject. "With a director, a producer, a sponsor, and writers who are all so important, you must have a great star."

"Star, star," repeated the Mad Hatter, "Heavens to Mr. Paley, I knew we forgot something." Suddenly he stared at Alice. "How about you? How would you like to be our star?"

Tweedledee and Tweedledum yelled in unison, "Yeah, how about it Alice?"

The white rabbit and the Cheshire cat chanted with them. "How about it? How about it?"

"No, no," yelled Alice backing away. "I don't want to be in television. No, no."

Through the hubbub of these strange cries, Alice heard a familiar voice. "Wake up, Alice dear. Wake up."

Alice blinked her eyes, and looked around. There she was in front of the television set with the kitten on her lap. Her mother was saying, "Alice, how can you watch television so much. Those programs are simply terrible."

"Don't say that, mother," said Alice. They all work so hard to put on a good show. I know how tough it is."

"You?" laughed Alice's mother. "What do you know about television?"

"Oh, you'd never believe me, mother," said Alice. She winked at the kitten. And the kitten winked back.

TV Trickery

By Milbourne Christopher

(The author magician)

The vast resources of magic's visual trickery have scarcely been tapped by TV. A few technicians have used the profession's optical principles for eye-catching advertisements sudden appearances and dissolves but the most visual of the theatrical arts is still in its television swaddling clothes.

Most producers of variety programs are content to shoot the tricks as they appear to theatre and nightclub audiences without taking advantage of television's special flexibility.

Take closeup magic for example. Many of the most perplexing feats are those, which until TV, could only be shown across a table to a dozen or so people. Astonishing tricks with small objects such as matches, dice and finger rings, can be shown to great advantage with tight closeups via video.

To show TV's range, on a recent "Arthur Godfrey and His Friends" show I went from intimate conjuring (the spongeball trick) to stage illusions (the production of an attractive girl from a miniature doll house).

The camera came in close for shots of my hands during the spongeball skullduggery, then pulled away for shots that included Godfrey, me and the dollhouse for the illusion. Even in the illusion TV was used to point up the mystery. After the overall shot, its closeup eye peered inside the house just before the production—some thing the theatre spectator has always wanted to do, but never could.

At present most of the TV magic shows are designed for youngsters. "The Magic Clown," "The Magic Sultan" and the "Dell O'Dell Show" are aimed straight for the youngest viewers. Magic is far from limited to such a narrow appeal. Kiddie shows have their place, but why

WHEN WE WERE VERY YOUNG (in AM)

By JOHN CAMERON SWAYZE

All you hear about these days is PROGRESS. I'm getting tired of it. You won't find anything smacking of progress in the next thousand words or so. Pur your feet on the desk, lean back and lax. This piece is about the radio that WAS a couple of decades ago when, as young reporter, I did a 7:15 a. m. news broadcast from one corner of the city room before buckling down to the signments the city ed threw at me. The hour was a bit early for me and to make the broadcast each morning required pretty accurate timing.

John C. Swayze

I rode the street car to work and had everything figured to a nicety as long as the street car company held to its schedules. Along the route of car to office were a number of public clocks, posted on the outside of buildings by various business establishments with accompanying advertisements. I had them all spotted and kept track of the progress of the car I was riding. By the time the motorman reached my stop I knew exactly how fast I would have to run to reach the microphone. The run was an uphill drag, ending in three flights of stairs at the office. At the head of the stairs was the United Press, where I grabbed the overnight accumulation of news stories. The broadcasting studio was then across the long city room. This route became a race course every morning, with the early shift workers in the U. P. office and the city room the cheering section.

As I raced around with coat tails flying, their whoops followed me until the radio room door slammed behind me and I hurried through the news, selecting the morning air edition. Then I went on—breathless. The word "breathless" is entirely accurate. More than once a good natured listener called to say I certainly must have had to hurry because they could hear me gasping. In fact, it became something of a feature. Regulars would listen to see how hard I was panting and by that knew if I had encountered difficulties in reaching the office.

Fun in the City Room

Pre-dating those gay days was the era of really early radio, its genuine infancy, and it was then there was staged in that same city room across which I used to quickstep as odd a program as you'll find in or out of the book. In a way, you might say it was the broadcast that never took place. Motivating force was a reporter named Jack Carberry who, when last I heard of him, was sports editor of the Denver Post. In those days he was full of shenanigans but his antics probably reached a peak on this night when he played announcer. Even in the very youthful years the paper had a station of sorts. When working properly, reception was fairly good for a radius of eight to 10 blocks. Occasionally it reached to the city limits. One summer night an all-school orchestra was scheduled to broadcast. The last edition having long since rolled, the city room was turned over to the young musicians, as it was the only place suitable for such a crowd. The paper had that day given considerable space to the concert and it was to be something of an event. It was being covered by Carberry and a photographer for a story and pictures the next day. The players started tuning up and their instructor, in shirt sleeves and perspiring, made the last minute checks. Another group of workers i another part of the building were also perspiring. These workers were the radio engineers and an embarrassing thing had occurred. The station's equipment over which the concert was about to be aired, had gone completely on the fritz. Things began to add up to a terrible frost. Finally, the chief engineer gave up.

"You might as well tell them to pack up and go home," he announced. "There'll be no broadcast tonight."

At this announcement, Carberry simply perked to the occasion.

"Just stay out of sight," he said. "We'll stage a broadcast even if it doesn't get on the air."

He rushed to the city room, at one end of which stood the early-day microphone with a megaphone attachment pointing toward the chestra. The musicians were now warming up with youthful enthusiasi Carberry waved his arms for silence.

"In exactly two minutes," he shouted, "the concert will start. Everyone get set."

From then on, it was every man for himself. Between announcements, Carberry would dash from the room to return with telegrams, supposedly received from listeners. These he would read with a flourish.

"Here's one from Hoskins Corners," he would say. "Broadcast coming in fine, thanks, folks. Let's hear from more of you."

Then as the photographer took pictures, the musicians would whirl into the next number with added zest. So the summer night wore on, split with a cacophony of noise. Youngsters were blowing their brains out under the impetus of a wild haired reporter who raced in from time to time to read messages he had written himself. But they loved it, everyone concerned. It was fun, making the broadcast that never took place. Never took place? Well, now wait a minute. It was hot that night and the many windows were wide open. The musicians' vigor caused a tremendous noise which carried on the still night air. Chances are the concert was heard over fully as great an area as if the equipment had been working perfectly. Carberry's insistence in carrying on turned out to be an idea of real merit, a fact which was purely accidental.

CBS-TV GETS 'BANK' TO FILL SUN. WARING SPOT

CBS-TV filled its open Sunday night half-hour, which being given up by the Fred Waring show, by raiding NBC-TV this week for "Break the Bank." Giveaway program moves over to CBS Jan. 13, taking over the 9:30 to 10 o'clock period, with Bristol-Myers continuing as sponsor.

Move gives CBS a Sunday night SRO again and, at the same time, leaves NBC with a hole to fill, Wednesday nights at 10. Waring show, bankrolled by General Electric, has been running from 9 to 10, but cuts back to the 9 to 9:30 slot only after Jan. 6.

CASE HISTORY

By PAUL GERARD SMITH

My name is Ulric. I am an ulcer. Anyhow I used to be. I went out of business automatically when Joe kicked in right after the holidays. Joe was my boss. He was the guy that brought me to life and fed me.

Paul G. Smith

I was born about five years ago, just southeast of his liver. Of what Joe had been previous to my coming, I learned by hearsay. He was a college man. He had graduated cum laude from one of our more erudite universities. He grabbed off a B.A. mainly for a document he whipped up called "Poetry, Ancient and Modern, as Applied to the Theatre." He was front man in Lit. 47, and was picked as a guy most likely to something or other. Anyhow, he was smart, and knew a lot of long words, and how to spell 'em, and was chockful of Theories and Drama and Art and Hidden Meanings, and Subtle Insinuation and all that stuff a guy learns instead of how to swing a pick and locate a bomb shelter quick.

He was a very popular guy, and in those days was eating pretty high on the hog, and spending time over it discussing Ethics and Trends, and cogitating over the State of the Theatre. This gave his grub a chance to digest, and he slept well nights, and each new day was another door to open on lovely surprises, which he took in stride. He was amazed at how beautiful Life was, and what opportunities it held for a thoughtful young man with a good education and a thorough knowledge (theoretical, not practical) of the theatre, its meaning and intent. He knew human nature. He had studied it very earnestly—from books. He didn't like people. They annoyed him, mainly because they acted like people, instead of Lesson 12, Applied Psychology. He was happy and healthy. He was so healthy he could wade knee-deep through an epidemic and come out with a good appetite and three new muscles.

Then, through the machinations of an alumnus of his college, who had heard of him and his brilliant achievements, he got a job in Television.

Ten weeks later I was born. His stomach was one of the coziest and neatest places you have ever seen. The lining was smooth and lovely, like a nylon shirt. I picked a nice section of it and moved in.

My coming wasn't an overnight job. For the first couple of weeks he cracked out ideas like corn popping on a hot plate. Each one was seized upon with a whoop and a hurrah, and put to work. Joe was a hot cracker—you find the question, Joe had the answer; not after a while but right now. By acclamation the other geniuses named him head genius—that's how smart he was. They took him to lunch—one right after the other. They bought him drinks—one right after the other. Of course the lunches were pretty short—10 minutes—because there was some other notion he was wrestling with. This TV thing ate 'em up as fast as you cooked 'em. You had to keep digging up more and more and more. Of course this was no problem to Joe. Not at first it wasn't. Then one day he reached for an idea, and came up empty. He started changing some of the old ones around and that held up for a while—but still there were more needed—and more.

Liquid Diet

He started missing lunch and eating out of a bottle. He couldn't sleep nights, so he dropped in to talk to the other boys. While they talked they had a belt or two, and spent most of the time trying to interrupt each other at the top of their voices.

Those are the circumstances that brought me about. I sneaked in one morning, just between the tomato juice and the black coffee. Just to let him know I was on the job, I gave a little twitch, and the coffee was followed by a double shot of bicarb. Nasty stuff that. It nearly got me. But after awhile I got used to it, and began to thrive on it.

Then about 2:10 would come the lunch—not chawed, it arrived in hunks. When a guy is trying to get rid of a lot of adverbs and technical suppositions, his jaws are too busy talking to chaw much. This was duck soup for me. I'd grab one of those lumps on the way by and kick it around plenty.

At 4 o'clock came the martinis. Half a dozen at least. I loved them. You know, if an ulcer is really sincere about doing a good job, he can take the alky from one of those things, hone it on the vermouth and etch the prettiest pictures on the stomach lining. That's what I did—night after night—martini after martini.

$50 Consultations

Then one day something happened. He went to see a doctor. For 50 bucks the doc gave him some good advice and one chip for the spoopgoo was the proportion.

For a week I thought I was a goner. Joe kept loading me down with sickly paste goo—mashed fruits and gluey mashes. I nearly gave up the ghost when he started on the yogurt. He quit drinking and went up to bed early—and started taking things "a bit easy." I lost weight—I was down almost to a blackhead when the network signed a big deal with Goodyear and tossed it in his lap. That night the yogurt stopped and the martinis began agai

I had a tropical field day with a hunk of underdone roast beef about the size of a golf ball. I found more corner pockets in his craw than the Brunswick people could turn out in five years. Of course around midnight the game turned into a sort of whiskey polo affair, because the account executives had called him in to a meeting, and were liquefying their problems as fast as they came up.

The first show was a big success. That meant champagne—buckets of it. Now you give me a little champagne and I can do wonders with it. A couple of shots and I can make a guy think he's swallowed a spinning mouse with spurs on and a horn like a unicorn.

Once again I got a scare. One day nothing came in at all—and I'd found out I'd overdone things. By this time I'd got lonesome down there all by myself—anyhow there was too much fun for just one guy, so I called in a couple of brother ulcers. He'd been to a Christmas party that day, and between us we put on a real peeler.

They hustled him back to the medics. They pumped him out—that wasn't any fun, believe me. Then they pushed me some stuff down his epiglottis that nearly floundered us. We were almost plastered over when New Year's came.

It looked like a bum year for us, because we heard him distinctly make a lot of promises—bed early—no booze—sane food—calm habits. And then the phone rang. A cigaret mob had seen what he had done for the tire people. They were planning a big show. Would be like to drop over to the New Year's party they were tossing. He would—he did.

Ten minutes after he got there, the embalming fluid the doc had wrapped us in was dissolved in a flood of liquid fire. With a yell of relief we went to work. We made up an amalgum of hot rum, cold gin and anchovy paste, moulded it into bullets and shot it off in all directions. Talk about your A-Bombs! This stuff went in deep and exploded—any every time it did, another hunk of his innards went out of control. We sprayed caviar around like buckshot and sandpapered the rest of his stomach lining off, then rubbed it down with gin, slightly laced with brandy. And then all of a sudden everything stopped. They took him home in a cab. When the doctor came, Joe was whipping around the last turn in the lane that leads to Life Everlasting.

That is, the spiritual side of Joe was. The rest of him, including us, they buried. Only three bartenders, a night club owner and a girl he used to know in high school but had been too busy to look up lately attended.

It was a short life but it was fun while it lasted.

DEAR J.B.: FEEL WE ARE ENTITLED TO CALL YOU J.B. SINCE WE HAVE BOUGHT ONE CAN EACH OF THE 96 VARIETIES OF RIDDELL SOUPS. WHY ONLY 96 KINDS? WHY NOT THINK UP 4 MORE & MAKE IT AN EVEN HUNDRED? LETTER FOLLOWS. RT&MW.

November 13

Dear J.B.

Have just opened your Cream of Spinach Soup. Spinach is extremely discouraged-looking. It does not meet the soup-eater half-way. It looks like grated blotting paper. It seems to be hiding in the bottom of the soup bowl.

Once this soup is placed in the mouth, it's greatest fault becomes apparent. Your Cream of Spinach Soup tastes very strongly of spinach. Any schoolboy knows that spinach is the most unpopular vegetable to come out of the truck-garden. Expecting to market a soup made of unmitigated spinach shows a die-hard disregard for human nature, let alone a lack of originality. Why not brighten the taste with mint leaves or a dab of rubber cement?

Yours in a spirit of constructive
critcism,
R.T. and M.W.

MEMORANDUM FROM THE DESK OF THE SOUP-TESTERS

To: Riddell
Date: 14 November

Who is dicing your carrots for Riddell's Vegetable Soup? We have never seen such sloppily-diced carrots. They represent a new low in carrot-dicing.

We make no pretense of being professional carrot-dicers. However, as vegetable soup consumers, we have as good a right as any to pass judgment on carrots which irresponsible soup-makers may foist upon us.

The first principle of carrot-dicing is: THE CARROT MUST BE DICED WITH THE GRAIN. NEVER ACROSS THE GRAIN.

We have before us a plateful of Riddell's vegetable soup containing 27 pieces of cross-grain diced carrots. It is a shambles. Do you think that people don't care how their carrots are diced? Do you think soup-eaters will swallow anything?

Yours with the grain,
R.T. & M.W.

Dear J.B.:

Your Cream of Kidney Bean Soup seems to be nothing but unadulterated mud, and not very good mud at that.

Our dog, who is quite an authority on mud, flatly refused to eat it, even when mixed with horse meat. In fact, the dog now refuses to eat anything out of the bowl in which we gave him Riddell's Cream of Kidney Bean Soup.

As for your product presumably containing whole vegetables, i.e. Mushroom Soup, Lentil Soup, Broccoli Soup, etc., we have measured them against three other leading soup brands. Here is the result—what we might call a "Souper Rating":

MUSHROOM SOUP
CAMPBELL'S	53
HEINZ	51
VAN CAMP'S	50
RIDDELL'S	11

We have no comment. The figures speaks for themselves.

Dear Mr. Riddell:

It says on the can that the Riddell Soup Company has been making Chicken Noodle Soup for 49 years. When you hit the half-century mark, we suggest that you get a new chicken.

As for the noodle, we are enclosing it with this letter in case you want to give it another whirl. The remainder of the can was filled with a cloudy water tasting faintly of leeks.

We advise that you immediately discontinue this ineffective mixture in favor of a more lusty and romanti concoction, such as:

Eggplant Bisque
Cream of Spanish Moss Soup
Mock Oyster Soup
Bat's Wing Broth
Liver Noodle Soup
Cream of Radio Script Soup

Here is the recipe for Cream of Radio Script Soup:

Take the blood of two ripe radio writers.
Add half a dozen ideas by the sponsor's wife, and an equal number of aspirin tablets.
Stir in two dozen ears of corn, picked on a Hooper night by the dark of the moon.
Fold in three interminable commercials.
Shred $20,000 in large bills, and one finely diced agency man.
Bring to a simmering boil, adding musical bridges and exclamation points to taste.
When thoroughly cooked over a national network, this recipe will make enough Cream of Radi Script Soup to turn the stomachs of 20,000,000 potential Riddell Soup customers.

We know this is surefire stuff, J.B., because we got the recipe from you. But you'll have to find some new radio writers to give you their blood. Tashman and Welles have been squeezed dry!

Yours with croutons,
R.T. and M. W.

Berle's Producer Details TV Theatre Just for TV

By ARTHUR KNORR

Television will reach its peak and the results will approach perfection when TV theatres are constructed for TV alone. The TV Theatre will be designed to overcome existing obstacles and to elaborate on the potentialities of the medium.

Arthur Knorr

The answer does not lie in converting existing theatres to the medium. This, at best, is makeshift. The ideal TV Theatre will have many features that are taken from the theatre and the motion picture studio, but added features designed for the production of a TV show will aid the actor, director, cameraman, technician, musical director and all participants concerned, as well as giving the audience a better view of the performance onstage and video screen simultaneously. Many programs require an audience, and their applause in the theatre or studio greatly affects the home viewer and is most important to the performer, inspiring him to work all the harder.

Following are some thoughts that might be incorporated in a TV Theatre. Visualize a platform, not unlike an orchestra pit lift or elevator, that is divided into sections that will raise or lower hydraulically above and below stage level and so arranged that these sections, each with a camera on it, will give a variety of shots from different levels. These platforms will also permit more than one camera to dolly in and back at the same time and provide area enough for cameras to change positions. The platform sections will be controlled in the same manner as a stage lift and, when set at stage level, will permit cameras to dolly in on stage proper if such a shot is desired.

Other Fine Points

The stage will have a turntable or revolving stage as well as stage lifts made in sections to raise and lower above and below stage level. These lifts can be devised to raise and lower at each end creating ramps at any angle desired, which will add to many visual effects and eliminate the construction and handling of elevations. Moving platforms or mobile stages can be operated by motor, bringing on present scenes of great bulk and weight. These platforms can work up and down the stage or from right to left and used singly or in groups. A treadmill or a traveling stage can be used for effect and practicability. A bridge or catwalk can be so constructed that the dolly camera can take overhead shots and travel as well. The same catwalk can carry spotlight operators to follow action on stage.

The wireless cue transmitter will be used to warn and cue the stage manager who, in turn, will give the direct cue to the stagehands for opening and closing curtains, setting and striking scenes, flip cards, effects, etc. It will expedite all phases of the program to have as many operators, as possible from the control room, where the producers, director, technical director, electrician, video and audio engineers are located during a performance.

The auditorium will be built so that the first row of seats for the audience is well above stage level. This will improve sightlines and give the spectators a better view of the stage. The control room will be placed under the audience, and the monitors will be so arranged that the directors can without effort see the entire stage action and call his shots, and the performer will be able to see the director during a performance.

The wireless cue transmitter be used to great advantage. The stage manager can carry the wireless cue receiver on stage with him as a member of the cast and cut actions or cover emergencies that might arise without the knowledge of the audience or viewer.

Process screens for rear projection, a large screen (like that in the Center Theatre) to enable the theatre audience to see the show as aired, spotlights mounted on dollies on platforms, special sound and rigging equipment—all this, and more, will be part of the TV Theatre for TV alone.

Humorist's Warm Slant On That New Robot--TV

By HARRY HERSHFIELD

Let us exhibit the metamorphosis, the now robust and all encompassing indoor man. One who lives and breathes in the small, closed spaces. But first, prefaced by the yarn of the husband who never came home earlier than 3 a. m. To the surprise of his family, he arrived home one evening at midnight— and explained: "This is the only place that's still open." Who can deny that his domicile, these days, isn't the clearing house of cabaret, vaudeville, drama and forum. Television has corralled mankind's moans and groans and parked them in your parlor. And when video has really taken his stranglehold, the only movement on the streets will be actors, musicians and Milton Berle on the way to studios.

arry Hershfield

Yet, no matter whose program is on, there are millions of distracted souls still treking our boulevards. Not that they haven't television sets—they're the one with sets that don't get all the stations. Home Squeak Home. They're the ones who don't watch the commercials, thereby having time to go out and purchase what is being advertised.

The change in man's entertainment came too suddenly. Overnight our homes have taken over the burdens carried by outdoor strolling minstrels, park gatherings and stadiums. Previously, every man's home was supposedly his castle. The lord of the manor decided what and who should enter its sacred precincts. Certainly no salesman could jump the moat and present his wares right in the middle of your drawing room. No wonder one performer boasted: "By being on television I'm able to get into some of the finest homes." Forgetting that he is probably the guy they were referring to, when it was said: "Television has proven one thing—that those, before, who shouldn't have been heard, now shouldn't be seen."

However the die is cast. Video has more than "squatters' rights" in your living room. You may get up and leave, if it pleases you—but science stays.

For a long spell there was a period of compromise between the outdoor entertainer and your inviolate sanctum. That's when we looked out of the window and bridged the protocols of living. Rarely has a street singer or "oompah band" been invited in, for their small change—out of the window went the pennies.

Or, trying to get a coherent meaning to the newsboy's raucous "wuxtra paper—read all about the blah, blah, blah!" It was an annoying age, but at least there was line of demarcation in privacies and social standings. It has now been battered beyond recognition. Home life may not be destroyed, but it will certainly not have any second-hand value. Not that the average home life was so precious a thing. What has come into it in the main, via television, is progressively superior to that which stewed in its own fat, in the average intelligence within the four walls. In many instances, it was a case of; "We have absolutely no purpose in life and whatever happens to us, is velvet."

Critics All

Television has been a windfall to the average life. Very few thought they'd have the privilege of walking out on an opera singer, at the Met—no less being able to switch a dial and presto, out of your life and home goes basso ournoted.

Our complaint only is that the transition came too fast. In one swoop of science our small but homey quarters has become the headquarters of police lineups, armories of sports, world events, stages of every conceivable movement known to the exhibitionist. Closeups of growing animals are amplified to make your domestic pets scurry for safety. No wonder Konrad Bercovici is such a television addict: "It fascinates me, these little people on the screen with such giant voices."

It is written: "The meek shall inherit the earth"—but it wasn't meant to come to him all at once, concentrated in a 16-inch screen.

Posters flash: "Join the Navy and see the world." The owner of video set can now make a sucker out of Monte Cristo, when he bellowed, "The world is mine!"

There are rebels, of course, to this newly harnessed homelife. Illustrated by George Shelton, when he moaned: "I slept all night in a saloon." Couldn't you get a room?" "Yes, but not with a bar in it."

This higher, less expensive medium of personal entertainment, television, has now brought the bar into the home—only for friends and neighbors, of course. Video first broke up homes, via the tavern. Now it's back again

More and more one sense the impact of this modern, animated magic lantern on our lives. It gives you everything and you, poor soul, must decide what is good, bad and indifferent. A montage of all going on at one time would be more in keeping with our whirling brains and twisting dials, than concentrating on some quiz program that makes you ask the question: "Why was it produced?" But no matter, you have a set and room to keep it in, and a bed handy when on the verge of collapse. No wonder the woman asked the doctor if he could give her something to make her eyes look red and weary—"Why should people think I haven't got a television?"

Tie That Binds

Call it forced home life, if you will, but keeping families together, no matter how, is for better things to come. Anyway, a television group has learned to obey one order—the dictum of silence. Something that all the signs in a picture theatre hasn't been able to enforce.

So important is silence in the home, when a video drama , that it is recorded here for the first time, this unknown fact: An irate wife, bent on murdering her husband, sitting in front of the television, killed him with a bow and arrow, so as not to make too much noise while Helen Hayes was speaking on the screen.

Though the members have all evening to watch the video performance, they can hardly wait till they are over. Not so they can go to bed. No. From that second on you have the normal abnormalities of filial coherence. Blood is thicker than water and families are always punching each other on the nose to prove it. The program's over and the group goes into action. The mechanical genius called television has performed a purpose never attained by any previous robot. It stirs life and argument and ambition into every homebody who has a "talented niece, funny uncle and acrobatic brother superior to Dinah Shore, Ed Wynn and Dagmar."

Home is what you make it—and television can make or break it. That clever little gadget is a mechanism new in only one way. Television is only sound and sight combined, exhibited for years by talking pictures. Invention has simply brought it into your home.

Now that we have paid just cheers to this great transfer, let us weigh it for its worth, as of now. True that many superlative programs have been siphoned into your parlor. The forms and productions are improving by leaps and bounds. But the real test—the genuine millennium of entertainment for television will come when this question can be answered in the affirmative: "Would you leave a comfortable room, dress up and go out and pay for the show you've just seen in your home?" Personally I believe video will attain that standard, not only with certain programs, but in the general offerings.

As in the original movies and talkies, anything that moved or barked held you spellbound. Television has the chance to pick the best of past lessons and I'm sure it is grabbing it faster than any other medium. Television is the most democratic firm of entertainment so far devised by man. There are no privileged classes, no matter how high the rent of your home or the size of your drawing room. For in television there is no such thing as balcony and orchestra seats.

No doubt there will always be reactionaries regarding the value of this modern invention. As in the case of the salesman trying to sell a store owner a certain machine: "With this machine goes a certain powder. When you see an insect in your place you put the powder in this box, turn a knob, then squirt the powder on the insect and it'll kill it." "Listen," came the answer, "If I see an insect I'll step on it and kill it." "That's also a good idea, my friend."

Reactionaries or no, television is here to stay, as do the neighbors in your house, to get in on the snack and coffee, after the programs. And when they, in turn, leave to go to their homes, it isn't the television shows they are discussing—it's your only serving a snack and coffee that's the topic. Human nature came before the other inventions.

Benny's TV Ratings

By JACK BENNY

Hollywood.

Some of my friends just can't understand how I can spend so much of my time sitting home glued to my television screen. But in this day and age I see no reason why a person needs to go out and spend 15 or 20 dollars for a night's entertainment. I didn't do it before television, so why should I do it now?

Of course, when you're in the business, you naturally look at television with a more critical eye than the casual spectator. You try to analyze each program, and ask yourself why they did what they did, and what, if anything, could have been done to improve it. In fact, last year when I first realized that I would soon be performing in the medium myself, I began to make notes, putting down my reactions as I watched the various shows. During the year I accumulated quite a collection of these notes, and it might be of interest if I passed on these observations for what they're worth. Some of the reactions I had while watching TV last year:

"YOUR SHOW OF SHOWS" . . . Jan. 6: The sets alone must cost a fortune. Imogene Coca so talented—and that Sid Caesar makes you laugh every minute he's on. And he does it for an hour and a half every week. But who cares—he's bound to wear himself out.

MILTON BERLE SHOW . . . Feb. 13: Tuned in five minutes late and missed the first three costumes. High-class humor throughout. One first rate bit where Berle says "makeup" and a stooge runs out and hits him in face with a sack of flour. This is very funny for people in the trade, but may be too subtle for general public.

BURNS & ALLEN SHOW . . . March 1: Very relaxed and enjoyable show. Jokes are funny and situation cleverly worked out. Gracie's stage presence, timing, delivery and sense of comedy are exceptional, and George Burns blows the finest smoke rings I've ever seen. Since then I heard that Burns & Allen originally started out to do an hour show, but George's lungs couldn't take it.)

YOU BET YOUR LIFE . . . April 19: Very entertaining audience participation show. Everyone seems to be having good time and Groucho is terrific. (How anyone can give away money and tell jokes at the same time, I'll never know.)

SPACE PATROL . . . April 24: Cute show for the kids. Situations imaginative but juvenile and not sufficient to hold interest of adults. Can't get too excited about it, but may like it better when they send me my Disintegrator gun. Also, because of the early hour it's on, I've had to miss three of the last 50 shows.

JIMMY DURANTE SHOW . . . May 30: Durante can't do a bad show as far as I'm concerned. What a personality! (I guess I'll have to hate him, too.)

BOSTON POPS SYMPHONY . . . June 11 . . (Guest soloist, Jascha Heifetz.) Here is television at its best. Such beautiful music. Orchestral numbers magnificent, but am a little disappointed in Heifetz. He still has to fake the hard notes. And he definitely isn't resined up enough. It's a shame—there's talent there, if it could only be developed. Even so, it'll be years before he's ready to play at weddings. The audience apparently agrees with my criticism. He's just finishing his number, and they're all standing up and applauding, but not one of them is throwing money on the stage.

RED SKELTON SHOW . . . Oct. 11: Red's opening show, and he comes over very good on TV. Sets are very simple and give him a chance to be his funny self. Enjoying show very much—but who dreams up those soap commercials? They put a half a box of soap in a washing machine full of sheets. Anyone knows when you're doing sheets you have to put blueing in, too. Red Skelton's show is an example of the recent trend for major programs to originate from Hollywood. The list now includes Groucho Marx, Burns & Allen, Danny Thomas, Eddie Cantor and Jimmy Durante, to name a few. And I myself am happy at the prospect of being able to do the rest of my TV shows from Hollywood.

ALAN YOUNG SHOW . . Nov. 22: These sketches are very well planned and executed. They start easy and keep building to finish. This is strictly visual, and might become monotonous, if not for Alan's physical expressive- and great talent for pantomime. A lot of older comedians are jealous when a young kid like Alan becomes a success. Personally, I can't see it that way. What do I care if Alan is younger than I am; I know that few years he'll be older than I am. They've got to pass me sometime.

WOMEN WRESTLERS . . Dec. 18: They really put on a show. Love the way they pull hair and throw each other around. First two falls very exciting and—oh, for heavens sake, this isn't Women Wrestlers—it's the Milton Berle show.

This takes us up to the present time, and as you can see during the past 12 months television came into its Naturally, in a field as young as this there is still room for improvement, but the foundation is solid and the possibilities seem unlimited. I'd like to make some predictions for the year ahead, but I'm not getting paid for this article, so I'll close with two words, Bendix Automatic.

CBS' Teacher-Turned-Comic On TV and the Kids

By SAM LEVENSON

My schoolteacher friends have taken me to task. They tell me that TV has had a decidedly detrimental effect upon the study habits of children; that homework is done shabbily, that youngsters do not read books; that they do not take music lessons seriously. For all this I am being held personally responsible since I am a former schoolteacher myself now working on TV.

Sam Levenson

They tell me further that we are developing a generation of passive recipients of network-tailored entertainment which is best appreciated in the dark. The TV tube has replaced the sun and the armchair has placed the scholar's bench.

The great disaster didn't begin with TV. It goes way back to the phonograph. Just as man had to sew his own clothes before the machine age, so man had to make his own music before the Devil and Thomas Edison got together. And the kids are not the sole victims. The adults also went from playing and singing to listening, and now to watching. We get annoyed with our children mostly because they won't move over and let us watch the screen.

I honestly do not blame the kids for enjoying TV. It is the most colorful and exciting medium of entertainment that the world has produced. And what is most important it is the most accessible. Let's face it. How many ballet companies did I see when I was a kid? How many good dramatic performances? How many good acrobats, singers, magicians?

Television's offering is rich, stimulating. Its weakness is its mixture of high and low standards, of high art and foul cheapness, its cultural irresponsibility. But that's the way the world is mixed up. It is the duty of the parent and the school to help the child to select. We have picked the books we want our children to read, the clothes we want them to wear, the movies we want them to see, the museum we want them to visit, the friends we like them to have, the hours we want them to keep. Now the entire world is on the screen in our home. We can exclude the mediocre by flipping the dial—if the kid doesn't let out a yell.

Hop Aboard 'Hopalong'

The kid won't let out a yell if the teacher assigns a particular show for a book report. I wonder how many schools capitalized on the series recently shown on "Swiss Family Robinson" or "Monte Cristo" or "Robinson Crusoe" or "Huckleberry Finn." How many schools have worked out activity programs related to the cowboy's role in the conquest of the west, to Indian culture, to the building of the railroads, to the covered wagon, to life on the great prairie? "Space Cadet" or "Captain Video" can be the springboard for a lesson on astronomy. "Stop the Music" can be played in the classroom.

In order to convert the passive, entertain-me-attitude in the kids, the school assembly programs should imitate the better TV shows. There is a natural desire in the kids to imitate "Mr. I. Magination," to make puppets, to put on an "All Star Revue." My kid does it at home—why not in school?

The commercial sponsor is interested in the good will of the public. He will respond to mass pressure. If you stop buying his toothpaste and let him know why he will listen to reason.

As a former schoolteacher I happen to know that there is an abundance of educational material on film either owned by the Board of Education or easily rentable. The Board of Education should be able to spare a few teachers to educate the networks, to bring them the films, to send them lists of suggested material. The same people could send the newspapers a listing of "Preferred Televiewing for Your Child."

I have little hope that the municipalities will come up with the money necessary for maintaining education channels. It would be cheaper for educational institutions to sponsor shows commercially, to buy spot announcements directed at the kids and their parents, to feed special shows onto a giant screen into the assembly hall.

Each Parent-Teachers Assn. should have a TV committee to barrage the networks with resolutions, threats, and advice. Every classroom should have a TV bulletin board with suggestions for seeing the better shows.

It is entirely possible to educate TV. The FCC is on our side.

'Amateur Hour' Sets New Show Biz Pattern With '100% Charity' Junkets

By TED MACK

Thanks to the new application of a Biblical truth, that old bugaboo the charity benefit show has come forth in all its glory. It has indeed become a thing of beauty and a joy forever.

The Biblical truth is, "cast thy bread upon the waters . . ." etc., meaning literally that generosity in good faith pays multiple compound dividends.

What happens is that we of the "Original Amateur Hour" have a sponsor who usually pays all our expenses so that some local charity can take 100% of the boxoffice.

Following the Biblical admonition we and our sponsor, Old Gold, have been "casting our bread upon the waters" all over the U. S. A. We have delivered our "real" 100% charity shows gratis to help worthy causes from coast to coast, and the "bread" has multiplied and returned beyond measure.

As far as I know, this is something unique in our business. It is, I believe, something healthy for any business. Certainly it has been a Godsend for all the hospitals, welfare groups, medical research funds, etc. etc. gaining financial support through our "real" charity benefit performances.

The "Original Amateur Hour" benefits, of course, are our out-of-town radio originations presented publicly with an additional two-hour stage program.

Among other things that multiply and return to us two-fold are lasting gratitude and an entirely new regard for our sponsor and his product. There is no disguising the truth that we "cast our bread upon the waters" to popularize Old Golds and the more it multiplies, the happier we are to multiply our donations to charity.

My purpose in elaborating like this is that I think the plan reflects a new credit on show business and the people who combine goodwill with advertising. Certainly it offers us a new slant on relationship potentials between show business, charity establishments and the manufacturer who seeks lasting public respect for his product.

The new slant, I think, ought to be welcomed alike by advertisers and by all the show business folks who assume the burden of soliciting money for worthy causes, from promoting War Bond sales to staging shows to raise funds for orphan asylums.

There always will be pleas for aid from the needy, sick and helpless. Medical research always will require private support and it will always hold true that when a local or national charity needs money, the dramatic way to get it quickly is to bring in Eddie Cantor, or Bob Hope or Jack Benny or any of the numerous other stars who attract crowds.

You will never have a substitute for show business glamor in any charity drive, but what has been accomplished in the past almost seems incredible when you consider the limitations. It is interesting to speculate on what the compensation to everyone might have been if all such effort had the backing of a public-spirited sponsor and the all-out enthusiasm of a beneficiary who received the show for free.

By way of report we, and I mean the "Original Amateur Hour" and our sponsor, the P. Lorillard Co., have been "casting our (100%) bread upon the waters" now for nearly four years.

With pleasure we remember our benefit sellouts from San Francisco's Cow Palace to Madison Square Garden in New York, and we don't forget Cincinnati, Memphis, Columbus, Ohio, Chicago, Houston, Minneapolis, New Orleans or any of the other 100% benefit cities in between. That they all remember us is something sure. They all asked us to come back again.

What we have learned about "real" charity shows is something to ponder. The Biblical truth in our case has paid off in more ways than anyone could predict.

One rather remarkable thing is that we have made close friends of organizations that previously shunned show business.

In Boston, for example, a leading New England clergyman stood with me at the microphone and told our audience, "I don't advise the use of this product, but for those of you who smoke, I ask you to consider the advantages of Old Golds."

In Milwaukee something new was added to lighten and brighten the burden of exploiting our charity benefit for the City of Hope Hospital. It was the unsolicited support of welfare workers from Milwaukee's Methodist Youth Fellowship of Epworth Church.

By "casting our bread upon the waters" in Washington, D. C., last January to help reactivate the USO-Camp Shows, our charity performance at Constitution Hall included "amateur" appearances of Senators, Congressmen, military notables and foreign ambassadors. President and Mrs. Truman, together with Cabinet members and Supreme Court Judges, were in the audience.

It might be noted for the record that nothing comparable to our Annual V.I.P. 100% charity shows has been staged in Washington.

Credit for the success, we know, goes to our belief in the truth that generosity brings its reward. We have good reason to feel that official Washington has far more than a passing admiration for the "Original Amateur Hour" and the people who make Old Golds.

Here and there across the United States we have found that the 100% charity show idea sells tickets where ordinarily no tickets could be sold. For instance, we played Detroit last April during the transportation strike.

Previous benefits, they told us, hadn't been too successful in Detroit. Everyone except the ticket-selling committees predicted a failure. The show's beneficiary was Boysville, juvenile rehabilitation settlement.

Our show, nevertheless, was a capacity sellout. It happened to be the season's only charity show sellout in Detroit, and remember the Olympia Stadium where we played has 16,000 seats.

And I think we have learned something new about local cooperation.

The full 100% humanitarian policy behind our benefit shows seems to have kindled cooperation where little or no cooperation existed.

In Los Angeles, where every benefit boasts a dozen movie stars in person, the feeling was that no one would patronize an amateur show like ours. But the Variety Boys Club co-op committees got behind our show and packed the Shrine Auditorium.

Newspaper publishers usually wary of benefits have championed our "real" charity deal to the extent that our show frequently has been advertised by rival radio and TV networks.

Welfare, social and religious groups, we have discovered, campaign more intensively for our show because of the full measure of boxoffice profit we turn over to charity. There is no mistaking this. In city after city our performance has given advertising and other concessions hitherto deemed impossible.

Speaking of "firsts" we were invited to stage a benefit in Kansas City to help raise money for the Baptist Memorial Hospital Building Fund.

The invitation itself was extraordinary. After all, you don't have to be too old to remember when the suggestion of a tie-up like this might have been called preposterous.

It must be something of a commentary on Amateur Hour-Old Gold sincerity of purpose that our Kansas City friends erased all remnants of prejudice and asked for our show.

What happened after that in Kansas City was a typical example of "casting bread upon the waters" and reaping the harvest. Everyone concerned, of course, participated in the harvest.

Ticket-buyers seemed thrilled with everything in the show.

The Hospital Fund received every cent of boxoffice revenue.

Two block-ticket sales alone amounted to $6,000.

The Hospital project likewise received nationwide recognition via our TV and radio network announcements.

Scores of committee workers and salesmen made new contacts during the advance campaign.

And for us, we were given the opportunity to advise Kansas City about the difference between a treat and a treatment.

Certainly our way of "casting bread upon the waters" will be remembered favorably in Kansas City for some time to come, thanks again to the "real" charity idea behind our 100% benefit shows.

It's a wonderful way to practice the Biblical truth, believe me.

TV's Headache—Censorship

By HARRY BANNISTER

(Gen. Mgr., WWJ, Detroit)

Detroit.

1951 for TV brought halcyon days. For AM they were not so healthy. Television firmed up at levels high enough to induce a lot of chop licking, but in radio there was wailing and gnashing of molars.

There are no sales problems in TV. Orders cascade over the transom, and trying to stop them is like trying to dam a flood. There is a problem in pyramiding costs which might make trouble one of these days—not soon.

The big aspirin consumer in TV is the danger of official censorship. If it ever comes it will be due to the persistence of those who ignore and flout the mounting resentment directed at offensive and blue material.

Talent which is more than good enough to be entertaining, even when scrubbed clean, resorts only too frequently to routines better suited for niteries and smokers than for TV. Too many booful babes are personally conducting tours of viewers' eyes far above the mammary foothills, up to heights where no St. Bernard should lug his keg.

It may sound bromidic but unless the industry cleans up its own house, but quick, the job will be done by outsiders who are itching and burning to tackle and shackle television. Yet, a lot of amateur "experts" yell bloody murder every time a televisor inches towards decency. That is TV's No. 1 problem, and it is very real and imminent. Radio has shown an amazing determination to survive the holocaust of TV competition, but many reappraisals of values, costs and methods are in order. Those who bravely stick their heads in the sands are kidding only themselves. The lads hold meetings in expensive hotels, slap each other on the back between drinks, lie about their billings, then go back home and fire 10 more guys. You can look for more of the same in 1952.

Tele's 'Home B. O.' Held Inevitable

By E. C. MILLS

Hollywood.

In and around show biz for nearly 50 years, I was just as excited as the rest when moompitchas came along, to finally replace, to our astonishment, living flesh upon most of the stages of the country. I was around when radio burst on the scene and grew like a beanstalk, then the talkers, and now television.

Sound came to the "movies" and saved them, sight comes to radio and promises to save it.

Many will, with me, remember when a primary concern of the film producers was the rate at which stories and literature were being consumed—in the day of the "daily change" at theatres. They will remember how difficult it was to teach exhibitors to play pictures for a "run."

Of necessity, production was slowed to the point that writers could keep up with it in their writing of original (sic) material, adopting the available literature.

Now the creative writing talent of the world is confronted by the newest and most gluttonous monster ever imagined, to consume their material, after it has again and again, with monotonous repetition digested and spewed out upon the public all the ancient gags, stage procedures, hokum, corn, and timeworn movies to which it has been able to gain access. The monster's name is "television."

In the city in which this is written there are seven television stations. They are on an average showing schedule of nine hours per day. Most of the shows are quarter-hour efforts. At one of the stations a single act is on four-five hours, but except for this, the cooking programs, and the ancient movies (interspersed now and then with a "newie" from England) the shows run 15-minute or less periods.

Devours Ideas

It takes no Einstein to calculate that these stations, between them, need material (written) for about 30 shows a day. Seven days a week, this means about 210 15-minute scripts. Suppose there were no TV stations anywhere but in the town where I'm writing this—there aren't enough writers living to create 210 fresh or nearly original 15-minute scripts per week.

We all remember the time:

(1) When it was enough that the "movies" just moved—that was enough to entertain us.

(2) When it was enough that the earphones attached to a crystal radio brought us distinguishable and identifiable sound.

(3) And now, that it is enough (or nearly so) that we have the movies (free) in our living room through a process called "television."

The time must come—and let us pray that it will not be long delayed—when, for the high spot in the afternoon (the matinee) and the primary show in the evening—there will be available for television audiences the finest show that the best talent in America can produce.

Such entertainment must be in the form of a motion-picture—no other form is practicable. It must be paid for by the audience which receives it—free of advertising any form of commercial pitch.

For these two principal shows of the day television can be made richly and profitable self-supporting not only to its own operation, but to the writers, actors, producers and distributors of the pictures played.

For the rest of the scheduled day in the TV station, let there be the cooking program, the news, the "interviews," the "public service" items, etc., etc., ad nauseum.

Like it or not—it will come to that. Whether it proves ruinous opposition to films, or not, it will come to that. Just as the talkers displaced vaudeville, so, inevitably, will television become natural opposition to movies. There will never be 100% saturation and there will always be the yen to go out. So there is room for both. But a variation on the "home boxoffice" is inevitable.

Everybody's in the Act

By HARRY ACKERMAN

(CBS-TV V.P., in charge of Network Programs, Hollywood)

Hollywood.

That's a fact, you know. Television is surely the entertainment medium of Mr. Everyman. The butcher, the baker, the candlestick-maker—all are street-corner experts, would-be panelists, or have their own local 15-minute programs of household hints. This is a powerful force that has invaded your home and mine—and likely for keeps—because this is the new Show Business. This is a kind of theatre in which we can all participate to a degree that was unknown when prestidigitators performed their feats at the Palace or when the silver screen thrilled us once a week (Gallup's family average) at the local Loew's.

But if we are all potential participants in this exciting new entertainment force, certainly it must be admitted that the biggest hams of all are the business executives who combine to form the somewhat-convoluted backbone of the new Industry. These might be classed into three major categories: Prophets, Performers (non-professional), and Paying Participants.

The Prophet classification comprises a number of different types, but all easily identifiable. For example, there's the fellow in the picture business who still and steadfastly refuses to recognize that there is such a thing as Television, and doggedly predicts that next year motion pictures will be your Most Collossaly-Best Entertainment. At almost any hour of the day (between nine and five) you can run into a Brooks Bros. suit and a pork pie hat on Madison Avenue, and you will learn that without question Hollywood can never be as important a television center as New York, that "live" is the only thing. And of course you have met the character who, having been in and out of a dozen get-rich-quick schemes involving the sale or development of motion picture film for television, dubs as idiots all those who don't write off the network concept as passe and go all out for syndication. Trouble is, as I see it, that a good prophet can lead the people—but most of these chaps merely have latched on to a shred of the larger truth, and will lead only themselves into forests of confusion because of their emotional unwillingness to recognize that this medium is all other media, and something more.

As to Performers (non-professional), the medium seems to hold a peculiar kind of magic for businessmen and television executives. You scarcely can tune in a local station these days without having old Clint Cronkwell, one of the Big Happy 12 Used Car Dealers in your area, sell you his mechanical tatterdemalions in person—or watching kindly Doctor Schmobein perspiringly force his new dog food product on sundry sullen and unwilling beasts. One the network side, we unexpectedly developing some most unlikely performers.

One expects a certain amount of this sort of thing from the Paleys and Stantons and McConnells, but the pull of the medium makes itself felt deeper than that echelon. There's a fellow I know named Weaver, who occasionally plays in featured roles on "Your Show of Shows," and right in my own organization there's a fellow named Robinson who's been known to step confidently before the cameras. Unfortunately, he found out that he looks best in color, and he goes into a very pet if you so much as mention the word "copper" in his presence.

But where the prophets and the non-professional performers contribute something to the excitement and vitality of the industry, the same cannot blanketly be said of the Paying Participants. For there is a segment of this classification that can cause some real harm to the creative development of television. A typical representative of this group is either an advertiser or an agency man: although he had two years at the Tuck School of Business Administration, his wife once acted in a little theatre group in Milwaukee, and this qualifies him to make like a producer in this magical new kind of show business. If he thought for a minute that he could possibly master the intricacies of staging and camera manipulation, he would try to direct his program, but usually he is forced to settle for "producing" the script. This consists initially of reading the script aloud in the board room, with the advertising manager reading the part of the Hero and the agency man reading the role of the Villian. (On rare occasions the President of the Company will deign to read a small part that inevitably turns out to be the key motivation of the plot). Seems a harmless enough procedure, you say? Sure, if it stops there. But too often the client script-reading session results in our self-styled producer administering rewrites that make of a potentially-good show a pallid one.

Yes, everybody's in the act. And it is resulting in a new kind of theatre, in which Mr. Everyman helps set the tone—a kind of theatre featuring as a sock opening, Hal ("Dimples") Block grimacing across a table at Dorothy Kilgallen, and where a big finish is Arthur Godfrey demonstrating how to carve a turkey.

By the way, did you happen to see that fellow playing the part of a network executive in a recent Lucille Ball-Desi Arnaz show? Sure. Who else? . . . And, why not? This is Show Business, Boy!

NOTES OF A CLICHE HUNTER

By SIDNEY REZNICK

I am a young man and I have been to many places and I have heard many things, and of the things I have heard these are my oldest friends and I shall never tire of them.

"I know the money is short but we have to keep our operation flexible."

"Let's be clever, fellas. Let's get those big laughs without using jokes."

"Frankly, I see this show taking place in an all-night cafeteria where anything can happen and usually does."

"My idea is to build up a family of characters the audience will grow to know and love."

"I know the money is short but I'm a growing comic and you're gonna grow with me."

"Sweetheart, I like the way you think. We'll get along fine. Our chemicals mix."

"Fellas, you've got great jokes in the script but they're not me."

"I know the money is short but you can knock this thing off in two days and be free for another show."

"Let's make this a great program, fellas. The sponsor's listening tonight and I understand he's high on renewal."

"Certainly I'm aware you've written for Hope, Benny, Allen, Bergen, Fibber & Molly, Durante and Burns & Allen, but without a sample how do I know you can write for Buddy Floogelman?"

"I know the money is short but there's no tension on the show."

"We've worked out a great character for the comic—he's a well-meaning shmo who louses everything up, but it all comes out right in the end."

"Fellas, you've got there a script, now let's switch the hotel clerk's gag so that I get it. Remember, the people expect me to be funny."

"I know the money is short but we have a new headwriter and his agent is crowding us on the budget."

"I'm thinking out loud, gentlemen, I'm just throwing this up for grabs, but as I see the problem in the round, I'm convinced we ought to mother-hen the production premise of increased integration and we'll be 90% home on the overall picture."

OOPS! WRONG ARTICLE!

'It Doesn't Come From Knowing Somebody Big at City Hall'

By MAX LIEBMAN

Some people lead untroubled lives, and others get mixed up with cultists. I belong to that second unhappy group. The cult that swept me into its fevers was devoted to the worship and vocal exaltation of the word "format," a word to look out for. It bites in the clinches.

Max Liebman

The word came into my life some hundreds of TV hours ago, right after "Your Show of Shows" made its first appearance on the orthiconic tube. "Format" laced the words of people who spoke well of the show, and when you're listening to praise you don't object to the needless phrases that tag along after it.

Friends and relatives threw the word into their rhapsodies. I think it showed up in a glowing newspaper notice. It was recurrent in exchanges with people met in cafes and theatres. But their encouragement and well-wishes were so beguiling that I didn't listen for the throb of the "buts" and "howevers" implied in the very use of the word "format."

The gist of all the nice talk was: "You've got something there. All you need is a format."

Like the Oxford English Dictionary, I'd gone slogging along in the belief that format was a word that described the size and shape of a book. But I like change, and if the word had become ambitious to marry into the world of entertainment, I'd play along. I'd accept it as synonym for "structure."

Taking their word "format" for what I suspected they meant by it, I agreed heartily with these advisers that revue required clever routining. Routining is the art of shaping the show to the best possible presentation of its top value, also it must achieve this emphasis without harm to the rest of the show. The perfect routining of a revue makes every number seem exactly right.

Trial and Error

Years of struggle had taught me that the revue form format cannot be had by executive fiat, bribery or knowing somebody big at City Hall. It comes by sweating experimentation, trial and error, and when you've found it you know you've been in a fight. Its design is governed by so many conflicting factors that it can never become a formula, operated by fixed rules.

You can call the result a format, but you still have to do the work all over again for next week's show.

Starting with such considerable values as Sid Caesar and Imogene Coca, as stars, and a staff of dependable writers, I was on fairly solid ground for the planning of each week's show. But each one had to be shaped to changing influences. Caesar and Miss Coca kept expanding their range, and the old forms had to be discarded. Guest stars brought varying talents to the show, and created new problems of emphasis.

Though holding to the conventional revue outline, "Your Show of Shows" underwent constant shift and change. But the well-wishers came back, after a few weeks, with congratulations:

"Now you've got your format. You're all set."

They were talking sweet talk, so who wants to argue?

The show enjoyed a successful season. Another, then another. Most of the players continued in support of the stars, the creative staff remained constant, but the show itself followed a graph of change as jagged in outline as the Appalachians. The variety of guests alone brought a weekly element of surprise into each revue.

Then, not long ago, the ~~cultists~~ came back and said, "Why don't you forget the format? Every week it's the same."

For the first time I stopped to wonder just what they mean by format. Well, they mean anything and everything. The word is a new coin in the currency of contrived speech, and can be changed into smaller coins to buy any little penny's worth of convenient service.

To some it is no more than a symbol of identification, like the dog in the phonograph advertisements. It is used to categorize the work of a painter, applicable either to the genre or the composition of his work. I once heard it used in reference to a candy wrapper to include the design of the type that expressed the candy's fidelity to the requirements of the Pure Food and Drug Act.

And so I exorcise it from my vocabulary, and take myself back to fundamentals. I shall call a revue by its right name, which is a workmanlike blend of song, dance music and related lively arts. If anything like a format inserts itself into the proceedings, it will be there as one of the help, never again as a boss.

WALKING ON WATER

By KEN MURRAY

Long ago, a wise man said that "familiarity breeds contempt" and it was accepted as an axiom. Of course, the sage reached this conclusion back in the medieval days when man, seeking to find the mystic facts of life, gazed into a clear crystal ball, instead of using the more modern methods of straining his optic nerves by looking into a kinescope.

Ken Murray

True, we all know that, in some cases, familiarity does breed contempt, especially when you're married to it. But with home television audiences, the reverse seems to be true. Any enchanted evening when they see a stranger across a crowded room, they're apt to turn to another channel.

Yes, TV audiences like to play favorites, and favorites are made by being on the networks at regular intervals once a day, or week, instead of occasionally like once a month or six times a year. What I'm trying to bring out is that television entertainment, like radio, is no longer a diversion, but a habit. And habits are formed by constant repetition.

To bear out the truth of this observation just look at the ratings of such top shows as Arthur Godfrey...Uncle Milty .Ed Sullivan. .or the latest sensation, Red Skelton.

So many of the top radio and motion picture stars seem reluctant to go all out for TV.. Their usual expression is that they'll try it once in a while, "just to get their feet wet." Well, just getting your feet wet is no way to learn to handle yourself in a tricky channel unless, of course, you feel that you can walk on water.

When I first talked to friends in show business about going into TV, they advised me to lay off as they said that putting on a show every week was murder. They had me so convinced that, when Budweiser signed me two years ago for a show every other week, I thought it was a swell break. Now there would be two full weeks to line up things for the next show. It would be easy. Well, anyway, that's what I thought.

Head First, Brother!

However, I soon found out that this was not quite the cinch that it promised to be. Of course, there was a longer time between shows, but that just meant a longer time to build up a severe case of pernicious video ulcers. There was plenty of time to write a script, rewrite it, then throw it out and start all over again. Yes, my script boys took this right in stride, except that I got a little tired of holding writing sessions with them in Bellevue Hospital.

And, with the stage, orchestra and camera crews, the same sort of genteel pandemonium prevailed. They had plenty of time to work on other shows, so that each time we came into the studio, we were greeted with the same indifferent enthusiasm as if we were a roadshow playing one-nighters. We had to get acquainted all over again.

Familiarity plays such an important part in a smooth show. The team that works with you has to get familiar with your methods, timing, and learn the tricks and signals of cutting and adding when necessary. If you have to teach them over again at each show, it really runs into money, because no matter whether you go on once a week, or once a month, you're still only allowed about the same time in front of the cameras and orchestra.

So remember: If you're going into television don't just get your feet wet, but dive in head first, because this is one business where familiarity breeds success.

Learning the Tricks Of Telecasting

By JIMMY POWERS

Q. What's the trick of successful sports telecasting?

A. Use short words at long intervals.

Too many years ago I started work on the Muskogee (Okla.) Phoenix. The job was small and the pay was smaller. I shot th works in a barrage of manuscripts, all aimed at the big slick magazines. I used words I read in the literary publications, not sparing the French idiom and the classical reference. My thesaurus was well-worn—and I didn't sell a word.

Around that time I got into an argument with one of my fellow workers. We began to throw fists. He planted a fairly good one on my eye. Next day a relative observed: "You were talking when you should have been listening."

Those lessons, learned the hard way, had great influence on my thinking. Talk is essential on occasion, but talk is mostly cheap. In television you must beware of talk for it's not as essential as it is on radio.

For years radio sports broadcasters used the machine gun technique in describing sports events. A guy could get away with anything as long as he kept the stay-at-home excited between commercials. I was amazed on more than one occasion, when sitting next to a radio spieler, to hear him give it the "color" treatment.

Television is actually than radio on the sports commentator. It's easier on his throat and i some sports, such as football where the zoomar lens gets into the backfield, it's an aid to accuracy in describing debatable decisions by the referee or other officials.

Having a monitor in front of you in the press box gives you two sets of eyes, your own and the scientific eyes of the camera. All a TV reporter has to do is tell the truth. Anything else is superfluous, and resented. The fight fan at home is a bit of an expert. He knows a right cross from a left hook and he wants to be left alone. Adjectives are no good in the middle of an exciting round.

In my book, a TV sports commentator is only at the microphone to aid the viewer. Heck, your eyes are as good as mine.

(The author is sports editor of the N. Y. Daily News in addition to being a sports, radio and TV broadcaster).

TV's Recurring Controversy: Live vs Filmed Programming

By ADRIAN SAMISH

Let me make my position clear at the outset. I do not believe that all television programs will be produced on film any more than I believe that all television programs will eventually emanate from the east coast, or the west coast. I believe certain shows are done better "live" while other shows are better when filmed. I believe that it is the dramatic show which lends itself most advantageously to filming and I believe that dramatic shows can be produced better on film than they can be done live. By dramatic shows, I mean situation comedies, mysteries, and the theatre type presentation such as condensations of plays, dramatizations of short stories and so forth.

In my own shop (Dancer, Fitzgerald, Sample), four of our television programs are presently being produced on film. They are "The Lone Ranger," western; "Beulah," situation comedy; "The Stu Erwin Show," another situation comedy, and "Mystery Theatre," a detective story. We have found that, by filming these four programs, we have been able to produce them better at a most reasonable cost and we have been able to furnish those stations not connected by any network with a print which by far exceeds the quality of any kinescope. In addition, we have in each show a series which be repeated at any time and which can be used for theatrical showings in motion picture houses, both here and in foreign countries.

Let me develop some of these advantages, as we see them, in film a dramatic show.

Let's take scripts first—every show starts there. Budget filming calls for at least six to eight scripts prepared in advance of shooting. You work ahead and, because of this, your agency producer, or supervisor, has time to make sure his scripts are as good as he can make them before they go before the camera. In the case of a series revolving around central characters, he can make certain that his constant characters, once defined, stay in character over the series instead of varying from week to week as happens in many live shows which usually wind up being written on a week to week basis.

Still on the subject of scripts, the writers, themselves, can use their fullest imagination in developing their stories, knowing they are not confined within the four walls of a small studio. The budget need be the only limitation and not the limitations of his live studio. We prefer to put the entire show on film and take our story anywhere.

Then There's the Retake

What about the playing of the script? Using film, the producer need have no worries about "fluffs", the misreading of lines, or the mishandling of a piece of business. A retake, or two, and the scene is perfect, or, if your budget limits the amount of retakes you can shoot, when it gets to the cutting room, the scene can be cut and matched with preceding action so as to be right.

What about cost? The average, well produced half-hour "live" television show today is costing in the neighborhood of $13,000 per copy net. We feel better quality of over-all entertainment can be had on film for the same money. And, if you are as convinced as we are that these shows will bear second playing at a later date without appreciable loss of rating, you cut those costs right in half. If your film is coming in at $13,000 net per half-hour and your second playing isn't costing you anything, you have cut your cost exactly in half, or $6,500 per telecast and I don't know how you can do a half-hour production more economically than that. And any repeat fees which film unions may legislate down the road can't amount to much more than a small percentage of your original cost of production so you will still be ahead on second showings.

One more point regarding cost advantages. When an advertiser puts a program series on film, he is creating for himself a tangible product he is making a capital investment. It is conceivable that, when he is completely done with running the series on a network basis, he can sell this product outright for syndication and get himself a good portion of his original investment right back again.

Other Plus Advantage

Another plus for film is its advantages in creating your own station lineup. If a network can't clear the stations for you, you have the opportunity of going out and buying your own time on the stations and spotting your show independently of the networks. When new stations in new markets open up, as they eventually will, you have a program already paid for in a handy-size container to ship and run at the time you wish. Once you put a program on film, it becomes a permanent possession to go to work for the client as he sees fit and when he sees fit. It doesn't evaporate into thin air as does a "live" show. It can be used in new markets almost indefinitely. In every instance the film print will look one hundred times better than a kinescope and the local audiences will respond accordingly and, incidentally, a 16m film print is less expensive than a kinescope.

Can a film print ever give you the clarity and "reality" that live television gives you? Indeed it can. A show especially shot and printed for television today can give you the same quality as a "live" show. The old films now being run on television certainly don't—they weren't shot for television in the first place and the prints, themselves, are either old and worn out or are prints made from a negative which was made from an existing print not the original negative, or fine grain.

There are two good reasons for getting less than perfect reproduction from a print from a negative especially shot for TV. In the case of a 35m print run over the network from New York, or Los Angeles, where there is 35m projection equipment, make sure the film is rehearsed before it is shown. If the network engineer knows the program before he rides gain the night of the performance, he'll know where to shade and where to leave it alone. If he doesn't rehearse the film beforehand and doesn't know the show, itself, he'll try to shade it as it goes by him and your low key scenes, or night scenes, will be given too much light and vice versa.

The other problem is the 16m projection equipment in most of the stations outside of New York, Chicago and Los Angeles. Most of the stations have the cheapest projection equipment they can get away with and until they get some up-to-date professional machines, 16m prints aren't going to give the quality showing that's been printed in them. However, even under their worst circumstances, they are ~~many~~ times better than kinescopes, in my opinion.

There is no question in my mind of the value of film for television usage . . . more and more you will see film come into its own on television. It's one more technique the agency producer, or executive, must learn if he is to give his client the fullest measure of service.

TV Per Thousand Cost Down 27%

Despite steady hikes in television network time rates and persistent squawks from sponsors about sky-rocketing production costs, a new survey being conducted by the CBS-TV research department reveals that the average gross cost-per-thousand homes for cream evening time periods is actually down 27% in 1951 over the corresponding period in 1950.

Reason, according to the web, is the boost in number of homes reached by the average program, which is up almost 90% during the last year. In addition to an expansion of over 4,000,000 sets in the circulation figures, the opening of new networking facilities during the last year has also brought the average CBS nighttime show within the reach of many more markets and thus many more homes. Two factors combined have permitted CBS to offer a much lower cost-per-thousand—and this despite the fact that only one new station has been added to the total national lineup this year.

Web bases its study on American Research Bureau figures for November, Publishers Information Bureau statistics for October and VARIETY's yearly roundup of talent and production costs for video programs. Comparing all evening shows on the air of either half-hour or hour duration in November, 1950, against 1951, the web found the 34 shows last year had a gross cost-per-thousand homes of $18.33. This year, the web has 41 shows in that category, for a cost-per-thousand of $13.30. Cost is now lower, consequently, by 27%.

The Pen In The Other Hand

By WORTHINGTON MINER

(Producer of CBS-TV 'Studio One')

Any good script for television is written with two pens; the one in the other hand is a camera. Good camera work is an art of storytelling; it is not a sequence of attractive, or startling shots. A director who starts admiring his own shots is like an actor listening to his own voice. Both are in danger of losing their jobs. Good camera work is more honest and more subtle than that. Writer, director, and camera man in television must work with a single mind toward a single goal, or the result will be faltering, confused, or, at best, mediocre. In spite of the fact that television has introduced the only important innovations in camera usage since D. W. Griffith, a very high percentage of its camerawork is hit-or-miss, or meretricious, or both.

There are, I believe, three basic reasons for this. First, the industry has grown too fast. Many active directors have never had an opportunity to learn the fundamentals of their craft. Second, television has been the victim of many false shibboleths that have grievously retarded its natural growth. Third, an important segment of the industry is controlled by a standard of technical adequacy, rather than by a standard of creative imagination.

In the early days of experimental television—the years from 1939 to 1947—all persons working in the medium had time to analyze, to discuss, and to experiment with the use of cameras. In my own case, I handled a camera for months before I began to train the first cameraman in the studio. I knew what it could do and what it could not do. For almost a year I directed an average of 10 hours of television programs per week—a total of approximately 17 individual shows in five days. Everything from news to variety! Each director who came in in those early days was given a comparable novitiate. All basic principles of accepted camera usage in pictures were explored. We found out which principles coincided; and also found out which did not. We learned what could be done with a television camera that could not be done with a film camera. We experimented with moving cameras and fixed cameras, with scenes played out without a cut, and with others where a cut was made every few seconds. By the time we were through, we knew at least the capacities of the equipment with which we were working. We also knew that every move we made was collaborative. There was no one big enough to put on a good television show alone. That could only be done by a good crew.

How many directors today have ever handled a camera, or a mike boom, or a dolly? How many know what the problem is of maintaining focus with a 135m lens, when the actor or the camera is asked to move? How many have tried it? How many know the right lens to use for an extreme closeup? How many know the psychological reason for insisting on the use of a 50m for a two-shot, rather than a 90m lens—or vice versa? How many know the fundamental concept of the base shot, the orientation shot, the balanced reverse? The industry is full of people with fine instincts and fine imagination; very few have ever been given a chance to learn the basic principles of their trade. This must be done before television truly comes of age, before it releases the full creative ability of its best talent.

The illogical fact is that, in the face of all these handicaps, television has already achieved a camera standard that seriously threatens Hollywood's primacy. In certain areas it is leading the field; Hollywood is already lagging. Again and again in the last year, I have talked with television directors who have recently seen a feature picture in which the camera work by television standards was deplorable. More and more often sturdy advocates of Hollywood tradition come to New York and secretly voice amazement at the ruthless, but none the less effective, way in which television camera work is outdistancing the West Coast in flexibility, finer rhythms, and the greater release of spontaneous acting talent. Television has no reason to apologize to Hollywood. But is it doing as well as it can?

For over 10 years television has suffered from a number of glib catch-words and phrases that, in the absence of thought or knowledge, achieved wide acceptance. "Television is merely radio with sight added." — "Television is a closeup medium." — "Television is a motion picture theatre in the home." The trouble with all these cliches is that none is completely false. Television reporting a football game is very close to radio with sight added. But an effective dramatic script for television has little, if any, generic resemblance to an effective dramatic script for radio or pictures. This does not, except in a most remote fashion, affect the use of cameras. The statement that television is a closeup medium has critically affected camera work. Where it has been accepted, it has resulted in dullness and monotony; where it has been ignored, it has resulted in confusion. The fact is that good camera work demands, for full identification, being closer to an object, or person, than would be necessary on a projection screen in the Music Hall. On the other hand, this is only a matter of degree, not of quantity. A series of closeups on television is as monotonous visually, as a persistently fast pace is monotonous vocally.

How Wrong Can You Be?

Most harmful of all to good use of value of itself alone; only in television is only "a little motion picture theatre in the home." This has led to the unhappy conclusion that television cameras should be used like motion picture cameras. Nothing could be more limiting and more wrong. A television camera operates at 30 frames per second; a motion picture camera at 24. A television camera, by virtue of its being instantaneous, has no reason to be concerned with matching shots. It can, therefore, cut during a pan, and increase pace; it can catch action on the run—not riveted to an artificial pause in a li; it can alter cutting schemes on the air to take advantage of the unusual performance, or to exclude the weak performance. But most important of all, every television camera is mobile. It permits an actor a flexibility in emotional scenes impossible in the composition of shot from a fixed perspective.

I have said before that television was collaborative. Only a crew working together can achieve the finest results. But someone must be the final authority. For anything better than mediocre competence—

TV'S NEW CLARION CALL: GO WEST, YOUNG MEDIUM

By J. L. VAN VOLKENBURG

(President, CBS Television)

Anybody who was watching his television set on the afternoon of Sunday, Nov. 18, saw just about the most dramatic demonstration yet that television is truly transcontinental, and for keeps. During the premiere performance of the new CBS-TV show, "See It Now," cameras were stationed on New York's Governor's Island and San Francisco's Telegraph Hill. At word from Edward R. Murrow, narrator for the program, first one and then the other camera was brought into play, and viewers found themselves moving coast-to-costs literally with the speed of light first down New York harbor, past the Statue of Liberty to the Narrows, then swooping across San Francisco Bay to Alcatraz Island; now a glimpse of Manhattan's craggy skyline, and then a panorama of San Francisco's imposing hills. It brought home to this viewer, at least, more graphically than ever before, that the eye of the television camera is now ready to look upon the whole span of the continent, and that broadcasters must now assume the obligation of providing programming that takes into account this transcontinental sweep.

For a long time now, CBS Television has been looking forward to assuming just such an obligation. From the very beginning it's been clear that to provide top programming, both coasts must be taken into consideration as production centres. Until this year, the geographical span of television was so limited as to make New York the inevitable source of almost all network television programming. The majority of television set owners could be found within reach, such cable facilities as existed were linked together with New York as the fulcrum; and besides, of course, theatre, nightclub and variety talent as well as government officials, literary personalities, educational facilities and so on, providing the major grist for television's mill, are more thickly clustered around the Big Town than anywhere in the country.

Now all that is changed—all but New York's position as a major source of talent, that is. With the opening of transcontinental facilities, and the promise of their considerable expansion before the end of next year, television need no longer limit itself to looking to New York as the sole production centre—indeed, has the clear obligation to see that cable facilities are used as a two-way street.

And that instantly, of course, means Hollywood. It means that Hollywood can now become for television, as it has long been for motion pictures and radio, a rich and vital source of fine programming; that its enormous wealth of talent, its matchless production knowledge, can be fully used.

CBS' West Coast TV City

As I mentioned before, CBS Television has long been looking forward to the day, as have all broadcasters. CBS Television has already taken substantial steps toward providing the framework within which west-to-east network broadcasting can best function. This progress can be charted by a look at CBS Television City, now rising on Gilmore "Island," in Los Angeles. When Television City opens next fall, you can write the date on your calendar as the point in time when television first received production facilities precisely geared to its immense demands.

This will be the first complete television production unit ever designed exclusively for the purpose. Every stick and stone and pane of glass that goes into Television City's building has been planned with one purpose alone: to provide the best and most efficient staging of live television to be found anywhere in the world. The actual layout of the unit, of which you'll be hearing more and more as time goes on, provides a marvelously fluid and flexible floor-plan, able almost instantly to adapt itself to large or small productions; facilities for both audience and non-audience shows are being taken into consideration; and the whole complex of production—scenery construction, painting and storage, prop and wardrobe handling, rehearsal halls and offices for production and administrative personnel—all are housed comfortably and efficiently within the unit.

Moreover, the horizontal building plan, which has become almost a trademark of California industrial architecture, is especially well suited to the assembly-line techniques that make for the most efficient television production, and which assure an even flow of materials to the point where they are needed, with a minimum of cumbersome, costly transportation. One of the very substantial gain we look forward to will be a slicing of production costs, simply through this rise in efficiency of production flow.

Film Studios Not Answer

But by far the most important gain, of course, will be in the wealth and variety of network live programming from the Coast made possible by Television City. One of the popular misconceptions about television production so far has been that Hollywood, with its vast acreage of motion-picture studio space, could automatically start churning out live television from some of those same sound stages. This unfortunately is not true. Hollywood's magnificent facilities were designed for film production, and as such will probably never be surpassed. And where television uses film, it's inevitable that Hollywood will be the first place producers will look, both for the facilities and the skills that film production calls for. But at the moment, the supreme need in Hollywood (as just about everywhere!) is for adequate live production facilities, and these are what Television City was designed to provide. At the moment of writing, there are roughly five to seven hours a week of live network programming—on all the networks—originating from the Coast. By the end of 1952, CBS Television alone expects to be broadcasting 17 to 18 hours weekly from Television City, which will give you some idea of how greatly production-tensions can be eased by this one forward step.

Our appetite has already been whetted by the Hollywood-originated live shows we're seeing now: Jack Benny, Burns & Allen, Alan Young, Frank Sinatra. The thought that we'll be seeing more and more through the next year is something to look forward to. And it's not just the quality of talent alone; the mere geographic dispersal of production is a healthy thing, since it allows each great production-centre to develop and exploit the things it can do best, and stimulates a greater and more colorful diversity of programming.

So we look forward to seeing Hollywood given its full opportunity as a creator and originator of live network programming, just as it now is the source of the most creative and successful film television, with such triumphs to its credit as "Amos 'n' Andy," "I Love Lucy" and Gene Autry.

As to the eventual division of labor between live and film television from Hollywood, it's still anybody's guess. We've seen some wonderfully successful experiments in both, and you'll find just as many advocates for the one as the other. Admittedly, live television brings you an immediacy that film can't provide. Admittedly, film permits a scope and range that live can't handle. What's wrong with either, if you like a balanced diet? Ultimately, the decision rests not with the broadcasters, not with the producers, but with the same old jury that always makes the final decisions in the show business—the jury that nobody argues with—the audience.

Will Radio-TV Regulate Itself, Or Will Gov't Take Over Job?

By SEN. EDWIN C. JOHNSON

(Chairman, Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce)

Washington.

The capacity of television as a new and immeasurable form of conveying thought has unleashed a whirlwind of impatient proposals which may keep Washington spinning until Government interference in television and radio "reluctantly" is deemed to be the only way out.

The crux of this dizzy spinning is best epitomized in the bill sponsored by Sen. Benton, which creates a National Citizens Advisory Board to ride herd on radio and television programs.

In spite of the fact that this country is generally devoted to the enduring principles of free enterprise, we have witnessed in the past decade or more the constant encroaching of Government into activities which might better be left to private initiative. I don't like it. Free enterprise and private initiative have contributed directly to the spectacular expansion and healthy prosperity of every phase of life in this country and should be vigorously supported and defended by thoughtful Americans rather than abandoned.

At the time Congress adopted the Communications Act of 1934, wisely and cautiously it limited the authority delegated to the FCC to protect the public interest and assure the greatest benefit to society of this new art in its entirety without in any degree permitting federal interference in the operation of stations.

There are those who suggest that television operators are ignoramuses and that producers are insensitive to the impact of their shows upon the people. Such attitudes are not realistic. The television operator must have as much common sense and be as alert and competent as any well qualified educator or newspaper editor. We must not forget that radio and television are among the most competitive of all industries in America. It is the good clean program, free from gutter-talk, which enjoys a wide audience and it is the good program with excellent audience response which attracts the business. The sponsor and the broadcaster know this. They realize they must give the listener and the viewer what is fit to be seen and heard in his home. It is that simple.

Radio and television are plagued by the identical problems which haunt most human endeavors—the widely varying tastes and habits of the American people. We are a fussy and demanding lot; extravagant in our expectations and exacting in our appraisals; quick to reject and very hard to please. It doesn't take us long to get fed up and when we are through we are through.

One day a comedian's slapstick is acclaimed as outstanding; the following week, the same comedian's characterizations are unacceptable. What causes this violent swing of the pendulum from the one side to the other? It is as difficult to explain as the ever changing styles in milady's favorite outfit.

Everyone in and out of government familiar with the widespread and universal acceptance of TV, has had a sympathetic regard for the numerous vexatious problems that confronted stations in preparing programs, particularly in the early days. TV was, and still is a comparatively new industry requiring new techniques. Its operations were and are costly, its productions necessarily limited. The industry was and still is growing by leaps and bounds. In such a dynamic device mistakes are bound to happen and they continue to happen. But, is that reason for Government interference?

During this period of growing pains, rumblings are heard from many quarters—Parent Teacher Associations, discriminating parents, men of the cloth, and law enforcement officers in righteous indignation complaining about horror stories, off-color jokes, low necklines and barroom scenes.

Such criticisms are those necessary ingredients which add maturity and stability to an industry whose good will and success necessarily depend upon an effective relationship with the general public. Indifference towards well considered protests and failure to remedy the evils mentioned, inevitably lead to the downfall of those who remain obstinate.

There may be a sprinkling of licensees with a "get-rich-quick" complex who are on the make and thereby give a black eye to all radio and television. Fortunately this type do not last long. They pass with the first stiff breeze. No industry, regardless of how popular, is ever so secure that it can trifle with good will or do a poor job. It has been my observation that the radio and television operators on the whole endeavor to keep their programs purposeful and free from taints of things which should not be seen or heard.

To conform to the standards of good manners, good taste, and good programming, it is not necessary to destroy the sparkle in exciting real-life drama and spirit of melodrama. It does not require necklines to be raised until the poor damsel is choked; it does not demand that all humor should be attired in Sunday clothes before it is televised. These things require an application of common sense and straight thinking. Nor will any Government edict remedy any deficiency in program quality. Yet, there are those who think so.

Without questioning the effectiveness or objectiveness of Advisory Boards which function in various fields under various types of sponsorship, we should not confuse them with one given official sanction through Federal legislation in such an unique field as radio and television. No matter how glowing or appealing it may appear at first flush, the Board suggested for the radio and television field, stripped of its glitter becomes a sort of snooperduper Monday-morning-quarterback society to be superimposed upon the FCC and the radio and television industry.

In spite of the assurances that the Board would be purely advisory, how would the Commission dare to ignore its recommendations? How long would such a Board be satisfied to remain merely advisory? Would it not be natural for it to want to throw its weight around once it thought it had its bearings? To whom is the broadcaster to listen when the suggestions of the FCC and the Board are in conflict? Would a licensee, in order to "play it safe" feel compelled to submit his program in advance to the Board? And why not? This I submit is gross Government interference! This I submit is federal censorship! The FCC is able, and has sufficient authority, to clear up what gross deficiencies currently prevail. The Commission has broad direction in reviewing the general overall program structure of licensees in order to determine whether a rounded service in the public interest has been rendered.

In the final analysis all the Government crackdowns, or restrictive laws or regulations that can be concocted or contrived by the FCC, or Congress, will not be sufficient to assure the type of programming that will satisfy all groups, and at the same time provide the incentive for the development of this art to the unlimited horizons which exist.

Hails New TV Code

I firmly believe that the proposed Television Code being considered by the telecasters offers a realistic and workable medium for adjusting whatever deficiencies may develop. Personally, I like it the way it is even if the industries lawyers are throwing rocks at it. However, it may require some modification, some give and take before it is wholly acceptable, but it deserves every opportunity to be tried out as is on the basis of trial and error. This is the American way. When all is said and done, isn't it the composite character, integrity and sincerity of the broadcasters and telecasters who have been imbued with the basic fundamentals of propriety and decency to whom we must look for whatever restraints are necessary to be invoked? I have the utmost faith that the majority of broadcasters are built of solid stuff, and I know they will either correct bad programs through a code or make way for wiser and more prudent men. One cannot legislate honesty. One cannot legislate character or quality. Television deserves the opportunity of expanding without Governmental interference. The American people are entitled to enjoy freedom of expression at its best and the freedom of expression is at its best in radio and television.

Radio's Happiest Veep

By CHARLES C. BARRY

(V.P., Radio Network Programs, NBC)

An ad in VARIETY last September, relative to the 25th anniversary of NBC, listed me as "still radio's happiest veep." I still subscribe to both —VARIETY and the appellation.

The only thing that would make me happier would be to have been its happiest veep 25 years ago also, and not just another kid in the neighborhood with a crystal set. If this 25th year at NBC is the Silver Age of radio, 25 years ago was a Golden Age. That first network broadcast from the Waldorf-Astoria on Nov. 15, 1926! Dr. Walter Damrosch, Will Rogers, Weber and Fields, and so many others.

Radio called to its mikes the best that were to be had: Jessica Dragonette, Harry Reser's Cliquot Club Eskimos, B. A. Rolfe and his Lucky Strike Orchestra. Soon the greats of vaudeville and the stage were coming in—Eddie Cantor, Ed Wynn, Fred Allen, Al Jolson, Jimmy Durante, Jack Pearl, Joe Penner, etc. They brought with them the rich American humor that had been born in the early 20th century; here with radio, which had an initial hookup of 25 stations in NBC's first broadcast, they could take it to all the people and make it truly national in character.

It is interesting to me that the 25th year of network radio was the year the Radio branch of the industry decided that the ghost wouldn't have to be given up after all. A year or so ago the prophets of doom were saying that exciting, powerful and glamorous television would crush unexciting, weak and dull old-fashioned radio. Little thought seemed to be given by some of these sidelines quarterbacks to the possibility that radio—ever a versatile and flexible medium—could adjust to the situation, realistically realign itself to face today's situation, and emerge bigger and better for it.

The change came with the realization that the public hungered for such entertainment as "The Halls of Ivy," "The Big Show," "Bob and Ray," the return of Martin and Lewis and Eddie Cantor to radio, and so on. All these programs, and many more, were put on the air and the fearmongers were put to rout.

All radio had to do was (1) continue to give the public something worth listening to and (2) face up to the adjustments made necessary by television.

In 1952 NBC Radio expects to supplement its star roster with such names as Katharine Cornell, Helen Hayes, Shirley Booth, Dinah Shore, George Montgomery, Roland Young, Errol Flynn, Doris Day, the First Drama Quartet, George Sanders, Rosalind Russell and Robert Montgomery.

This adds up to some healthy years ahead for radio. Anyway, I would like to have another look at the record 25 years from now, and reminisce about the Golden Days of radio back in the Silver Anniversary days of NBC.

Vigor Mortis

Only Hysteria and Panic Threatening State of Radio Today, Clouding Facts of AM's Strength

By FRANK WHITE
(President, Mutual Broadcasting System)

By common consent of a great many alleged experts in and out of this field, a dreary epitaph was chipped out of cold granite some three years ago. The inscription ran like this: "Here lies the mortal coil of network radio . . . once the greatest medium of communication known to man . . . smashed to pieces by a comet."

White

The boys with the mallets and chisels were working under the light of that comet, and it may have been the blinding glare in their eyes that explains why their lettering didn't hold up very well. The fact is, radio seems to have pushed over its own tombstone—and about all that's left of that premature epitaph today is the middle section: ". . . the greatest medium of communication known to man . "

What's more, I suspect those words are going to keep right on applying to network broadcasting for years to come. Why? Because what radio is doing these days is quite the opposite of rigor mortis, as diagnosed by the experts a while back. Today it is

It doesn't take a long trip into anybody's memory to recall the early days of radio, when radio itself was the brightest star in the sky. Most of us first got acquainted with radio when it was a squeaky contraption of crystals and headphones called wireless. We saw it catch fire and sweep the nation and the rest of the world. And we saw it soar through space as the glamorous plaything of industry. Sure, it sold goods for industry—sold them as goods have never been sold before. But let's not forget that, for years, otherwise hardheaded businessmen often lost sight of the profit-and-loss columns in the stardust and tinsel of "Showmanship On the Air!" There was dazzle in radio in those days which has a clear counterpart in the stuff that TV comes wrapped in today—and it's the mature emergence of radio, from those razzle-dazzle days, that explains its real vitality in the current scene.

Dishpan Hands Vs. Channel 5

In one very clear sense, the arrival of television means the end of a honeymoon for radio. A flashy new blonde has moved into the master bedroom and radio has changed from blushing bride to a different kind of status around the house. If that sounds like bigamy or worse, I'm sorry, but actually radio now has to earn her marital rights to bed and board.

I am utterly convinced that one, simple truth applies to almost every phase of radio today: There is nothing wrong with radio's present—or its future—that honest, intelligent work can't cure. And I'm also convinced that the converse of that truth applies with equal force: There's nothing wrong with radio—today or tomorrow—that jittery panic can't make worse.

If I were to recite all the practical steps we have taken at Mutual to instill "Vigor Mortis" into radio today, I would repeat a lot of what has been duly reported in VARIETY. But I do want to stress the " -ventory" part of our operations over the past two and a half years.

Like a crossroads general store, we itemized our entire stock in hand . . on counters, shelves, and in the back room . and we subjected every single item to the cold eye of impartial, impersonal appraisal. This meant rating everything we had and did—facilities, policies, programs, sales strategies, everything—in terms of assets and liabilities. And it took special concentrated effort to determine, for sure, which were assets and which were liabilities.

For one example, consider our station line-up. For the youngest of all networks to become the largest of all networks, we obviously had to affiliate a larger proportion of low-power stations, in smaller markets—as well as the high-power outlets in big cities. Now, "coffeepot" used to be the kindest word anybody applied to a great many Mutual stations—but before we were finished with the work begun in '49, the practical, collective power and impact of all our smaller stations was thoroughly researched and established as one of our greatest strengths . . out beyond reach of TV, you know. So much so that other networks are now wooing exactly the same sort of stations themselves, in job lots.

But liability-conversion is only part of the story. We also had to improve our assets . . . clarify them . . . and sell them to our customers—keeping an eye on advertising conditions and advertisers' needs in all three operations.

Now the real point of all this stock-taking at Mutual is, I believe, the point of the whole story of radio today. We have geared this network, as efficiently as we know how, to the needs of American business and the listening public, 1951. And the other three major networks are more and more closely in step with the ideas I have touched on here. All of us are dedicated, as never before, to the practical concept of winning and holding the largest audiences on earth—through still better listener service—and improving industry's contact with these masses—through still better service to advertisers.

Cinderella Was a Stepchild

By SEYMOUR N. SIEGEL
(President, National Assn. of Educ'l Broadcasters)

A favorite sport in the first two dozen years of radio broadcasting was tossing of barbs between educators and commercial broadcasters. The success of radio conferences was often judged by the amount of heat generated between educators and the representatives of commercial broadcasting.

Radio, like the movies, had sufficient glamor to provide a perfect whipping boy for some educators, and the arguments were constantly reiterated, i.e.—the best hours on U. S. radio were given to advertising programs (as if this were a great sin); hours assigned to education were shifted around like freight cars, without notice; experimentation was virtually non-existent; and the claims of minorities were flagrantly disregarded.

On the reverse side of the coin, some commercial operators and especially some sections of the trade press, consigned educational broadcasting to the role of stepchild . . . alternating between contempt for education's admittedly small audiences, and even suggesting that non-commercial broadcasting was not part of "The American System of Broadcasting."

In the past year of TV hearings before the FCC, some components of commercial broadcasting have even suggested that educators didn't enjoy the legitimacy of being a stepchild. Another relationship . . . perhaps a more brittle term . . . was employed.

In the past two years, there has become discernible a melding of viewpoints, which has tended to smooth down the rough edges of extreme differences.

On the part of educational broadcasters, they have discovered that they are not faint, isolated whispers in the communications world. They have come to realize, for the first time, that they are a part of something of great significance in America. Not only has there been the recognition that their role is important, but for the first time there is now some prospect of their controlling their own destiny.

Two years ago, a group of educational broadcasters restated the nature and goals of educational broadcasting, and set up a practical, forward-looking operational pattern for action.

For years gone by, educators on the air tried only to serve the needs of limited groups, especially those that had already been exposed to the benefits of considerable formal education. It was at Allterton House, on the campus of the University of Illinois, in 1949, that educational broadcasters determined to make direct and frequent efforts to reach and serve the greatest number of people. "Audience promotion" and "audience research" became words in the educational broadcasters' syllabus.

Our society requires different services from two kinds of institutions. The educational institution and its broadcasting arm have the

'OPERATION FRONTAL LOBES'

By DAVIDSON TAYLOR
(General Production Executive, NBC-TV)

Did you hear of Operation Frontal Lobes when "Pat" Weaver proposed it? It was and is a big part of a big plan for television to enlighten the people of our country, including those who are working i TV.

Operation Frontal Lobes is a tactic in a strategic plan at NBC-TV. The plan is no secret. It was declassified from the word go.

Situation: The American people deserve the best that can be offered them, and need to be prepared for their role of world leadership.

Material: Television has a greater power to communicate fact, information, cultural and educational content than any other mass medium so far devised. Television is a medium of reality; reality is inexhaustible and fascinating.

Problem: How to use television for the enlargement of the horizons of the American people.

Definitions: Entertainment and education are not mutually exclusive. No true education fails to entertain. People never embrace boredom. Education, a bad word to a few people in the industry, is the right word for describing what television should do to enlighten (BBC's word). Television must inform, instruct, stimulate the curiosity and move the heart. The NARTB TV Code has a definition of education which I wrote and quote: education with television may be taken to mean that process by which the individual is brought toward informed adjustment to his society.

Exclusions: Television is not to be expected to supplant the school, the home, the church, books, newspapers, or magazines. Television has its own job. This job is not persuading Americans that the real world is absorbing. Americans are already persuaded.

Personnel advertisement: The people who have the ability to convey reality via television i showmanlike manner are going to be in demand.

How To

VARIETY likes to build 'em up and tear 'em down, but VARIETY always is warm-hearted toward what's professional, what's new, what's better, what's different. So, here goes my long neck out again. This implies no bravery. Nearly everybody's neck i television is stretched up, craning at the horizon.

There are three ways that we are going at our job of serving the American public with the materials of fact on NBC-TV:

1. The conventional public service program, which is better on TV than it ever was on radio: news (Camel), discussion (Meet the Press), education (Mr. Wizard, 47 stations), sports (Westinghouse football), special events (the signing of the Japanese Peace Treaty), talks (Mr. Wilson's reports on production), controversy (The American Forum), religion (Frontiers of Faith), experiment (American Inventory), and above all, Today, which is unconventional.

But this kind of program, may it increase, is not enough in television.

2. The conscious introduction into the stream of entertainment programs of educational and cultural elements. There's opera on Your Show of Shows. There's ballet, and the best, on Kate Smith's Evening Hour. Berle has the Vice President talk about Lincoln. Howdy Doody plans a children's newsreel.

Fred Coe does semi-documentaries because they're good showmanship. Henry Aldrich conveys the types of English sentence. We the People fights narcotics. I haven't the space. You have the idea. So do the NBC-TV producers.

3. This is what was first called Operation Frontal Lobes: A plan whereby each period in Class A time will carry at least once a season a show designed to entertain, yes; to reach the maximum possible audience, yes; but designed also to enlighten, that is, to inform or to enlarge. Educational or cultural.

Whatever happened to Operation Frontal Lobes? First, we have so far had not a single advertiser who turned his back on the idea. For you see, advertisers, agencies, talent, agents must help. This is no job for a longhaired shop which has to do everything against the tide. The salesman has to be in on this. It is to the self interest of American advertisers to be a part of Operation Frontal Lobes. To this moment we have only one major Lobe sustaining, but we have had seven sponsored. Sell them all. The shows then get more attention, reach more people, are better produced, and make money.

By the end of 1951, NBC-TV will have done 13 Frontal Lobes in the format of commercial American television.

We're working on shows about What Is Man, The Birth and Death of the World, Communications, The Face of the Earth, Westward Ho, and The Life of Lorenzo de'Medici.

You won't become educated by just seeing all this; you will be educated some, and with pleasure, but education after all is in part the enlargement of the horizon of ignorance. Television can not only teach us something; it can help us realize what wo do not know and need to learn. A good thing.

Are Clients Human?

By WILLIAM F. CRAIG
(Associate Director of Television, Procter & Gamble Productions, Inc.)

The general impression that clients always prefer to give rather than receives pats on the back or kicks somewhere else is, like most general impressions, false. Clients are what might be described as corporatively human. And being human, they enjoy a little adulation as well as the next guy. That's why the verdict of the Sylvania Television Awards Committee in granting Procter & Gamble an award for "Fireside Theatre" was so gratifying to all of us in any way involved with the show. The award singled out "Fireside Theatre" for high praise not only in the overall category of the use of creative television technique, but specifically for the best film made for television.

Inevitably, the success of a television show or any other program of entertainment must be its success in entertaining. Since both radio and television are mass media, reaching millions of listeners, a successful show must entertain large numbers of people—the mass audience.

It goes without saying that good taste, decency and social responsibility are necessary for any successful program. No sponsor who expects to remain in business very long will knowingly offend large segments of the population. But neither will he bore vast numbers of people by failing to entertain.

No single program will appeal to everyone. We realize that the American public is made up of a great many small publics. These range from the esoteric few who read Homer in the original Greek as a relaxation to those who had the misfortune never to learn to read at all. Between these extremes are millions and millions of people with interests as varied as the houses they live in or the food they eat for lunch. No one has ever made a successful attempt to tell these people what they should like and how they should obtain relaxation and recreation. Few attempts have been made to limit their pursuit of happiness within the bounds of propriety. We question whether anyone can or should do so.

Social Message Important

One script was singled out for specific attention by the 17 eminent judges selecting the Sylvania Award—"International Incident," by Arnold Belgard, who has written a number of fine "Fireside Theatre" stories. The script dealt with a peculiarly horrifying aspect of Communist terror in Europe, Communist methods of operation, and specifically with the reaction of a group of American soldiers to their brutality. Thus, "International Incident" was a story with a social message.

We suspect this was part of its strength. We do not plan that our show should be made a vehicle for social messages, but when a script comes along which, in addition to doing a fine job of entertaining, also contributes sound thinking on an important problem, we welcome it most avidly.

We look for many things when we get to work on a "Fireside Theatre" production, but not a single one of the requirements is particularly different from those of any other good dramatic show. We try for good stories, first of all, and then we try as hard as we can to see to it that they're expertly written, dialoged, cast, directed and produced. There are many other shows which do the same thing; if there's any particular secret to the greater success of some, it must be that we try harder than most.

Three years ago when we first began "Fireside," our format consisted of two 15-minute shows comprising a half-hour program. The story problem that exists here becomes immediately apparent. There's little or no time to develop character or incident and you often wind up with a surprise or trick ending that is far from satisfactory. After 26 weeks of this, we changed to the single half-hour drama that we use today.

We've found acting talent of a high order in the most unexpected places. For example, one of the most talented actresses we've used in a long time—and a girl who will, without a doubt, be "going places"—is a young waitress in a Los Angeles department store tea room. Her name: Maura Murphy. You may have seen her in a starring role in "A Question of Wills" a few weeks ago and you'll be seeing her again in 1952. While it is true that Miss Murphy had a certain amount of experience in local, semi-professional groups, she was earning her living as a waitress when we found her.

We're proud of "Fireside Theater" but not smug. While we believe that we have improved the quality of the shows both technically and creatively in each succeeding "Fireside" series, we also sincerely believe that we can and will improve further. At least we hope so. After all, we want to keep winning awards. Clients are human, too!

B'casting Business Has Gone Local

By C. E. HOOPER

The title of this piece should not be confused with how broadcasting's time or programs are bought and sold.

Rather reference is to how, when and where that broadcast advertisement itself does business for the sponsor. How, when and where it earns its keep. It is the advertisement's performance as a moulder of public opinion, as a messenger of good-will, as a conditioner of the consumer's mind, as a direct salesman of the product which has gone local. In terms not of its origin but of its ultimate end the broadcast advertisement (which is the business end of broadcasting) is performing in a highly individualistic fashion where what happens in one market bears no resemblance to the next.

A group of advertisers and agencies, fast diminishing in size, is still hoping for a return of the "good old days" (of about three years ago) when they bought (1) a program with a good past rating record; (2) an open time spot on a leading network and sat back to watch radio create both new distribution and new sales in every state in the union.

One year's ratings pattern resembled the last. The advertiser had been sold a blanket of national coverage. Actually the blanket was pretty lumpy, thick in some spots, not so in others, but he never found it out. He never got so much in results from an advertising investment.

When television networks were announced it looked like an even larger animated version of the same thing.

Both radio and TV now need both measurement and management at the local level. It may be distasteful to have to deal with so much detail, but, in each field of competitive activity, there is one contender making the effort. In every city there are already one or two agencies which recognize that they must know conditions in local radio and TV in order properly to evaluate what they have in the way of local coverage, to appraise the opportunity for improvement through negotiation with networks and stations, to spot the weakness in competitive agency account management at the local level—on both radio and TV.

In current "TV-Home Hooperatings" it is not "low interest" in crime that gives "Crime Syndicated" a 1.7 in Los Angeles or "high interest" that gives it a 17.9 in Chicago. Rather it is all tied up in the technique of TV broadcasting. But the end product is 10 times as many homes being advertised to in Chicago as in Los Angeles.

Other top shows, currently cleared live, are not without wide swings ranging in excess of 2 to 1.

MUTUAL WRAPS UP 4 NEW SALES IN WEEK

Mutual last week wrapped up sales to Kraft Foods, Kellogg cereal, State Farm Insurance and Muri

Kellogg bought a five minute strip starring Carl Smith, hillbilly vocalist, cross-the-board at 12:25 p. m., via Leo Burnett, to start Jan. 14. Murine is taking over the Friday night segment of Gabriel Heatter, effective Feb. 29, via BBD&O.

Kraft is dropping the Tuesday and Thursday quarter-hour segments of "Queen for a Day" and picking up the Monday, Wednesday and Friday segments. Additionally, cheese outfit is taking the 5:15-5:30 period of "Bobby Benson" on Mondays. Agency is J. Walter Thompson.

State Farm, which now has Cecil Brown in the 7:50-8 p. m. slot on Saturdays, will add a Sunday newscast with Brown at 6:55-7 p. m. via Needham, Louis & Brorby agency.

WOR-TV Moves Jan. 10

WOR-TV, N. Y., will formally open its new Television Square building, on West 67th Street, Jan. 10.

Station prexy Ted Streibert has temporarily moved his office to the new building to supervise the installation. Opening will be marked with a special half-hour show at 7 p. m., featuring the outlet's stars, civic dignitaries, etc.

Making Radio More Servicable to Sponsor

By JOSEPH H. McCONNELL
(President, NBC)

The coming year of 1952 will be a great one for the broadcasters. It will witness the re-shaping of network radio to bring it abreast of the times and keep it strong for the future. It will see television delivering still greater values with ever greater impact.

It is at best rash to make sweeping predictions on any subject. I am making mine on the basis of our own plans at NBC. Our blueprints for the future have been drawn after months of study and deliberation. We have every belief in their success.

Speaking for NBC, I have more confidence and optimism in the future of radio than I have ever had before. I think we are finally coming to grips with our main problems and that we are developing patterns that will expand the future of radio.

In my own company we are now selling radio on its solid advertising values as a merchandise mover instead of on the basis of its glamor as part of show-business. In our tandem plans, the new market basket plan, the guaranteed attention plan and the merchandising plan we are developing new ways to make radio more serviceable to the advertiser.

Our new programming makes it possible for us to sell radio as an economical, efficient mass medium. We are bringing back into the network roster an array of talent that would have made radio proud in its greatest days. It is a pleasure to report that these great names can be offered to advertisers at reasonable, down to earth prices.

We are backing our plans with more than words. We are backing them with hard cash. It is by now no secret that we are prepared to take a substantial loss if necessary to put network radio and our radio network in particular firm basis for the future.

Too Much Taken for Granted

Putting a solid financial foundation under network radio will enable it to expand its many services to the public. As I said recently to the Radio Executives Club, I am fearful that the broadcasters have not done a good job in informing the public of the fine service which we render from day to day. Much of our programming is still taken for granted by the audience. But the American people are beginning to understand that it is the advertising support of our free system of American radio which really makes possible the fine musical, news, information and education programs.

We at NBC have taken a business man's approach to the problem. The good business man is not fooled by magical formulas. He knows he's got to produce an outstanding product at a price that makes it a good buy. When he does that and promotes his product properly he can achieve flourishing business.

The money which NBC will expend in 1952 in re-shaping our radio network and increasing its value for the advertiser and the public is tangible evidence of our confidence in the future of radio. It is an investment in the future and one that we are confident will pay off for all concerned.

Our policy for television at NBC has succeeded far beyond our greatest hopes. We decided some two years ago to build our television network as fast as we could. Our decision was based on the belief that it was best for all to gai quick financial support for television broadcasting and to make it profitable as rapidly as we could. Progress will not be stopped and the prudent business man moves along with it and promotes it.

Such rapid growth naturally produces growing pains and we, in common with the rest of the industry, have had our share of them. But with resourcefulness we expect to pass through this period and relieve ourselves of temporary distresses.

Much is being said and written today about the so-called high cost of television programs. Every once in a while some one assures us that the limit has been reached and warns us that television is about to price itself out of the advertiser's reach. Despite such long-faced talk more and more advertisers continue to use television with favorable results. Let me point out that since January, 1950, while television rates were advanced to reflect growing circulation our commercial volume has also grown. We have gone from 105 sponsored hours a month two years ago to about 230 hours now.

We were able to maintain this pace because we were giving television advertisers greater and greater values. If we continue to deliver value for what the advertiser pays, I am confident we will be able to sell our facilities. Similarly, if we don't deliver this value we will not be able to sell our time and talent no matter how cheap our prices are.

Recognize the Right Level

Ultimately competition—as it always does—will bring about a fair level of prices for television shows. We must be wise enough to recognize the right level and to anticipate it if necessary.

All of our collective skill, ingenuity and wisdom will be required to continue and even enlarge television's value to the advertiser. Competition will force a more efficient use of our creative talent, our great staging and production facilities and our technical and operating plants. Television is too dynamic as a medium and as an art to be hindered by short-sightedness or selfishness. There is more to progress than mere expansion. We cannot have progress with out the efficient utilization of our material, creative and spiritual strengths. I am confident we will meet the tests of the future.

All broadcasters can share a feeling of pride in the great advance which we and our stations have made the past year in both radio and television. These advances were made possible by hard work and tenacity and by the confidence and faith shared alike by networks, stations, artists, technicians and our operating and business staffs. By working together we have served the public well and have given the country a great communications system with which to meet the future in an unsettled world.

Of all the groups which make up a community, the broadcasters have the greatest opportunity for service to the people. Theirs alone is the power to enlighten, entertain, inform and educate the people while at the same time contributing to the growth of business and industry. It will be up to us to use our powers in the uncertain year which faces us for the greatest good of all.

'Let's Produce A Package'

By ALAN LIPSCOTT

Hollywood.

I dropped into Noah's candy store on my way home, as I had been doing for the past five years, to get my scoop of Indian nuts. I always crack Indian nuts with my teeth, while I work, to placate an eye twitch that I picked up while writing for Pick and Pat, in the early days of radio. But there was a stranger behind the counter. The stranger told me that Noah had sold him the store about an hour ago. I wasn't surprised, because ever since I met Noah Deverish, he talked about retirement. Coming from a guy over 65 such talk made sense. Since Noah lived in a flat, which I had to pass on my way home, I thought I'd drop in and see how he was enjoying retired life.

Noah must have walked into the flat just before I did. He was still wearing his windbreaker. Della, his wife, was waiting for him with a glass of hot tea and lemon. After brief "Hellos," what followed seemed to be a daily routine. Noah sat down on the Morris chair and rested his feet on the oilcloth covered hassock. Della then handed him the tea. Noah squeezed the slice of lemon over the steaming tea and dropped the rind into the glass. He then took a loud sip, smacked his lips and then removed the spoon from the glass. He then poured back into the glass the tea that had overflowed into the saucer. He then placed the glass, saucer and spoon on top of the television set alongside of the chair.

The "tea and lemon" bit over, Noah settled back in the chair. He was now ready for conversation. Della started it.

She asked, "What happened today?"

Noah quietly replied, "I sold the store!" Although Della probably never saw Edgar Kennedy in her life, nevertheless, she did a take.

Before Della could get back to the script Noah continued. "I sold the store because, suddenly, I started to hate lollipops, licorice, gumdrops, rock candy, bubble gum and Indian nuts. I sold it to a retired jujube salesman. I got $5,000 for it." Noah then took a wad of bills out of his pants pocket and tossed it on the table.

"There it is! 'Count it!", he added, with a wave of his hand.

Della raised Noah's feet from the hassock, spread a newspaper under them and then put his feet back on the newspaper. She was neat that way.

Della, ignoring the money on the table, said, "Tomorrow you'll go to the Post Office and buy E Bonds."

"I'm not speculating."

Della pursed her lips for an insult and then changed her mind. She settled for "Humph!"

Noah hastened to explain. "With Mexico on the south, Canada on the north, Bermuda on the east and Catalina on the west, what if they should all get together? Voom! There goes your E Bonds!"

I always knew that Noah was conservative with a buck. In fact, he had already stopped buying suits with two pairs of pants on account of his age. But I never figured he was that conservative.

A $50 bill detached itself from the roll and fluttered to the floor. Della retrieved it and put it back.

She raised her voice an octave. "I'm not going to have the house cluttered up with your $5,000."

Noah pleaded. "Della, this is all the money we have in the world. Why take unnecessary risks? Let's play it safe." Then emphasizing each word, he said, "I'm putting this money into a package!"

"Now, you're talking sense," Della agreed. "Only when you put the money into a package, don't forget to take out enough to rent a safe deposit box to put the package into."

That's Different

Noah laughed tolerantly. "Ah Della darling, you're stupid. I'm not talking about a bundle package like a parcel. I'm talking about a television package." Picking up the roll of money he continued. "With this money I'll hire actors, a director and writers and Voom! I got a package. This package I film and this film I sell to a sponsor and Voom! I got a profit!"

"Voom!" Della echoed Noah. "All of a sudden, what's with this Voom?"

"That's package palaver," answered Noah, suddenly becoming western. "I learned it from Mr. Fenyock, my producer. I met him on a bus."

"You-met-him-on-a-bus." Della emphasized each word.

Noah ignored the emphasis. "Yeah. He's a big shot with the National Broadcasting Co. Hardly a day goes by that he doesn't have dealings with Mr. Sarnoff and Mr. Weaver and other big shots. That's what he told me."

Della looked strangely at Noah and murmured incredulously, "That's what he told you."

"I should drop dead if he didn't! And when I asked him point blank, 'Mr. Fenyock, are there many packages being produced today,' what do you think he said?" Pausing only long enough to take a breath, he rattled on. "He said, and I quote, 'Mr. Deverish, I can only answer you by saying that there isn't a warehouse in New York, Chicago and Los Angeles that isn't filled to the roof, with cans of television packages'."

And before Della could reply, Noah stood up and headed for the bedroom. "If you'll excuse me," he said, "I'll hit the hay. I have to get up early. I have a conference with my producer."

A week later, while I was steering a hot pastrami sandwich and a cup of coffee through the crowded Farmer's Market, I happened to see Noah Deverish, sitting at a table feasting on a plate of chili and beans. There was a vacant chair at the table so I sat down.

"Well, Noah, how goes with the package?"

Noah, his mouth full of chili, made a circle with his thumb and first finger, and thrust it aloft. This, in TV language, means "Voom!"

"Is it a mystery show?" Noah shook his head negatively.

"Crime? Science fiction?" I asked, fishing.

Noah smirked. "Such shows are for suckers!" The big profits today are in quizzes and panels. A show with a gimmick."

"And your gimmick?"

Noah winked to warn me against a sailor and his gal who were sharing our table. Then he lowered his voice.

"You've seen 'Guess My Name,' 'Guess This Song,' 'Guess My Business'?"

At each question I nodded.

A Real Novelty

"I'm producing a show called 'Guess My Ailment'."

Though I was already late for an appointment at CBS with Harry Ackerman, I walked over to a stall for a second cup of coffee. I wouldn't miss this for the world.

When I returned, Noah went into details. The sailor and his gal had left, so he raised his voice to normal.

"Only people with ailments are eligible to be contestants," he said. Lucky for Noah, I swallowed that mouthful of coffee.

Noah continued. "Each contestant stands or sits in front of the panel, depending on his or her physical condition. The members of the panel then try to arrive at the ailment of the contestant."

Suddenly I started to see poor Noah in a straitjacket.

Noah, oblivious to my thoughts, continued. "To give them clues, the members of the panel are permitted to examine tongues, fingernails, poke ribs, pinch cheeks, tap chests and pry into ears and eyeballs." And after a pause, he added, "Good possibilities for comedy there, huh?"

Now, I saw him in a padded cell.

"You see," he continued, "a yellow complexion indicates liver trouble. If a contestant winces when you poke him in the ribs, it's an even chance that he has shingles. If the tongue is shiny, it's pernicious anemia; if it's black, the contestant has just been eating licorice, or he has beri-beri. For our panel we have Lew Tendler, the former lightweight and . . ."

I stood up. My eye suddenly started to twitch. "Sorry, Noah, but I have to run along. Good luck with your package." I made a beeline for the confectionery stall for a scoop of Indian nuts.

A month later I had occasion to drop into the Bureau of Unemployment. I had a date with a jobless pigeon. As I scanned the line of unemployed waiting for their checks, once again I saw Noah Deverish. I turned my head to avoid him embarrassment, but he spotted me and called me over. With a tinge of sadness, he told me that a film was made of his package and it's now in the warehouse with thousands of other flops. One thing bothered me and I thought this was a good time to get myself straightened out.

"Tell me, Noah," I asked, "did this Fenyock charlatan really have dealings with Mr. Sarnoff and Mr. Weaver?"

"He did. He absolutely did," Noah answered naively. "I investigated him and found out that he did have such dealings. He worked on the NBC parking lot!"

And then hopefully, he inquired, "Look, why don't you take an interest in my package. Sell it and I'll cut you in for 50%!"

I promised Noah that I would give his proposition some thought, though all the time I laughed inwardly. I should take an interest in such a stupid, asini , moronic, idiotic quiz, when I'm working on a quiz show of my own, "Guess the Name of My Underwear!"

Future of Television: Show Biz Is Not Enough

By FRIEDA HENNOCK

(FCC Commissioner)

Washington.

The past year in show biz was like its immediate predecessors in its continuing preoccupation with the new (but by now unmasked) marvel of television. There were many outstanding events in TV during 1951. Perhaps the most fundamental and far-reaching change was found in the balance sheets of the 108 TV stations now on the air. Telecasting finally climbed out of the pit of unprofitable operation; black ink came widely into use and the red was happily stored away, let us hope forever, by the majority of broadcasters. Choice nighttime was already SRO, with this condition spreading to other time segments. Television had become, in VARIETY lingo, "a B. O. Blockbuster." Yes, in TV, show biz did good biz.

In contrast, however, to this cheery business outlook there were, in 1951, continued rumblings of concern about the future of television. No one could deny its great power nor ever doubt its unlimited potential. Therefore, from all sides, from parents and set owners, including members of Congress, we heard during the year of the necessity that serious responsibilities be shouldered by television as it continued its lightning growth. It was the hope of all that TV realize at least a substantial part of its potential; that it not become just another, albeit the most powerful, sales force; that it develop into the finest cultural, as well as entertainment medium in the entire world.

We all know, and have said over and over again, just what TV could do if those in the industry set their minds to it. Only a few months ago millions sat way past midnight to watch a Peace Conference in San Francisco. All of them learned something vital in those few hours; we got first-hand information on collective security in action, as treaty making was taken out of "homburg-filled" rooms and brought to the individual citizen's level. Here was entertainment at its best; public education at its finest!

This one example is only a small hint as to the future service of which TV is capable. Yet now is the time to recognize and develop this service—tomorrow, plagued by established habits, will be too late. Why not now? All television stations presently enjoy a considerable advantage derived from the scarcity of spectrum space, a physical fact which limits the number of their competitors. The tremendous commercial success of TV has, moreover, brought about a condition in which advertisers almost fight for choice time and there is a unique opportunity for telecasters to pick and choose among them and to direct them. Yet, disregarding this opportunity, too many telecasters continue to follow worn paths and patterns, to carry over programming and advertising practices that are not particularly appropriate to the new medium, and even many that had been under heavy fire in the old.

No Longer Red Ink Excuse

Nineteen hundred fifty-one's harvest of profits has taken away telecasters' former excuse that better programming and extended public service could not be forthcoming while their operations were in the red. Furthermore, 1951 should have proved to even the most skeptical that the fine public service programs were the most successful, won the greatest audiences, and sold the most sets. What other programs secured as much attention as the San Francisco Conference, or the Kefauver Committee hearings?

Furthermore, show biz may be show biz, but it's not education. Commercial licensees have learned a great deal about the new medium and they will learn a great deal more, but they are not educators. Experience with its use now supports the belief that television is a teaching tool of rare power and persuasion, and that it presents the finest opportunity for public education, both formal and informal, available in our time. Yet, in order to fully develop TV's educational capabilities, it will be necessary for educators to participate in it on a substantial scale and to operate their own full-time "Schools of the Air."

During 1951, I'm pleased to report, major steps were taken in this direction. In March, the Commission, after an extensive hearing, proposed to adopt the general principle of reserving TV channels exclusively for such non-commercial purposes. And, in consequence, great numbers of educators in the current allocations proceeding have filed voluminous and substantial proof of their intention and ability to make use of TV as soon as possible. In all, the comments of more than 500 educational institutions have supported the proposed reservations in more than 240 cities throughout the country.

Among the major comments have been the requests for three statewide educational networks in New York, New Jersey and Connecticut. The plan of the New York Board of Regents, for example, contemplates 11 stations operated under the cooperative efforts of more than 8,000 schools, libraries, museums, historical societies, gardens, zoos and other cultural institutions in the State, possessing plant and equipment valued at more than $2,300,000,000, and with annual educational expenditures of $885,000,000, including more than 110,000 teachers and specialists serving 3,400,000 students.

These hundreds of comments and affidavits—all filed within the last few months—have given conclusive proof of what education can accomplish if given a non-competitive reservation and sufficient time to make use of it. They are, I am sure, forerunners of the scores of schools and colleges which will enter television in coming years and offer a full-time educational service to all, to children as well as adults. Educational-TV remains a major horizon for television and the American people.

TV Now Doing The Impossible

By MAGGI McNELLIS

When television was removed from its swaddling clothes and Mr. and Mrs. Public got their first glimpse of the newborn babe, TV became an overnight phenomenon. Those who appeared on it were phenomenal. That is, if he had a fairly handsome head (only one), spoke English and smiled charmingly, if even occasionally, Caesar's axiom applied . . . personality appeared on TV, was seen, and he conquered. The only struggle was on the part of the viewer who worked avidly at his set to rid it of the ever-increasing "snow."

Maggi McNellis

The new medium was more video than audio. Everyone wanted to see what the local or national stars of stage, radio and public life looked like, for here they were practically "in person." Perhaps it was important to hear what they said, but what they said was unimportant. The seeing was the believing.

As the necklines plunged lower, the femmes' Hoopers plunged higher. The male comedians didn't have to be too funny—last year's night club routine was good enough. Guest stars were booked on their name value alone with the talent assets secondary.

Suddenly, the habits of a great proportion of American families changed!

The TV baby began to grow and unlike the average well-behaved child was to be heard as well as seen. Pretty soon the viewer wanted to hear something intelligent. He was no longer content with pretty head held high or a neckline dropped low. He was going so far as to ask for new jokes. Sure, he still liked the comedians, variety shows, fights and wrestling matches, but now a program of public affairs, of news, of the Government and how it's run, of international situations became worth seeing. And Mr. Public, sometimes Mrs., too, saw and listened.

Now a Family Affair

The viewer, especially with the advent of the coaxial cable, had a wide choice of shows and could change channels with a flip of the wrist. In some cases right from the control box next to his easy chair. Thus, the channel bosses knew they had to offer something worthwhile or that simple twist of the wrist would be twisting off their station.

Television is now a family affair. Performers have to please a group which can include a grandmother, a husband and wife, a couple of teenagers and even the six-year-old. This is indeed a large order. If publishers had to print only books that would appeal to every member of a family to the extent that they would keep their eyes glued to the pages hour after hour with great interest and absolutely no criticism, the publishers would soon be out of business. If golf clubs and sewing circles had to completely intrigue men, women and children equally, how many of them would be in existence? If dress designers and milliners had to create dresses and hats that would be becoming to each and every woman and meet the approval of every man, without exception, the Seventh Avenue district would be relieved of its impossible traffic problem because the street would be empty.

Yet this was the challenge with which TV was faced. Programs must hold the interest of the group no matter how diversified the ages or the tastes. Programs must not offend anyone in any way by a look, a word, an idea. If this was required of any other business the answer would be "impossible." And it would be, too. So, at least to me, it's a constant source of amazement and admiration to see how successfully TV is accomplishing the "impossible."

TV has grown up. It can discard the plunging neckline as an attention-getter, and is ready for a tailor-made suit.

Radio and Television Never Had It So Good

By EDWARD J. NOBLE
(Chairman of the Board, ABC Network)

The year just past was, to borrow a simile from the military, a literal proving ground for the two great elements of our industry—radio and television.

During 1951 radio proved that it is still a vital, potent, growing medium, firmly rooted in the lives of Americans as a source of entertainment, news, information and education and as firmly rooted in the world of American business as a matchless method for the advertiser to reach mass audiences at minimal costs. And during the same period, television proved itself to be the miracle medium we in the industry had all envisaged it—of almost incredible popular appeal, flexible, imaginative, explorative. And, on the business side, television started to attain full stature during the year and to begin paying its own way.

J. Noble

There is no question that, in the popular mind, television has been the medium which captured more attention and interest during the year.

The factors attached to any expanding industry insured this—the constantly increasing number of sets in use, the quality and variety of programs available, the attention paid to the medium by the press and, finally, the giant stride which television took to the Pacific Coast and which gained for it a truly national audience.

How many Americans a generation ago could attend the theatre weekly? Television today permits them to do it nightly. How many Americans a generation ago saw a World Series? Today millions see these contests as a matter of course. How many Americans a generation ago could feel themselves intimately a part of history-making forces? Today, through television, a nation watches its President as he opens the sessions of a peace treaty conclave bringing to a final, formal conclusion one of the most terrible wars in history.

A Proven Quantity

The potential of television as medium for education was definitely established during the year. That potential is now being vigorously explored along several avenues. On television, within the past year, it has been possible to see and hear a physician in Baltimore conversing with a patient and to see and hear specialists as far away as Chicago and New York offer their own diagnoses of the patient's ailment.

While all of us in the industry can be proud of the advances recorded by television during the year, I think it incumbent upon us to look to the future of the medium rather than to dwell fondly on accomplishments already recorded.

For, despite its achievements during the year, television in some of its aspects came in for pointed criticism in 1951 and I think it behooves all of us in the industry to anticipate areas of criticism and to take corrective steps to eliminate causes for criticism rather than be placed on the defensive.

Re-examine Your Product

To that end, I feel that programs and program content should be carefully pre-tested by the telecaster before they are put on the air; that new program sources should be sought for and uncovered; that program formats should be re-examined from time to time to avoid the trite and the obvious; that we should strive in every way to build programs that are as exciting and challenging as the very nature of the medium in which they are presented. And we should never lose sight of the fact that the ultimate aim of the medium is to appeal to the American family in the American home and that there is the final judgment seat for our efforts.

I think that 1951 was a year of which radio, too, can be proud. Its accomplishments have come in the nature of a surprise even to many in the industry itself and should certainly and finally remove any lingering doubts that radio is an obsolete and foredoomed means of communication and of advertising.

Radio broadcasters, with the experience of 1951 behind them and with a clearer and surer knowledge of the innate worth of their medium, can look forward to the future with more confidence, I believe, than was the case a year ago. They have had time to assay and analyze the medium itself and the probable effects on the undeniable inroads made upon radio by television. They have attained a realistic attitude concerning the scope and possible limitations upon their medium. I feel they are better prepared than ever before to operate on this realistic basis.

For both radio and television I look forward to 1952 as a period for further growth and development and for an opportunity to serve well, in every phase of their operations, the American people.

This Is Only The Beginning

By DR. ALLEN B. DU MONT
(President, DuMont Labs.)

Television up until now has specialized entertainment chiefly because such programming offered the quickest possible transition from experimental to commercial status. The big role that television is to play in our lives is still in the making but is yet to be revealed in all of its glory. We should not make the mistake of placing television in the fixed category of entertainment, since that is but a part of its function and place in our lives. Its significance and potential in other fields are present. Full utilization and recognition of its powerful force for good is in the hands of all of us in the industry.

Television today is but a fledgling. The limitations on the medium's opportunity to grow, expand and serve the whole country and all of its people, brought about by the exigencies of the "freeze" are only too well known. There are only 108 stations in 63 cities serving less than half the area of the nation. In 40 of these cities there is only one station. These people do not have the freedom of program choice from multiple services enjoyed in such cities as New York, Chicago, Washington and Los Angeles. There are only approximately 14,000,000 receivers in considerably fewer than half the homes of our country. However, there is a ray of hope coming from recent announcements by FCC officials that the "freeze" may be lifted within a few months.

When that "thaw" comes, television will be started in earnest on its road of destiny. Within the next 20 years we will see thousands of TV stations spread all over the country with millions more receivers in a large percentage of the homes in every community, large and small.

That is the time when general public recognition will come to TV. That is the time it will take its rightful place as the greatest mass form of communications ever devised by man. That is when its potential will be realized as a great force to serve America and mankind in the causes of education, religion, culture, politics, peace and world-wide human relations. That is when the significance of television will be recognized and extended far beyond the field of entertainment.

With this recognition will come ever-increasing civic responsibility as television becomes such an integral element of community life. Potentially it is the most powerful force for good in the community, and by the same token the easiest to maltreat.

Vast Sphere of Influence

Television's audiences will have available to them more informative and cultural programming than exists in any other medium of communications. Home audiences will have an opptrounity to view more public affairs, see more important people, learn more, and be able to see at first hand more of the people who are making history than was ever possible in an

Changing Styles In Sports Broadcasting

By MARTY GLICKMAN

The day of the "holler" guy in sports broadcasting is ended. Once upon a time the prime requisites of a sports announcer were an animated voice, a healthy set of vocal cords and above all else, a resourceful imagination. Today, with the development of television and the consequent education of the sports fan into the category of "expert," the sports broadcaster must be at least as learned as the listener or the viewer.

Broadcasting technique has changed because the fan has changed. It is not enough today, in broadcasting football, to say that Joe Doakes has the ball, "He's down to the 40, the 30, the 20, the 10, the five, the four, the three, the two, the one, he's over." The fan today wants to know how the ball carrier got there. Did they use the "T" or the single wing? Did the ball carrier take a pitch-out, a hand-off, or direct pass; did he go round the end, off the tackle, over the guard, or up the middle; did he cut back or flare out to the sideline, did he have one, two or any key blocks; was he closely pursued did he go over all alone?

In addition, what sort of a defense was being used against him? Did the defense use a five, six or seven man line; were the backers up tight or were they playing loose; was it a 6-2-3, a 6-1-4, a 5-3-3, a seven-diamond or a 6-2-2-1 defense? If some of these details are missing, the educated fan of today doesn't get the complete picture. Where once all that was looked for, from the fan, was who's carrying the ball and how far did he get, today much more of football's complexities must be included.

Lay Off The Prose, Bub

You must remember those magnificent passages of prose which came so mellifluently from your loudspeaker which described the state of the weather at a sports event. "The sun is a burst of golden fire in a miasma of misty blue as it tips the western rim of the sun-drenched stadium," or "the gods of weather have conspired to wreak havoc on the scarred sod of the field as Jupiter Pluvius vies with Thor to harass the protagonists." Today's broadcaster refers to the weather to indicate the effect it will have on the game. "The sun is going down" or "it's raining hard," will do for the above. When Mel Allen, Russ Hodges, Red Barber or Connie Desmond tell you about the shadow on the diamond between the pitcher's mound and the batter's box, it's to point up the added difficulty the hitter has in following the ball from the sunshine of the pitcher into the shadow of the hitting zone.

Television is making honest men of sports announcers. Before TV the ringside spectator and the radio listener had two versions of a prize fight. Almost always the listener heard a thoroughly exciting show. Fights on radio were filled with "crashing rights, jarring lefts, savage barrage of blows, whaling away with both hands, bloody and battered hulks," etc. Some of those fights rated those descriptions . . but not many. I'll never forget waiting up for my Dad after listening to fights he had seen, too excited from the blow-by-blow description to sleep, to be completely disillusioned with his laconic comment, "What a dull fight. I coulda' licked either one myself." Wasn't it common practice a few years ago to tune in the television and the radio description of a fight simultaneously . . . for laughs?

A sports fan today is a far more educated sports viewer than he once was. A fan now knows not only batting averages and comparative scores, he knows techniques, strategies, tactics, rules, and the duties of the officials. As the public's knowledge has increased, the sports announcer's activities have become more specialized. A broadcaster today is known not so much for his versatility, but for the job he does in his specialty. The requirements for top sportscasting are such that a man can do only two or three sports well enough to satisfy the demands of the exacting fan. Hence, we find that each sport is identified with specific announcers, whereas it used to be that specific announcers were identified with every sport. McNamee, Husing and Stern used to cover them all. Today it's Husing, Stern and Wismer on football; Barber, Hodges, Allen and Desmond on baseball; Curt Gowdy, Bud Palmer and this writer on basketball; McCarthy and Field in racing; Dunphy, Taub, Powers and Hodges on boxing. Sure, we often do other events because there are so many to do. But the top assignments, year in and year out, go to different sports announcers. No one man can handle them all well enough today to satisfy the fan.

The trend very definitely has been away from the "holler" guy to the calculated precise reporting of the expert. Today's listener gets baseball coverage from men who are students of the game, many of whom played it professionally; football from ex-players and coaches; horse races from men who have followed the horses most of their lives; athletics from ex-atletes.

TV's 'Intimacy' Mates Odd Bedfellows On Labor Front

By BERT BRILLER

Television is proving itself the "intimate medium" in more ways than one. The phenomenal growth of video as a force with impact on all phases of show business is making all the entertainment unions more intimate, prodding them to unity.

At the moment the various guilds, suddenly thrown into greater proximity than ever before, seem to be jabbing elbows into each others' ribs, with an occasional kick in the shins. But if the crowding has thus far produced mostly jostling and bickering, it has also given rise in many quarters to a commonsensical understanding of the need for common aims. In 1952, it's considered likely, cease-fires will be inked in the several jurisdictional wars and more or less cordial ententes will be established.

There are strong indications that diplomacy, based on the recognition that inter-union strife can only weaken the guilds, will prevail. The will-to-unity is evidenced, for example, in the talent field. At membership meetings, time and again speakers have called for "one big union" among the branches of the Associated Actors & Artistes of America. Performers who pay dues to several unions—Actors Equity, American Federation of Radio Artists, Television Authority, American Guild of Variety Artists, etc.—feel that the need to hold cards in multiple crafts is a tough financial drain. They've also expressed the conviction that bargaining positions will be strengthened by joining forces.

TVA's Merger Push

Last month's TVA convention should provide a powerful shove in the direction of merger. The confab resolved that if the five eastern branches of the 4A's don't get together by July 1 (and providing AFRA isn't the only branch opposing a five-party consolidation) a TVA-AFRA wedding should be permitted.

Such a bilateral marriage is anathema to many artists. Equity and AGVA, particularly, feel the AFRA-TVA mixture will be poison, giving the combo greater weight and putting the other branches at a disadvantage. With the banns posted for July 1, if the five branches don't work out a satisfactory blueprint for blending, they'll be weeping at the AFRA-TVA nuptials.

That still leaves the explosive question of the TVA-vs-screen guilds feud. The NLRB, serving as ump in that knock-down-drag-out Donnybrook, last year made several rulings which strengthened the Screen Actors and Screen Extras Guilds. Basically, said the NLRB, conditions in the live TV and film fields are different; therefore, live actors and film actors should not be lumped together in elections for bargaining agent. Results: where TVA took on SAG-SEG, the latter won; in other polls, where victory for TVA would have meant the video union's repping pixites for theatrical product as well as telefilms, TVA withdrew.

Screenites Gain in Vidpix

These developments tend to give the screen guilds jurisdiction over most celluloid made for tele. There are, of course, several areas in which the jurisdictional issue regarding vidfilm is still unsettled. However, a basis has been laid for compromise. The conflict between the live and screen unions was bitter and vehement, but the hatchet could be buried in some lot which once made quickies and is now lensing half-hour TV features.

Among the scripters, too, the new year may bring peace. The Radio Writers Guild, in a "shock therapy" technique, last summer filed for an NLRB election among tele scribblers. The radio union assertedly moved to hurry up the Authors League into jelling the jurisdictional situation. Previously, the various guilds (dramatists, screen and radio, book-and-mag writers) had agreed to a National Television Committee on which they and the ALA's Television Writers Group were all repped.

RWG petition brought stormy protest from the other League guilds. However, the RWG subsequently withdrew its petition and, it's understood, a new formula is being evolved which will keep the League intact. Negotiations with the webs have been resumed and this year should see the scribes script a pact with the chains, bankrollers and agencies.

Among the problems of welding unions together are diverse traditions, leaders and policies. The question of "blacklisting," for example, which has been raised in all the show biz unions has been met differently from craft to craft. All have expressed distaste for political screening, but there has been little if any joint action.

Looking ahead, union toppers say that the agenda for 1952 calls for organizing tele personnel in the hinterlands. Yet, they add, radio must not be forgotten. While AM's network income may be dwindling, they aver, the chains are still in a position to grant pay hikes. Although these may not be great, the laborites believe, there should be some fair increases. Additionally, the unions will probably press for improved working conditions and terms, such as severance pay, vacations, pension funds and the like.

hocus-pocus shows with general appeal aren't being televised at the moment one of the medium's greatest mysteries.

Consider, for example, a weekly half hour of the "The Greatest Tricks." One week the feature would be the sensational bullet-catching mystery, which has cost so many performers their lives. Think of the publicity angles. Another week the feature would be "Sawing Spectator in Half" or "Houdini's Chinese Water Torture Cell" escape.

In my travels here and abroad I've seen hundreds of seldom-used spectacular illusions which are perfect for television.

Another way magic can pep up programming is in the commercial department. Ingeniously constructed shadow boxes, slates, and frames could produce the sponsor's message—by magic. Again, sleight-of-hand can change a dollar bill into a package of the advertiser's product, or infallibly choose the one right (from the advertiser's point of view) product from a field of many.

Chinese Message

In my "Magic by Christopher" shows I sometimes scrawled a message in Chinese on a slate. As the viewers watched, the Oriental symbols changed visibly into the sponsor's name. When I said you could stretch your dollar by patronizing the sponsor's store, the dollar actually stretched; when I said you could change a shopping list into a tableful of tasties, the list melted away and the promised spread was in its place.

Audience participation is always popular in magic, and especially on television. If the spectator used is a celebrity, so much the better. When there's a Garry Moore or Faye Emerson around for me to show my tricks to, their acting ability and informality always punch up the climaxes.

In TV the magician with one act, an act that may have earned him a handsome income for many years in vaudeville theatres, is good for only three or four guest appearances during the year. But if the magician is versatile and devises new routines for each show, his playing time is limited only by the demand for his appearance and the sales ability of his agents.

The first big-budgeted, lavishly produced TV magic show has yet to be produced, but when it is, it will work wonders in the video world.

Dear Mr. Sponsor

By BLANCHE MERRILL

I'm just an average housewife
And I live in the suburbs of town
My meals were on time and my house would just shine
Now everything's all upside down.
And many a woman will know what I mean
Because TV has changed my entire routine
And as for the housework—my place is a sight
Cause I sleep half the day and I'm up half the night.

I get out of bed afternoons about three
Go straight to the parlor and turn on TV.
Then on comes Kate Smith around four o'clock
So I sit in my rocker and just rock and rock
Before I know it the clock's striking five
And I say to myself, "Land sakes alive
I've got to go out and get something for dinner"
And I buy what Kate tells me cause Kate's sure getting thinner
But I do take time out to get something for Charlie
Then we eat in the parlor watching Kuk, Fran & Ollie
On comes the Stork Club and like a couple of dreamers
We sit and watch Sherman while we smoke our Fatimas.

I've bought every product those men asked me to
Why my hair has been dyed every color and hue.
I bought Pepsi-Cola and all brands of beers
And we drink all that stuff 'till it comes out of our ears
We bought a new icebox and bought a new range
Everything in the house I've had to change
Well—we bought everything within reason and rhyme
When we didn't have cash we bought them on time.

We've watched every program my husband and me
And decided last night that we have the right
To tell you what's wrong with TV:

No two ways about it—we like dancing that's true
But dancing's one thing that those shows overdo
Up comes the curtain and out trip the girls
We're dizzy from watching those twists and those twirls
Turn on Channel 2 and they're prancing and dancing
Turn on Channel 9 and they're dancing and prancing
We're so sick of dancing we turn on Number 4
What happens? They're dancing and prancing some more.
Which leads us to believe the producers must say
"We've got 10 minutes to kill, let's do a ballet."

And there's another thing we think's just a crime
Every night the best shows go on the same time.
On Tuesdays my hubby turns on Uncle Milty
And I want Sinatra—then my darling feels guilty
I like Danny Thomas and that's another big worry
Cause I know he'd rather be watching Ken Murray.

And no matter what night we turn on any channel
The same girls are sitting right on the same panel.
So we'd like to mention—it's just a suggestion
There must be more than 10 girls that can answer a question.
'Cause turn one of those shows on—and
"Shoh as you're bohn"
There sits Maggi McNellis, Kilgallen and McElhone
So we switch to a drama—a real killer-diller,
And just as the villain is ready to kill her,
We're both so excited we start in to yell
When on comes a man with a mouthwash to sell.
He gargles and gurgles and ruins the whole plot
After that we don't care if he kills her or not.

I'll finish this letter tomorrow—you'll just have to pardon me
'Cause I don't want to miss one program tonight on TV.

'I Was Taught to Shut Up'

By BILL STERN

It's hard to practice the golden rule with a silver tongue. "Silence is golden," they say; but try to tell this to a fellow who has been chewing the fat on radio year after year with scarcely time to draw a breath. Take any radio spieler, switch him to a TV chore and see what happens.

He talks too much.

That's what people told me, "Bill, you talk too much." And believe me the accusation came as a shock. In radio I developed a rapid-fire style of sports audio reporting which, I thought, would keep my mouth chockful of bread and butter for life. Then along came television and, alas, I discovered my radio approach didn't fit at all in the newer medium.

They say you can't teach an old dog new tricks. Yet, here's one old dog who was forced to master a few new wrinkles—or else stop wagging his tail forever. In other words, the old dog radio announcer must learn that on video he wags his tail, not his tongue.

Between halves of one of my earlier football telecasts, I was paged to the phone booth to take an urgent call from stranger. It developed this guy was a longtime football fan who was exasperated at my constant chatter. "Hey Stern," the heckler shouted over the wire. "The football teams take time out. Why don't you?"

The words of the fellow stung. Believe me, during the second half of this football game I was so quiet you could hear a halfback get dropped.

Keeping quiet, of course, has its virtues. Two-platoon football, as you are probably aware, presents substitutions in such great quantities even the coaches have a tough time keeping tabs on all their players. Therefore, when you are stumped by a rash of newcomers on the field, you don't name names. You just pick up the backfield at your leisure and let it go at that. Dandy, isn't it?

Most of us have discovered the fewer times you open your mouth, the less you put your foot in it. On one early job I took great pains to identify every player who made or assisted in making a tackle during the course of a football contest. Naturally, this involved considerable chatter on my part and I fear I spent most of my time talking about tackling.

A couple of nights later I was emcee for a variety program when one of the guest stars—a honey-haired singer—tripped and almost sprawled on the stage.

From the audience came a booming voice which I'm sure reached every other home in America. It shouted, "Hey Bill, who made the tackle?"

More recently, I've learned that alternating between radio and television can be confusing and not amusing. Mastering the manly art of silence for video has its difficult moments but so does switching back to lovely, loquacious radio where dead air is suicide. Following a TV breather, a radio commentary is hard work.

After knocking out a number of silent spells for television, I went back to radio determined to give my voice a good workout again—which I did. However, I found myself with a decidedly irksome fault. I kept saying: "That fellow you just saw grab that long pass was John Doakes; or, "For real, rough-tough line play keep an eye on that guard."

If some listener thought I was daffy for telling him to look at his radio set and watch long pass a neat tackle, I couldn't blame him. It's pretty difficult to see anything on your radio set, even if you spin it around and study the tubes.

Well, it's taken a number of years but now I think I've mastered—to a small degree—this radio-television thing. In a way it reminds me of a husband trying to please both his wife and his mother-in-law. Only, it's tougher.

Who knows, though, perhaps after we've become expert beyond improvement at both jobs, some other medium of transmission will arrive. But that's getting ahead of the story, isn't it?

3,000 HOURS OF SHOWS FILMED

By JOHN L. SINN
(President, Ziv TV Programs)

The making of filmed programs and features for television is big business. More than $60,000,000 were spent on such productions during 1951 according to the best estimates. About 3,000 hours of programming for television were filmed. What was an infant industry three years ago has grown into a giant and is growing even more colossal.

Although not all types of TV programming lend themselves to filming, most of them do. Eventually, we the industry believe, between 80-90% of all television programming will be on film.

From a technical point of view, film offers many advantages over "live." For example, the cutting room floor becomes the final resting place of fluffs and flaws.

From the network advertiser's point of view, a filmed show can permit him to overcome such problems as the time difference between the east and west coast. From the "spot" advertiser, regional and local advertiser's point of view, the filmed-syndicated shows offer additional advantages by permitting maximum flexibility programming and the opportunity to benefit from the hard-hitting local sales message. To the TV station owner, such a program offers the opportunity to snare a local sponsor with a show featuring top stars and top stories.

Because of the increased demands for filmed television shows, the busy producers in the industry have set themselves up on a mass production basis. Ziv has done so, meanwhile taking steps to insure that no corners are cut in the process. Briefly, in setting themselves 25G vs. 250G, filmed television producers have gone far in long range planning to a greater extent than the motion picture industry has. Ziv produces films for about $25,000 which would require the motion picture industry at the present time to spend $250,000 to produce. It sounds fantastic, but here necessity was the mother of invention. To survive, we had to be ingenious and set ourselves up in such a manner that we could produce films inexpensively, yet out of the top drawer.

Ziv produces, at the present moment, 104 half-hour films each year. This is comparable to about 40 full length motion pictures. Obviously, to produce such an enormous quantity of shows, we have had to plan at long-range and wisely.

Among our methods have been the setting up of flexible sets and revolving stages which, with a minimum of effort, can be completely changed over within 10 minutes. This we accomplish by having our own lumber yard and carpenter shop as well as numerous sound stages under one roof, and three highly trained work crews which, at a moment's notice, can swing into action and start remodelling a set the minute the action shifts to another stage. Our sets have, moreover, been designed for easy conversion into new settings. We had top designers and decorators working with us for months to help us solve this problem, which has since enabled us to save thousands and thousands of dollars in man-hours.

Trying To "Unlearn"

Frankly, the first thing we did in order to put our plans into effect, was to instruct our personnel with motion picture experience to unlearn many of their previous methods of operation and orient themselves into doing things a brand new way—a way which would enable them to turn out in three or four days what would previously have required them six to eight weeks to accomplish.

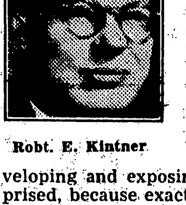
The problem facing producers of filmed television shows today is that of demand and distribution. As the television industry grows, so does the demand for top filmed shows.

AM-TV: A Plaque For Both Your Houses

By ROBERT E. KINTNER
(President, ABC Network)

Television was the tonic radio needed! It caused an advertising drama to be repeated.

Before discussing 1952, let me tell you what I mean by those first two sentences.



Robt. E. Kintner

After the initial shock of the spectacular success of television, the advertising world and radio in particular began a searching re-examination of both television and radio. This has been great benefit to all concerned.

Advertisers tried television alone and found that radio is needed for complete exposure of their client's messages and products. Broadcasters and advertisers looked at the statistics and yardsticks of radio and found radio was not being fully measured. Portable radios and multiple-set homes took on new importance. Radio was and is giving far greater coverage than measuring systems had been able to report.

In short, television has been a great help in developing and exposing radio's full use. We should not have been surprised, because exactly the same pattern was followed in the newspaper and magazine industries with the advent of radio. After a period of intense re-examination it was found that each did a particular job best. Today all continue to play vital roles in the United States' economy as movers of goods, as well as in the entertainment and cultural life of the nation. Television caused this little advertising drama to be repeated.

—And Plenty of Profits

Radio and television will rise to the occasion in 1952 with the result that the year will see new high points in public inerest and educational broadcasting. In my opinion, 1952 also will bring another reward to the broadcasters: it will be a most profitable year.

It has been said many times over that television will be a vital factor in electing candidates to political office in the future. This does not mean that the most telegenic candidates will be those elected. It does mean that those who are able to put forth their platforms and reply most convincingly on television to the issues of the day may be expected to carry the vote.

But—and here is where the advertising and broadcasting fraternity will be awaiting results with great interest—despite its impact television in the coming political season will not be sounding the death knell of radio.

Radio's mass coverage of our country has been demonstrated many times. The convenience of radio listening gives it many advantages over television. It has always been a potent force during an election year and I am certain this will not change in 1952, which finds 96 out of every 100 homes covered by radio.

Just as 1951 saw ABC demonstrate the advantages of morning radio to leading national advertisers, 1952 will show this network concentrating on the afternoon audience with special block programming. Flexibility and mass circulation at the lowest possible cost per thousand listeners are distinct advantages on the side of radio. There is no other advertising medium that begins to challenge radio on these counts. From this commanding position radio can look forward to a long and useful life in America's economy and culture.

There are two areas where the presence of television has barely been felt. These are education and news. In both of these quarters ABC Television has some interesting plans for the year ahead, and already has moved prominently into these fields.

ABC's Public Affairs Department last month launched "Horizons," a new television program in the education field in cooperation with Columbia University. "Horizons," which brings the informal give-and-take between Columbia faculty members and students before the television cameras, has been lauded by critics and educators alike as a new advance in the field of video education. This, naturally, is greatly encouraging to ABC and we are planning additional programs of this nature for 1952.

I know that radio and television are fully aware of these responsibilities and will tackle the problems with all the ingenuity and resourcefulness at their command.

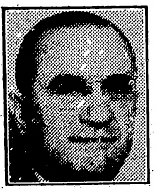
Films Vs. TV--'New Deal' Needed to Cement Ties

By DR. ALFRED N. GOLDSMITH

There's no quarrel like a family quarrel. (Two sisters may think the world of each other, but if they differ, the sparks fly!) And there's no business like show business. These are two reasons why a family argument in show business is one for the books. But after the fireworks, it usually ends in a friendly understanding. Frankly, I'm on the subject on films versus television. Just now these sister arts occasionally screech at each other. Sometimes they approach the hair-pulling stage. And all to no purpose. Sooner or later they will have to kiss and make up. Each needs the other. Each can benefit from the other. So, while a scrap is sometimes good fun while it lasts, it's got to end some day. Eventually—why not now? The present is no time for lost motion and waste effort in the U. S. A.



Dr. A. Goldsmith

Having watched the growth of both arts in closeup, I can find many elements of similarity and areas of agreement — as well as some differences. Each art appeals to the eye and ear. Each tells its story on the screen and through the loudspeaker. Television pick-ups can be used to make films (so-called kinescope recordings), Film cameras can make film for television. The studios, their lighting, sets and operation have close resemblances for each of these arts. Good film actors do well on television in most cases, and vice versa. Competent directors have some difficulty transferring from one field to the other — but not too much. The story material suitable for the motion picture can be adapted to successful television use in many instances. And of course such articles as lenses, lights, microphones and controls serve almost interchangeably.

Parallel Lines

All this is natural enough. For both arts developed along parallel lines. Originally films appealed only to sight. They played, in effect, to a deaf audience. Radio, on the other hand, played only to the ear and left the audience blind, so to speak. Then each art decided to supply the missing sense. Sound was added to the silent pictures. Sight was added to radio—and television arrived. During the last 15 years they may almost be said to have developed together—little as some will like this statement. Equally natural is the fact that their problems are similar. Each must provide a sharp, bright picture. Each must deliver clear and natural sound. Each needs good color reproduction. Each must supply attention-holding stories, capably acted. Each has continually to find new forms, stories, and methods to avoid losing its audience. And each has serious economic problems partly arising from ever-increasing production costs. (Scratch a film mogul and you find a TV magnate.)

So both ended up as visual-plus-aural program media. As a matter of fact, when each is handled properly, it is not too easy to tell them apart.

Still more important is what each art can offer to help the other. Films can offer television excellent short subjects, dramas, comedies, documentaries, sports event records and cartoons. Pictures can supply outstanding film commercials for television. Much of the equipment and know-how of the films can be partly transplanted to television, and film clips fit beautifully even into some television live productions. This list could be continued much further—but the point is already obvious.

On the other side, television has much to offer pictures. Compact television cameras can be used to supervise and control economical filming. Television editing techniques, properly adapted, can reduce film production costs without significant loss of quality. Through their high sales impact, television broadcasts of film trailers can promote theatre attendance. Television can create or publicize stars for the films. Television offers an enormous potential market for the film producer in the future—and will perhaps be his greatest outlet. Theatre television can further stimulate theatre attendance. And so on.

Each field has made its mistakes in its own development and in dealing with the other field. Why not let this be water over the dam—and start fresh on a rational and businesslike basis? Cherished misunderstandings will lead only to an entertainment "Heartbreak Ridge." But sensible cooperation will put lots of black ink in the right place on the balance sheets of films and television alike. I am sure there is no bankruptcy of ideas, ingenuity, and ultimately of good will and common sense on either side of the fence. This being so, constructive statesmanship and a real "new deal" are in order.

prime responsibility of rendering public service and making education widely available.

Even though success is judged not by economic results, the non-commercial broadcaster, no less than the commercial, is dependent upon proper financing, skills, techniques and information, and limitations of the medium.

The educational broadcaster can provide the continuity of programming which is so essential to the educational process, on a longtime, regular basis. Commercial broadcasters, on the other hand, are compelled, by reason of having to meet a weekly payroll, to confine their public service programming to limited and sporadic efforts.

That educational broadcasting is on the move, and appears to be gaining momentum month by month, is evidenced by the developments within National Association of Educational Broadcasters.

As of October, a year ago, educational broadcasting in the United States was on a springboard. Under the administration of President Richard Hull, NAEB had established the beginnings of a tape network, for the exchange of program resources.

Bid for TV Channels

Last year there was called into being an Ad Hoc Joint Cimmittee on Educational Television, which called together the educational groups of the United States to present education's case for the reservation of television channels.

Proposals had been made to various foundations with specific suggestions of how the educational broadcasting establishment could utilize financial assistance in the public interest.

Last year was one of preparation. It was the administration of the great ploughing. That that administration rendered great service to NAEB, and did its job well, is attested to by the fact that this year might well be characterized as the first year of the harvest.

More concretely, in 1951, NAEB became an incorporated association, under the laws of the state of Illinois. It became a constituent member of the American Council on Education. It united with other adult education groups to form the Adult Education Association of the United States.

It joined with the American Council, the Association for Education by Radio and Television, the Association of Land-Grant Colleges and Universities, the National Association of State Universities, the National Council of Chief State School Officers and the National Education Association of the United States to form the permanent Joint Committee on Educational Television, and to provide one of the members of its Board of Directors to act as the Executive Director of the Joint Committee.

It established permanent headquarters at the University of Illinois, and, for the first time in its existence, was able to enjoy the services of a full-time Executive Director. It expanded its tape network operations to service some 75 stations, and it received grants in aid from the Fund for Adult Education of the Ford Foundation, the Kellogg Foundation, the Old Dominion Fund, the Whitney Foundation, the Cooper Union, the New York Herald Tribune, and the Edward L. Bernays Foundation, and from other individuals and groups, which neared the $1,000,000 mark.

The Association has established close liaison with the departments of federal Government, and has had representation on the Broadcast Advisory Committee to the President of the United States. It has established a Public Interest Committee, composed of outstanding citizens of the nation.

With some 250 educational institutions already evidencing an active interest in television station operation . . . with almost two dozen already having money on the barrelhead, ready to go at the lifting of the freeze, it is fair to conclude that the momentum of growth and development of education on the air has not begun to reach its full acceleration.

If educational broadcasting is a stepchild . . . its name is Cinderella.

'Dragnet' Dedicated To Actor Who Died

"Dragnet," NBC meller, dedicated its program last week to Barton Yarborough, one of the airer's stars, who died in Hollywood Dec. 19. After the opening dedication, scripter James Moser touched reality in his yarn by having Sgt. Ben Romero, character played by Yarborough, die of a heart attack.

Yarborough will appear tomorrow (Thurs.) on NBC-TV's version of "Dragnet," since it was filmed before his death. A permanent sub has not yet been set, although Barney Phillips was on last week's show as Jack Webb's (Sgt. Joe Friday) aide.

Wanna Build a Fortune? Get Yourself a Format!

By FORTUNE POPE
(President, WHOM, N. Y.)

If all the opinions expressed during the past five years regarding the status of radio vs. television could be compiled, they would probably fill a good sized library. Hardly a day goes by that some publication, editorially or otherwise, doesn't give the subject a thorough going over. The proponents of each of the two media are consistently sounding off on the relative merits of their respective forms of broadcasting.

From all this debate and the reams of copy that have been written about it, one fact has clearly been indicated. Whether you're trying to reach your market by radio or by television, it's the program that counts. Program impact is still the answer to tune-in.

This has been particularly true with reference to foreign langauge broadcasting the New York market, which is probably as well saturated with television sets as any place the country. The specialized programming format of the foreign language broadcasters in this area has continued its hold on listeners to a greater extent than ever before in radio's history.

At this moment, there is more foreign language and specialized market programming in New York than at any period during the past 30 years. The demand for time continues to be brisk and program popularity is being maintained.

During the past year, we invested a considerable sum in the study of the six principal specialized areas we serve. We asked Advertest Research to make a thorough study of listening habits in these segments, which happen also to be the dominant lingual groups in this area—Italian, Jewish, Polish, Spanish, German, as well as the Negro market. The results are not only highly illuminating but offer conclusive proof that the intensity of listening among specialized radio audiences is far greater than that of the non-language radio audience.

Nationality Characteristics

There are more than twice as many sets-in-use in Italian and Polish homes, three times as many as German, twice as many in Spanish, three times as many in Jewish and three times as many in Negro homes than the average non-specialized sets-in-use for comparable time periods. Even during the key television hours from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m., the percentage of radio tune-in in Italian and Spanish markets exceeds 55%.

In trying to get a scientific picture of the foreign language market, we were just as interested in the nationality characteristics and socio-economic status of these groups as we were in their listening habits. Here are some of the interesting things we discovered:

Family size is larger in nationality homes than the New York City average. The percentage of family members who speak the language ranges from 68% to 93%. The overwhelming majority of family members listen to and enjoy foreign language programs.

Their favorite type of music ranges all the way from characteristic folk melodies to American jazz and bop. Popular Italian and operatic favorites appeal to the Italo-American audience. The Poles are just as fond as ever of their polkas. The German audience shows a preference for classical and light classical music. Jewish tastes lean to folk, religious and Israeli music, while Negro tastes lean heavily toward blues, spirituals and race music.

Italians, Jews Lead

The economic status of these language groups judged in terms of television, auto and telephone ownership puts the Italian and Jewish audiences at the top of the list. It is interesting to note that FM set ownership is high among Italians, Germans and Jews and practically insignificant in Spanish and Polish homes.

The past year has witnessed a definite increase in the demand for time on New York foreign language stations. The reason for this undoubtedly is the fact that scientific proof is available that the foreign language audience can be reached at a cost of pennies per thousand.

Agencies and advertisers are asking more questions about the foreign language market than ever before. They are eager to receive as much scientific information as stations can supply. Time buyers are planning their radio buys much more carefully and pinpointing their radio budgets where they will do the most good. When a foreign language station can offer a time buyer an audience for as little as 9c. a thousand, the offer naturally looks very attractive when compared with costs running into several dollars per thousand.

After analyzing the surveys, we came to the conclusion that the foreign language market is very real in this area; that it commands a huge amount of listening in nationality homes; that it represents a terrifically economical buy for the average advertiser; and that it proves once again that if you have a format and the programs to go with it—there's plenty of life left in radio yet.

Ratings: Only The First Step

By A. C. NIELSEN

"Benny is through."

"Winchell's losing his audience."

"Lever is cancelling the Lux Theatre."

That was the kind of talk you could have heard in trade circles not too long ago. The speakers were people who used to take the Top 10 program ratings a bit too seriously. With very little knowledge of what was really going on at the three agencies involved, the experts had based their choice pieces of inside dope on the latest Top 10 radio shows. They had learned that (1) Jack Benny had dropped from first to second place; (2) Walter Winchell's rating had gone down two-tenths of a point; and (3) the Lux Theatre had "slid" from third to fourth place.

In reality, all three shows were cruising along, month after month, with ratings in the 30's. They were reaching more than 12,000,000 homes apiece. The fact that Edgar Bergen may have edged Benny by a point or two, putting him at the top of the list, meant little to Benny, or to his sponsor. But the dire conclusions drawn from this change of position were symptomatic of that era in radio, with its obsession that program ratings were the sine qua non of every show, every artist. That obsession got started with Crossley, persisted through Hooperatings, then Nielsen; even today, a few of its diehards give it lip service.

I say "even today" because a slow revolution has taken place in radio and television audience measurement. Advertisers, agencies and broadcasters have come to realize that despite the fundamental importance of accurate ratings, the concept of ratings as the be-all and the end-all, in evaluating a show, is on the way out. And equally, the ranking of a show in the Top 10 list may have very little to do with its intrinsic strength, or coverage, or penetration of the audience.

Other Dimensions

So, instead of looking only at ratings or rankings, the user of radio or TV time now examines a dozen other dimensions of his program's audience. Research, 1952-style, gives him the answer to these down-to-earth questions: What's my cost-per-thousands? How many homes do I reach in a week, a month? How often does the average home listen in a week, or a month? How long do they stay tuned to each show? How many of them hear my commercials? What's the audience among upper income homes? In the northeast? In the southwest? Among small families? In TV homes? In radio-only homes? In small-town and rural areas? Where do I stand during the 3rd minute of the show? The 16th minute? The 28th? How many homes that tune to my daytime radio strip also get my message during my evening TV show? And furthermore, how's my competition doing on all these points?

This who-what-when-where-how concept in radio and TV research has finally moved into the very fabric of time-buying and program selection and promotion and the allocation of the advertising dollar. Along Rockefeller Plaza and Madison Avenue, and in the home offices of the country's biggest advertisers, the answers to that great variety of questions are being skilfully utilized to solve marketing problems.

The producer and the writer, too, have much to learn from some aspects of analytical data. One of the newest trends in quantitative measurement is that it may be used qualitatively. The minute-by-minute profile, the ratio between audience at the start and audience at the close of the show, the progressive flow of listeners or viewers in and out of the program—all these have been used by our own clients for guidance in the selection of talent, scripts, subject matter and timing.

Every now and then, in the pages of VARIETY, you'll read of a TV program, with a 21 rating, that was dropped (it failed to hold its audience throughout each show); you'll hear of a radio series, in the Top 10, that was shifted to another time period (to give the sponsor a lower cost-per-thousand homes); you'll discover that a big advertiser was juggling his entire schedule of shows (they weren't paralleling his marketing pattern). Those are some of the overt signs of the quiet revolution in audience research that has taken place in the industry.

Well, you ask, why does Nielsen continue to release the Top 10 lists? Because, experience has shown, everyone in the trade, including our non-subscribers, seems to be anxious to learn who's on top, who made the high marks, who are the select 10 out of 200.

Today's Greater Responsibility For the Radio Writer

By IRA MARION

(Eastern Region V. P., Radio Writers Guild)

Despite the "obituaries" printed for radio, the hardy rascal refuses to stay buried. This has been reflected in many ways, not the least of which has been the increase in Radio Writers' Guild membership and the recent rise in the collection of dues. Certainly we at the Guild have no illusions about the effect that TV has on AM. We meet it every day. A large majority of our members are working TV writers. But we cannot agree that AM's condition is "mortal."

It is becoming more and more clear, from where we sit, that the true effect of TV on AM is to raise the standards of radio well above what they have been in the recent past. Competition has forced broadcasters and advertisers to produce programs which will attract listeners and hold ratings even at hours when TV is strongest. Certainly we can cite the quality of shows like "Halls of Ivy," "Theatre Guild of the Air," "The Big Show," "Dragnet," "Mr. President," "Ozzie and Harriet," "Stage 52"—the list is growing constantly. Obviously, "anything goes" is no longer a truism. Acting, production, writing on a level hitherto heard only on the socalled "arty sustainers": "Studio One" (in AM), "Columbia Workshop" (of blessed memory), "World Security Workshop," and "New World A-Coming," are becoming standard in commercial radio. The effect of this trend on the loudspeaker-output in the nation's living rooms needs no comment. What this will do to the quality of television programs is a question which the future, and the listening public, will determine.

In the midst of it all, of course, is the "originating authority": the radio writer. For years, writers have beefed, wailed and cried out generally against the watered-down hack type of writing which passed for entertainment in AM. Now, the opportunity seems to be here. Words-without-pictures must be truly image-forming, if they are to offer keen competition to pictures-with-words-attached. Style, clarity, intelligence, wit are becoming necessities in radio. It follows, then, that the writer has his work cut out for him, not only to achieve the new standards, but to slough off the habits of years engendered by the market in which he has worked. The present high quality of so many shows is a definite indication that the writers are responding (and well) to the new demands.

A paragraph in the Minimum Basic Agreement between the Guild and the four networks states in part: "It is mutually recognized that a writer is a creative professional employee and as such shall use his best efforts to maintain and improve the professional quality of his work and of radio writing in general . . . " It states, in unequivocal terms, the responsibility of both writer and employer. This paragraph was one of the bases for the recent arbitration award to the Radio Writers Guild, which removed the so-called "morals clause" from writers' contracts. In living up to this MBA clause, writers in radio accept their responsibility in the period of change which TV has brought about. Only by continuing to improve the quality of radio in general and of radio writing in particular will the broadcasters and the writers both provide the quality of program which will maintain radio as the tremendous force for the continued growth of our free American culture which it can and will be.

In the swiftly changing world of which we are a part, all writers have a grave responsibility. Radio writers have accepted responsibilities in great crises in the past. They will continue to do so today and in the future.

Al Jarvis Moves to ABC Radio-TV on 7-Yr. Deal; Guaranteed $2,000 Wkly.

Hollywood.

Al Jarvis, who had a year to go on his seven-year deal as mainstay of the KLAC radio-video programming. Moves Jan. 28 to KECA on an exclusive radio-video deal with ABC, which guarantees him $2,000 weekly. First three years are firm, with cancellation privileges belonging to the net thereafter.

Jarvis was given a release to negotiate with the network execs and pacts are being inked after three weeks. Understood Jarvis nixed NBC and other indie stations because of the possibility of having his daily programs relayed cross-country. Acting for ABC were Don Tatum, western division tele director; Phil Hoffman, manager of KECA-TV, and Amos Barn, manager of KECA.

Under his agreement with KLAC, the members of his organization who've worked with him for years on both tele and radio remain with KLAC as the framework for Jarvis' replacement. ABC deal calls for two hours of radio and two hours of video five days weekly.

On KLAC and KLAC-TV, Jarvis reportedly received around $1,750 weekly for 50 hours. He can better a $2,000 guarantee at ABC on a percentage payoff of sponsored time and complete network spread. Getting paid either a guarantee or percentage, whichever is greater. He'll do the same type show which has won consistently high ratings.

Less In Common Than You Think

By NEAL ARDEN

I recently got in from England, a little island where television happened around 1936, and where at the end of December, 1951, it is still struggling along. No giant networks there—no powerful sponsors to maintain giant networks there—you might say not much there—except, perhaps, one important thing—a thorough grasp of what television is and, also important, what it is not.

We know that television is not cinema, not legitimate theatre, not vaudeville, not radio. Radio, specifically, it is not. That is why I stand amazed at the number of people who, admitting this, still treat TV as if it were radio. So far as I can see, there is no reason why anyone should ever have thought that television was radio with pictures, except for the fact that both are transmitted over the air.

Only this week a man we will call Sam, and for whose integrity and brain I have the highest regard, said to me. "That talk about television and radio being so very different . . that's for the birds. Television and radio," he continued, "have many meeting grounds; for instance, both require a story line; both require actors and actresses; the actors both need dialog; a director is a necessary evil to both mediums, and that's enough similarities for anyone."

Taking his first point, "TV and radio both require a story line." Of course—and so do movies, theatre, novels and Fuller brush salesmen. But each adapts the story to its own needs. "TV and radio," said Sam, "both require performers." But a fat old actor with youth in his voice can play in radio the part of a young hero. What happens when you see him? Further, the dialog you give an actor in radio is very different from the dialog you give him in the same situation on TV. In radio, on confronting his rival in love, the actor says . . . "In my hand I'm holding a six-gun—when I count 10 I'm going to shoot you." In television you see that he's holding a six-gun.

As to Sam's fourth point that both mediums require directors, this can be countered by the statement that, given the essential attributes of directors, namely showmanship, experience in the medium, perception and sensitivity, the radio director's main need, to be completely equipped, is a sensitive pair of ears. In addition to all of these, however, the TV director needs eyes in the back of his head, nimble feet, a strong voice, and a commanding aspect. He has to understand camera angles—where to aim the darn things, sight and sound perspective, pictorial composition, matching of sight and sound so that if a character is far away his voice will be soft, and if near loud; he must be a master of focus and the use of the four different lenses with which most cameras are now fitted; of film editing, which he has to do in TV as he goes along, and the use of the Zoomar lens.

However, in the realm of sound, which of course is part of television, the radio man excels. When I first got to this country I spent many enjoyable days and nights monitoring all the TV I could set my eyes on. One thing stood out—TV shows having a production team with a radio background seemed to have really fine sound quality, better than those teams coming mainly from theatre, even movies

Therefore I would say that the ideal TV producer or director has a background of radio which will give him command over his use of sound—background of the legitimate theatre which will give him a complete sense of the effectiveness of his scenes in continuity. Continuity, that's the word, because exactly as in the theatre, television show having begun cannot, as in a movie studio, be stopped and a scene re-shot, but must inexorably continue to its end regardless of breakdowns, actors fluffing their lines, or mistakes on the part of any one of the people making up the TV team. To this extent, therefore, TV is part of theatrical technique. But because it is seen on a screen and because the performers in television must use much the same technique as in movies, as must its writers, and because TV is a matter less of words than of movement, it is to this extent a part of film technique.

Amazing Progress in 2 Years

When I visited New York two years ago, I freely admit it did seem to me at the time that the BBC-TV in London were slightly ahead of New York in production technique.

I wrote, for instance, for the London Star about a famous American show . . . "for all the difference in angles they might as well only have used one camera in place of three. Long shots, medium shots and close shots were shown us—but these in themselves are useless to vary the picture unless the producer can provide some lateral variation as well . . ." Now in 1951 I would go all the way with Leonard Moseley of the London Daily Express, who recently wrote in the highest praise of American TV. At the same time, I believe he is wrong in his estimation of the BBC-TV, which he dismissed with the words: "programs look as if they were produced by blind men stumbling around on their knees . ." What does he mean . . stumbling on their knees? The clothing situation in Britain is still far too bad to allow of any such eccentricity. No, as Sam would say, "That's for the birds."

Radio is not television. I've observed glaring examples of this fact in two assignments with which I've been honored since coming here. It certainly is an honor for a stranger to be called in by one of the biggest advertising agencies in New York and asked to re-create one of its ideas. It makes me very glad that what I was able to do not only completely satisfied them as well as their client, but also because it will, I hope, strengthen in some small measure cooperation between our two countries. There was nothing wrong with their original show except that it had been conceived in terms of radio and not in terms of television. Having put this matter straight, it was very simple to turn out a show on their original idea, which was in any case "wizard."

At about the same time another agency came to me with a script based on another excellent television idea. They asked why they were unable to sell it for television. The answer was again of the simplest, but somehow they hadn't seen it in that light previously—it was a radio script they were trying to photograph, with the consequence the idea was "dead" from the start.

Looking Back

By ERIC FAWCETT
(Producer, BBC Television)

London.

The phone rang yesterday. Somebody in Film Section wanted to know what shots I anticipated using for "still and moving back-projection" during the next 12 months. It's the kind of question that only a TV producer would be expected to answer. If I'd turned round and asked in which parts of the world our cameramen will be next year I'd have got the "How do I know?", but that's service departments—you work for them!

But it set me thinking—thinking back over 22 years of TV.

In these days of back-projection and "electronic inlay and overlay" it seems but yesterday that I was a song-and-dance man in James Logie Baird's little studio in Long Acre. That 1929 studio putting out its little shows of singers, conjurers and comics—all single acts until somebody discovered that duets were possible if the artists lay on the floor—was little larger than my present office. At one end was a little stage some two feet high upon which we performed, while, through stygian gloom, a ray of light—the scanning beam—flickered on and around us. The studio was so small that the scanned area was only about five feet high and three feet broad. I'm sure of this because being six feet tall, I sang my songs sans feet and did my dance sans head. Which only proves that even in those days, as a performer, I was too big for the medium—they only needed small fry!

Land-To-Ocean Transmission

With those early 30-line transmissions Baird had already spanned the Atlantic and transmitted a program to the Berengaria in mid-ocean, but it was not until he televised the Derby in 1931 that the BBC started its regular halfhour programs from Broadcasting House. These were transmitted on the broadcast band after the evening radio programs had finished.

The new studio was larger—at least 10 feet longer—and so we went to town! Double acts became quite commonplace and thanks to the mirror-drum scanner being able to pan, dancers were able to move around the floor. This was a pleasant change after the eternal "time step" and "cramp roll" routine—"over the tops" and "trenches" had always been too wide for the picture. And we used scenery. It's true that it was nothing more ambitious than black designs on a white cloth, but then, everything was black or white. We hadn't got round to greys. We whitened our faces and blackened our eyes, lips and even the sides of our noses. In fact the only features the camera noticed were the ones we painted on. At one time I grew a moustache—it helped the viewers find my mouth. They, God bless them, with their scanning disk receivers were very loyal, and gave us great encouragement.

Television got a raise. It moved from the basement to the top floor where the studio was so immense that we had room for a four-piece orchestra—any augmentations sat on the piano!—and, if I remember rightly, here we did our first play. This was produced by some of our radio drama boys. Some even acted i it. It's probably because of this that they have since become high powered executives—even the BBC has to avoid repetitions of that sort of thing—but let it be noted that do a play we did.

Two-a-Day TV In 1936

From there, in 1936, we moved to the old studios at Alexandra Palace and here we started the world's first regular twice daily high definition telecasts. We not only had two big studios, we had two systems. The Baird system, with its intermediate film and 30-second lag, was in one studio, whilst the E.M.I. system was in the other with Iconoscope cameras. They were both on trial and in the end E.M.I. won. Artists preferred the Baird gear because they could dash off the set, see the end of their act and applaud their own curtain calls, but the engineers hated it and program staff found it unwieldy. Everyone regretted that the pioneer who had proved the whole thing possible should lose out in the end, but Baird was already experimenting with color and probably didn't worry about it as much as we did. He left us to our troubles with scenery, properties, lighting and copyrights and went back to his laboratory, from which he emerged in 1941 with the best stereoscopic color we've yet seen. In fact, it's the same color principle that we are now using for training medical students in our hospitals.

But that's jumping way ahead and missing all the excitement of the 1936-39 years when we built up the Television Service as it is today with its plays, films, talks, quizzes and variety shows. Even Danny Kaye played for us then—though he wasn't Danny Kaye in those days. It was during this time that "Picture Page" started. It's still going strong—viewers won't let it die, so its claim to be the world's oldest regular TV program looks like going on forever. Theatre managers weren't scared of us then and Wardour Street rented us films so we did lots of remotes from theatres and revelled in Walt Disney shorts.

We learned about superimpositions and did the famous "Fugue for Four Cameras" in which a ballet dancer does a pas de quatre with herself. Very exciting, then!

Much more exciting then than our modern productions can ever be in spite of multi-studios, floor tanks, turret lenses and back projection (I must remember to ring that fellow up!) But the trickiest thing to produce was, and still is, true television variety. I mean the intimate kind played solely for, and to, the home viewer. Even after all these years, we have only two or three comedians capable of this kind of work. So, willy-nilly, we are adopting the old get-out of using an audience in the studio. We know it's not true television, because the home viewer is merely eavesdropping on an audience enjoying themselves in some other place, but, as in radio, it makes the acts sound better than they are and it's the easiest way out of the problem. The way we're going we shall soon be building 3,000-seater studios to accommodate the viewers who are no longer content to stay at home and watch—and then, look out TV!! Because one day some clever guy is going to take away the cameras—and we'll all find ourselves back in the theatre.

Only the Beginning

ordinary lifetime before television's advent.

The ever-increasing role that television is playing in our national defense effort is but one facet of its diversity. As an industrial tool, it has already proved itself effective. In medicine its results have been spectacular.

In any and all fields it has an inherent quality of honesty. As a matter of fact, it emphasizes honesty and shows up any deviation therefrom in bold relief. It separates the wheat from the chaff. It picks out the sheep from the goats. It differentiates the phoney from the genuine.

There have been no better illustrations of that quality than during the past year, and as recently as November. In crime hearings and political campaigns, television displayed an unerring ability to sift insincerity and demagoguery.

The results of some of the recent political campaigns already have been attributed to this quality of television. Already, politicians, high and low, at local and national levels, are wondering and planning. They are wondering what television is going to do for them in 1952. They are planning to avoid or make use of its unerring ability to distinguish the demagog from the statesman.

I cannot help but look ahead to 1952 and succeeding years when the honesty of television is put to work in earnest in the cause of good, clean, honest government and a return to the fundamentals of the American enterprise system.

It is conceivable, too, that in the working of that accomplishment, television at its efficient best will fill our halls of Congress with statesmen, and our state and local offices with men whose greatest desire is to serve the public interest and welfare by means of the application of honesty and sincerity.

With that a reality, television could move forward, unhampered, for fulfillment of its destiny in the full and complete service of mankind, and mean a reestablishment of all those principles held in esteem by honest people.

Pen in Other Hand

certainly in dramatic programming—this must be the director. It is my firm belief that a consistent bettering of creative imagination can occur in no other way.

I can give an example only at a personal level. I believe that the technical crew which produces 'Studio One' is the best I have seen in the industry, and best for one very important reason. From top to bottom, it is working for one end only—to give the director what he wants. Frequently, as a result, it puts out a picture which may be, by engineering standards, less than perfect. It is representative, however, of the mood that the director has conceived. Again and again cameras on the floor perform moves that look at first to be impossible, only because the standard is that no one ever says "no."

Such morale and such collaboration is impossible except where the director is in direct and intimate and mutually respectful communication with every member of his crew. It the result be bad, the director is the one to be fired, not the crew. No effort should ever be made to cover a bad director. He should be exposed ruthlessly and deliberately. It is only in this way that the best creative talent can ever reach the top. Wherever a mathematical electronic standard is given authority over creative imagination, the result can only be competent and secure mediocrity. It will do for fixed, or semi-mobile cameras on variety shows in a theatre, for boxing, and such. It is a leaden weight around the neck of anyone trying to produce first rate dramatic television. I believe firmly, after 12 years i the medium, that it is impossible for a director to do any truly great creative work without direct and constant contact with his cameras.

They are, after all, the pen in the other hand.

'Wrong Way Ferrin'

By FRANK FERRIN

Hollywood.

A lot of the boys around the Brown Derby, and even my old playmates around Chicago's Pump Room and Manhattan's "21" who still remember "Wrong Way Corrigan," have dubbed me "Wrong Way Ferrin."

Why, they keep asking, does a guy who has been doing all right as a television film producer, suddenly reverse the field and run against the herd to become a producer of films for the motion picture theatre? (I should slip the commercial in here and state that I have just returned from South India where I produced "Gunga Ram" as a feature for theatres.)

But it's good question, as Archie says, and one which I shall answer in due time—and my own time, I might add.

Everybody in films is trying to get into TV, they point out solicitously, as if questioning my reasoning.

Well, I've got theory. Of course, everybody in this cockeyed show business has a theory. Name me one guy who hasn't got a theory, and I'll venture a guess that his agent already has him signed up for a long run, non-cancellable, at Forest Lawn.

But my theory is that television or anything else that comes down the pike is not going to doom the American film-house. Certainly, adjustments will have to be made, but the public will continue to insist on going to theatres to see good films. When radio came along it didn't knock out films, as everyone predicted—nor did it kill newspapers, magazines, recordings or bridge. A lot of the weeping Willies sold their theatres for a song, then, and have often wished since that they had waited for one more chorus before selling out so cheap.

I've been reading VARIETY as something more than a casual bystander for much of my adult life. I've been around show biz and in the advertising field where I have sold the public everything from breakfast cereal to shoes—still am selling 'em, as a matter of fact. Add to that the fact that I have produced and directed over 25 TV films these past two years—the Smilin' Ed McConnell shows which racked up a neat 24.6 rating—and maybe I haven't learned everything there is to know, but I have learned one thing: that the public wants good films and will pay to see them in the local theatres.

So Where's The Trend?

I think more new theatres will be built despite TV just as theatres were built when radio came along, and new daily papers started out, and some fairly important magazines like Life and Look started doing pretty well.

This interest in films doesn't apply to America only, I might add. In India I found people travelling a full day by bullock cart to see a movie in a village tent theatre. They'd spend the night there, and another day returning to their homes. But no matter how tough it was they'd travel to see such entertainment.

Speaking of India, you know that country is the greatest producer of motion picture film in the world next only to the United States? It's difficult for Americans or any foreign-speaking natives to make a film there because of language differences, foreign customs, money exchange problems, transportation and other headaches. But once our group was there, and the government officials saw that we knew what we were doing, that we were honest and would pay our bills, they gave us 100% cooperation, and we found India to be a film maker's paradise. Every place we turned we found color, atmosphere, spectacle and action such as Hollywood could never duplicate, no matter what the budget. For instance, we landed in Mysore just before the Dasara Festival, which is the most vivid spectacle I have ever witnessed. Painted elephants dressed in gold brocade and studded with jewels paraded among thousands of uniformed Indians i the courtyard of the Maharajah's fairy-tale palace. We photographed this event in color—a lucky break if ever there was one, just as were the stampede of hundreds of wild elephants, the jungle fire and other great moments that were never in our original script.

All of this is compounded by the fact that if it hadn't been for my television experience, for the knowledge gained through years of advertising American products at American people, plus know-how Hollywood cameramen, and cooperative Indian help, we would never have been able to lens 20,000 feet of color film in 28 shooting days.

So we're back with the footage for "Gunga Ram." They may call me "Wrong Way Ferrin," these guys who think TV is the only medium and movies are through, but my dough and my time are riding on the bet that the motion picture theatre is here to stay. Maybe one of these days I'll make the wise guys change it to "Fearless Frank Ferrin."

The sign of good television

When this symbol shines out from a television screen, it identifies, for viewers and advertisers alike, the network where they're most likely to find what they're looking for:

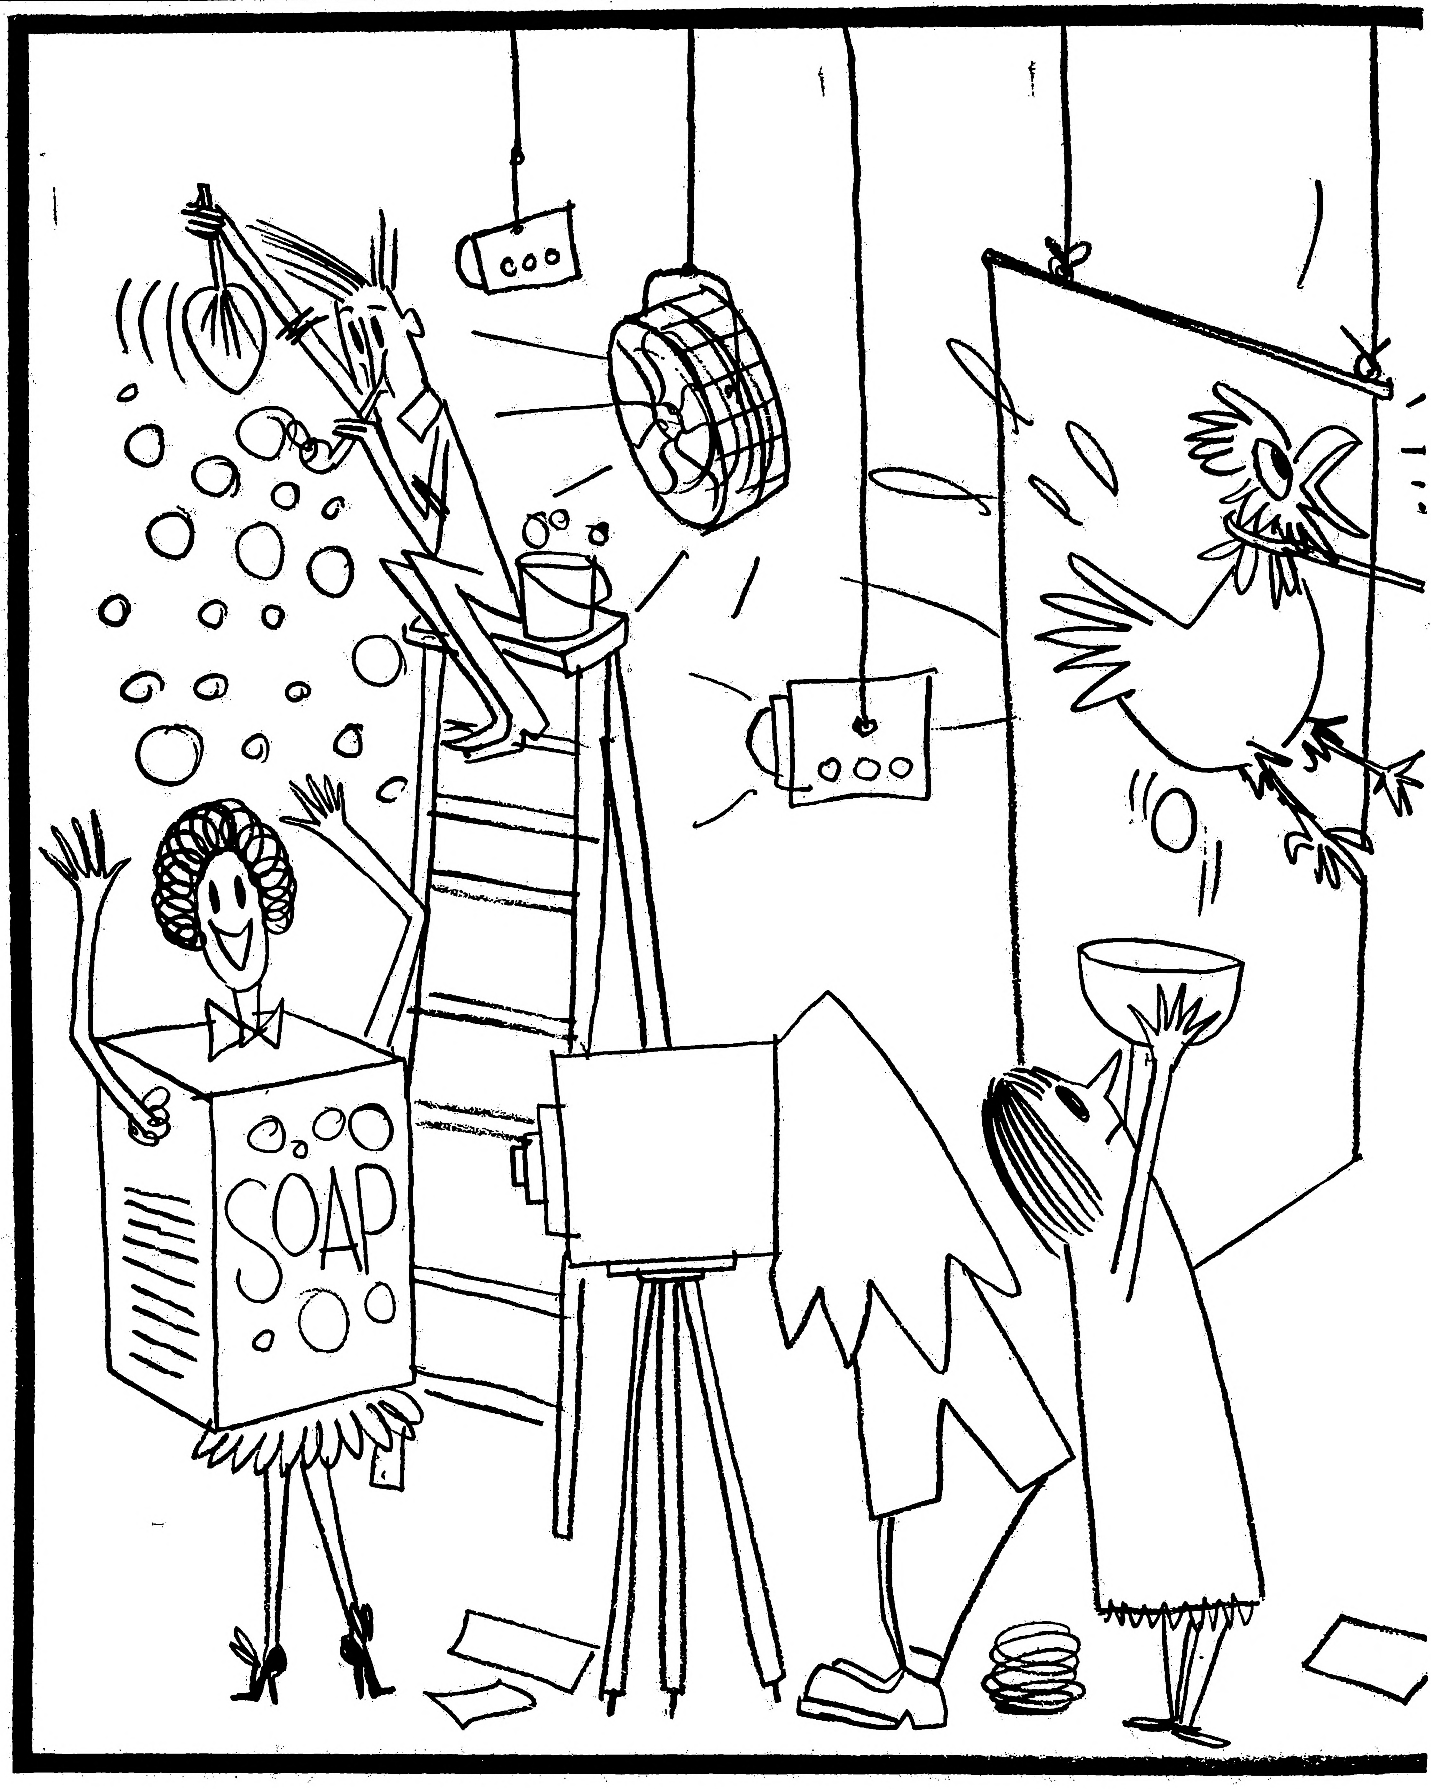
...where television's most successful package programs come from

...chosen by 103 national advertisers in 1951... including 9 of America's 10 biggest

...reaching its audiences at a cost-per-thousand homes over 20% less than in 1950

...and reaching its audiences at a lower cost-per-thousand than any other network.

"This is The CBS Television Network"



You can get too fascinated!

Doing TV commercials is a fascinating business.

In some ways, it can be too fascinating.

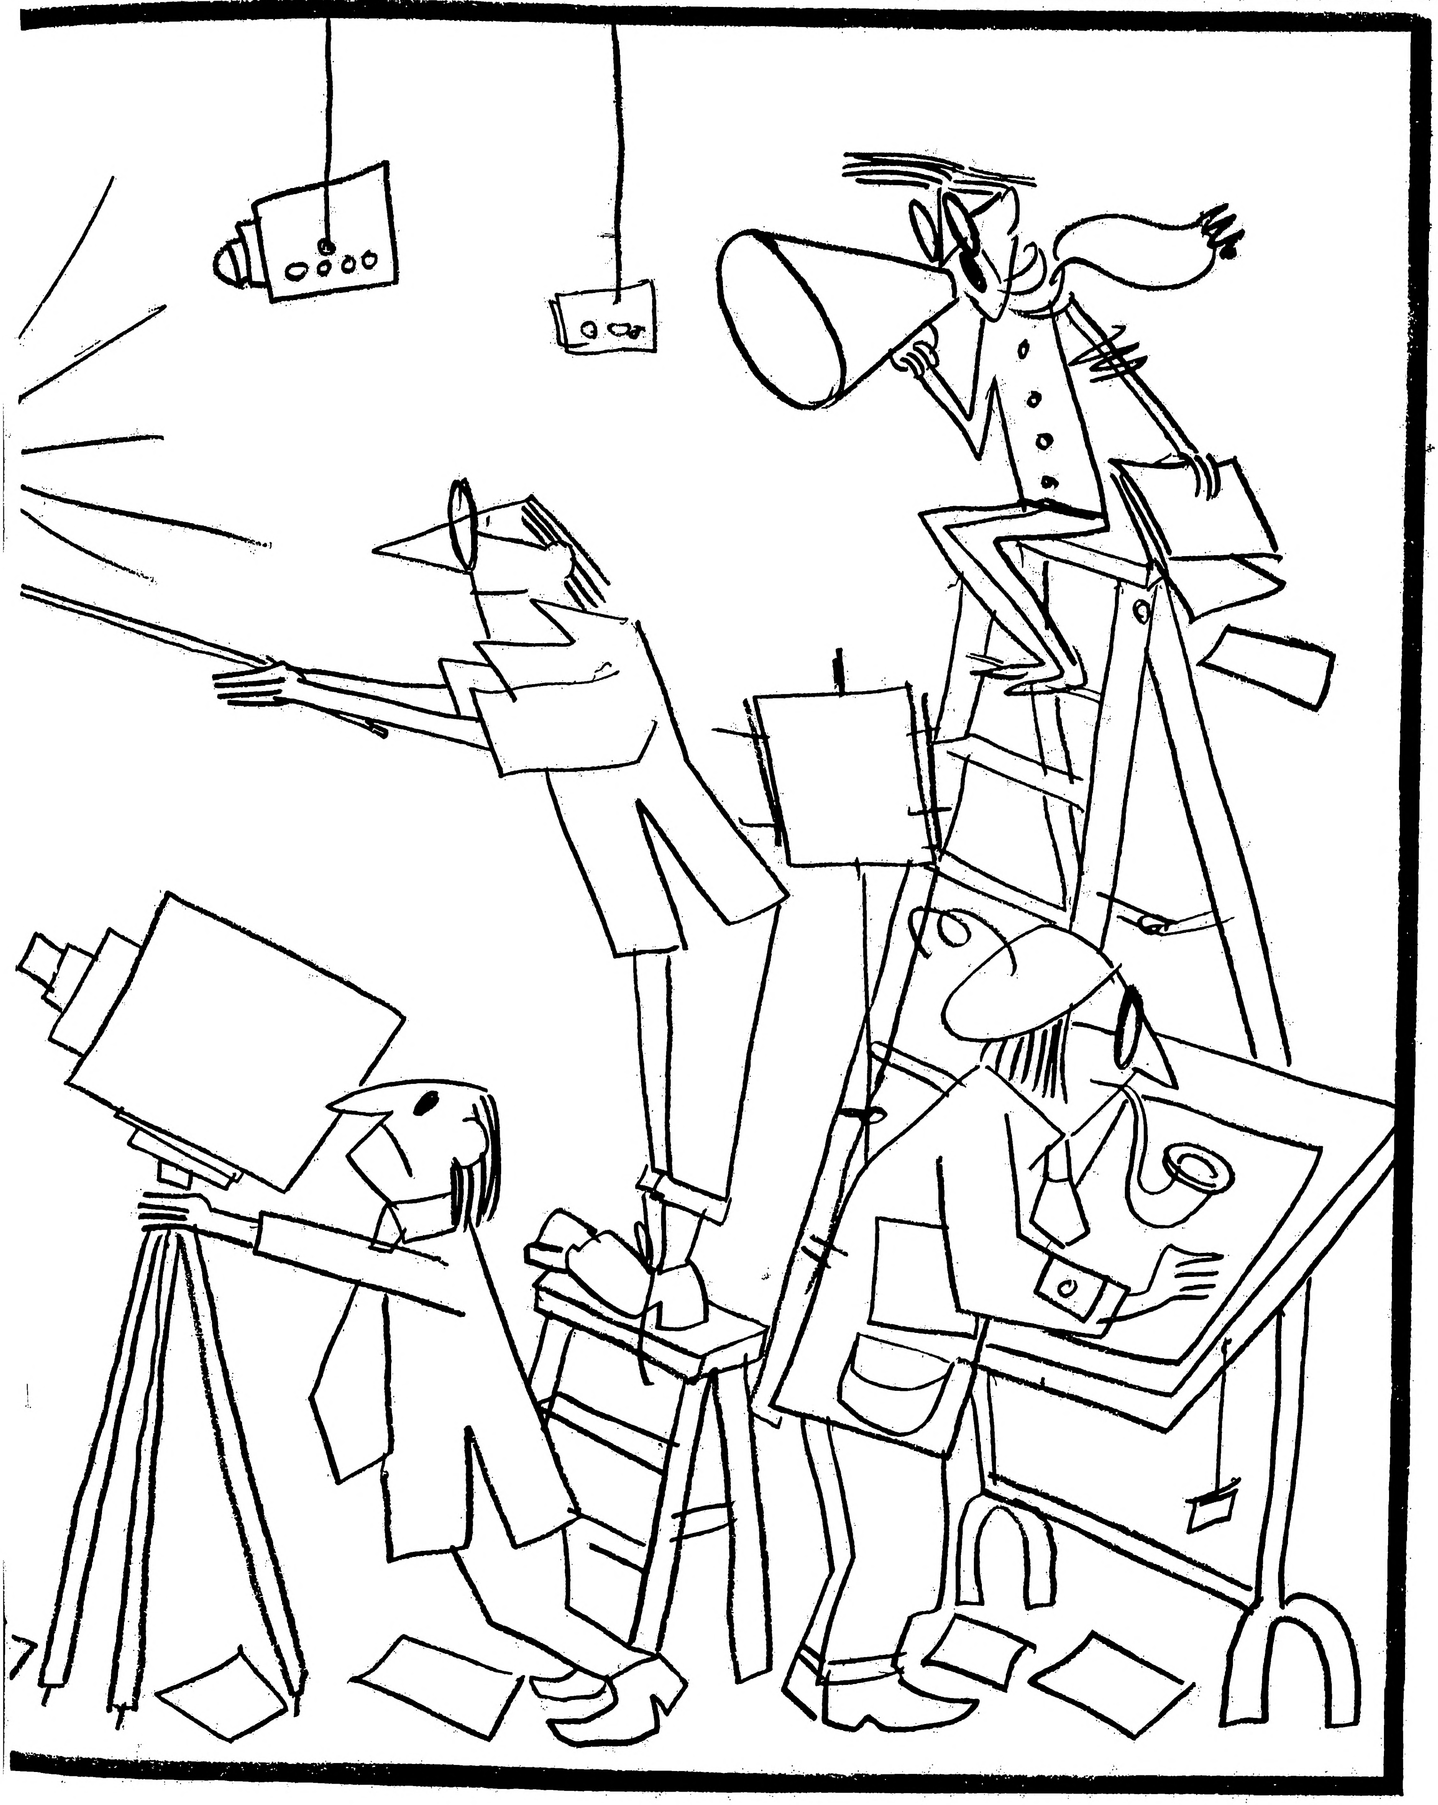
That is, a lot of people get so excited about barn-door wipes, supered words, zoomar lenses and stop motion that they forget what the main point of TV really is.

The main point, of course, is selling. Good, simple, clear-cut selling.

Frankly, we're very proud of the way McCann-Erickson commercials sell.



Here's an example:

A McCann-Erickson client with a big-time TV show recently made a special check on his retail sales. He found that as a result of one program in one market, he sold $161,672 worth of merchandise in one week—at an advertising cost of only 2%.

One reason these advertisers choose ABC Television is because it is the only network that owns and operates television stations in five of the nation's seven top retail markets. Also, because ABC has gigantic production facilities that no other network can match—Television Centers in both New York and Hollywood.

VIDEO...SCHMIDEO!

What
we seek is sales!

The only fast dollies in our shop

TELEVISION's grown up awfully fast, and a whole new language with it. Barn doors we've got, and balops and swipes and all manner of dissolves.

Sometimes you can't see the video for the hideo (or the forest for the trees).

What we mean is, the language is all very well--even rather amusing--but it shouldn't obscure the basic reason for using television as an advertising medium. And the basic reason our clients (P. Lorillard Company, Colgate-Palmolive-Peet Company, Lehn & Fink Products Corp., and Tide Water Associated Oil Company) use television is to increase sales.

So, without so much as an interrupted zoom, we point with some pride to the record: Five years of steadily increasing activity in television. More shows each year. More billing. More clients.

Because what we get in television is sales.

P.S. Our billing in radio is higher than ever, too, and this comes from knowing how to use radio and how to make it pay off. And the number of listeners per dollar we deliver to our clients might open your eyes!

EDDIE CANTOR'S 42nd YEAR—and still at it!

Television

"The Cantor production was just about all Cantor . . . he was always in there working hard, driving home the point, the joke, the effect. The veteran comic demonstrated that he not only can hold his own with the best of the new crop of TV talent, but in fact, sparked a production that was as fresh, scintillating and beautifully coordinated as video has seen this season."

—Weekly Variety

"Eddie Cantor celebrated his 42nd year as an entertainer by doing as fine a show as he has ever done anywhere regardless of the medium. He and the Colgate Comedy Hour put Hollywood into the TV bigtime for fair. . . ."

—Hollywood Reporter

" . . . Few entertainers can hold down a stage for the better part of an hour with his spirit and aplomb. . . . . It was Cantor at his best, and that's TV at its best. . .

—Daily Variety

"I haven't, of course, seen all the TV shows ever produced, but I never saw a better one than Eddie Cantor unveiled on Sunday night. . . ."

—Pittsburgh Press

"Eddie Cantor came back with 'Comedy Hour' on Sunday, putting the accent on 'good old days' and singing the songs that made him famous. . . . He ended with his familiar 'I Love to Spend This Hour With You.' Believe me, Eddi , the sentiment is mutual."

—San Francisco Exami

Radio

"Nobody on the American show business scene could make this type of nostalgic cavalcade come off as did Cantor . . . nobody but Cantor could have gripped the interest as he did. . . . He has a perfect, clear and fast track for his half-hour stint that augurs high showmanship."

—Weekly Variety

"Cantor spins old records—Helen Morgan, Cliff Edwards, John Barrymore—and reminisces about his associations with these and other great names. His anecdotes are warm and colorful. It's fun to hear the records too. . . . "

—N. Y. World Telegram and Sun

"Listening to Cantor is like having him in your living room talking about the stage and its people. You don't want to let him go, so as the next best thing you'll have to tune him in every Sunday night, and that's what millions will do. . . . "

DON LEE GIVES COMPLETE, CONSISTENT LOCAL COVERAGE OF THE PACIFIC COAST AT LOWEST COST PER SALES IMPRESSION OF ANY OTHER SALES MEDIA

A big statement...true, and it takes a big network to accomplish it. Don Lee (and only Don Lee) has 45 stations in 45 important Pacific Coast markets. Don Lee consistently sells your customers from their own local network station in their own local market. You can buy Don Lee according to your distribution pattern. There's no waste. That's real flexibility and real value and only Don Lee can offer it.

Don Lee consistently carries more Pacific Coast regional business than any other network. The advertisers who know the Pacific Coast best also know the best Pacific Coast advertising buy—DON LEE.

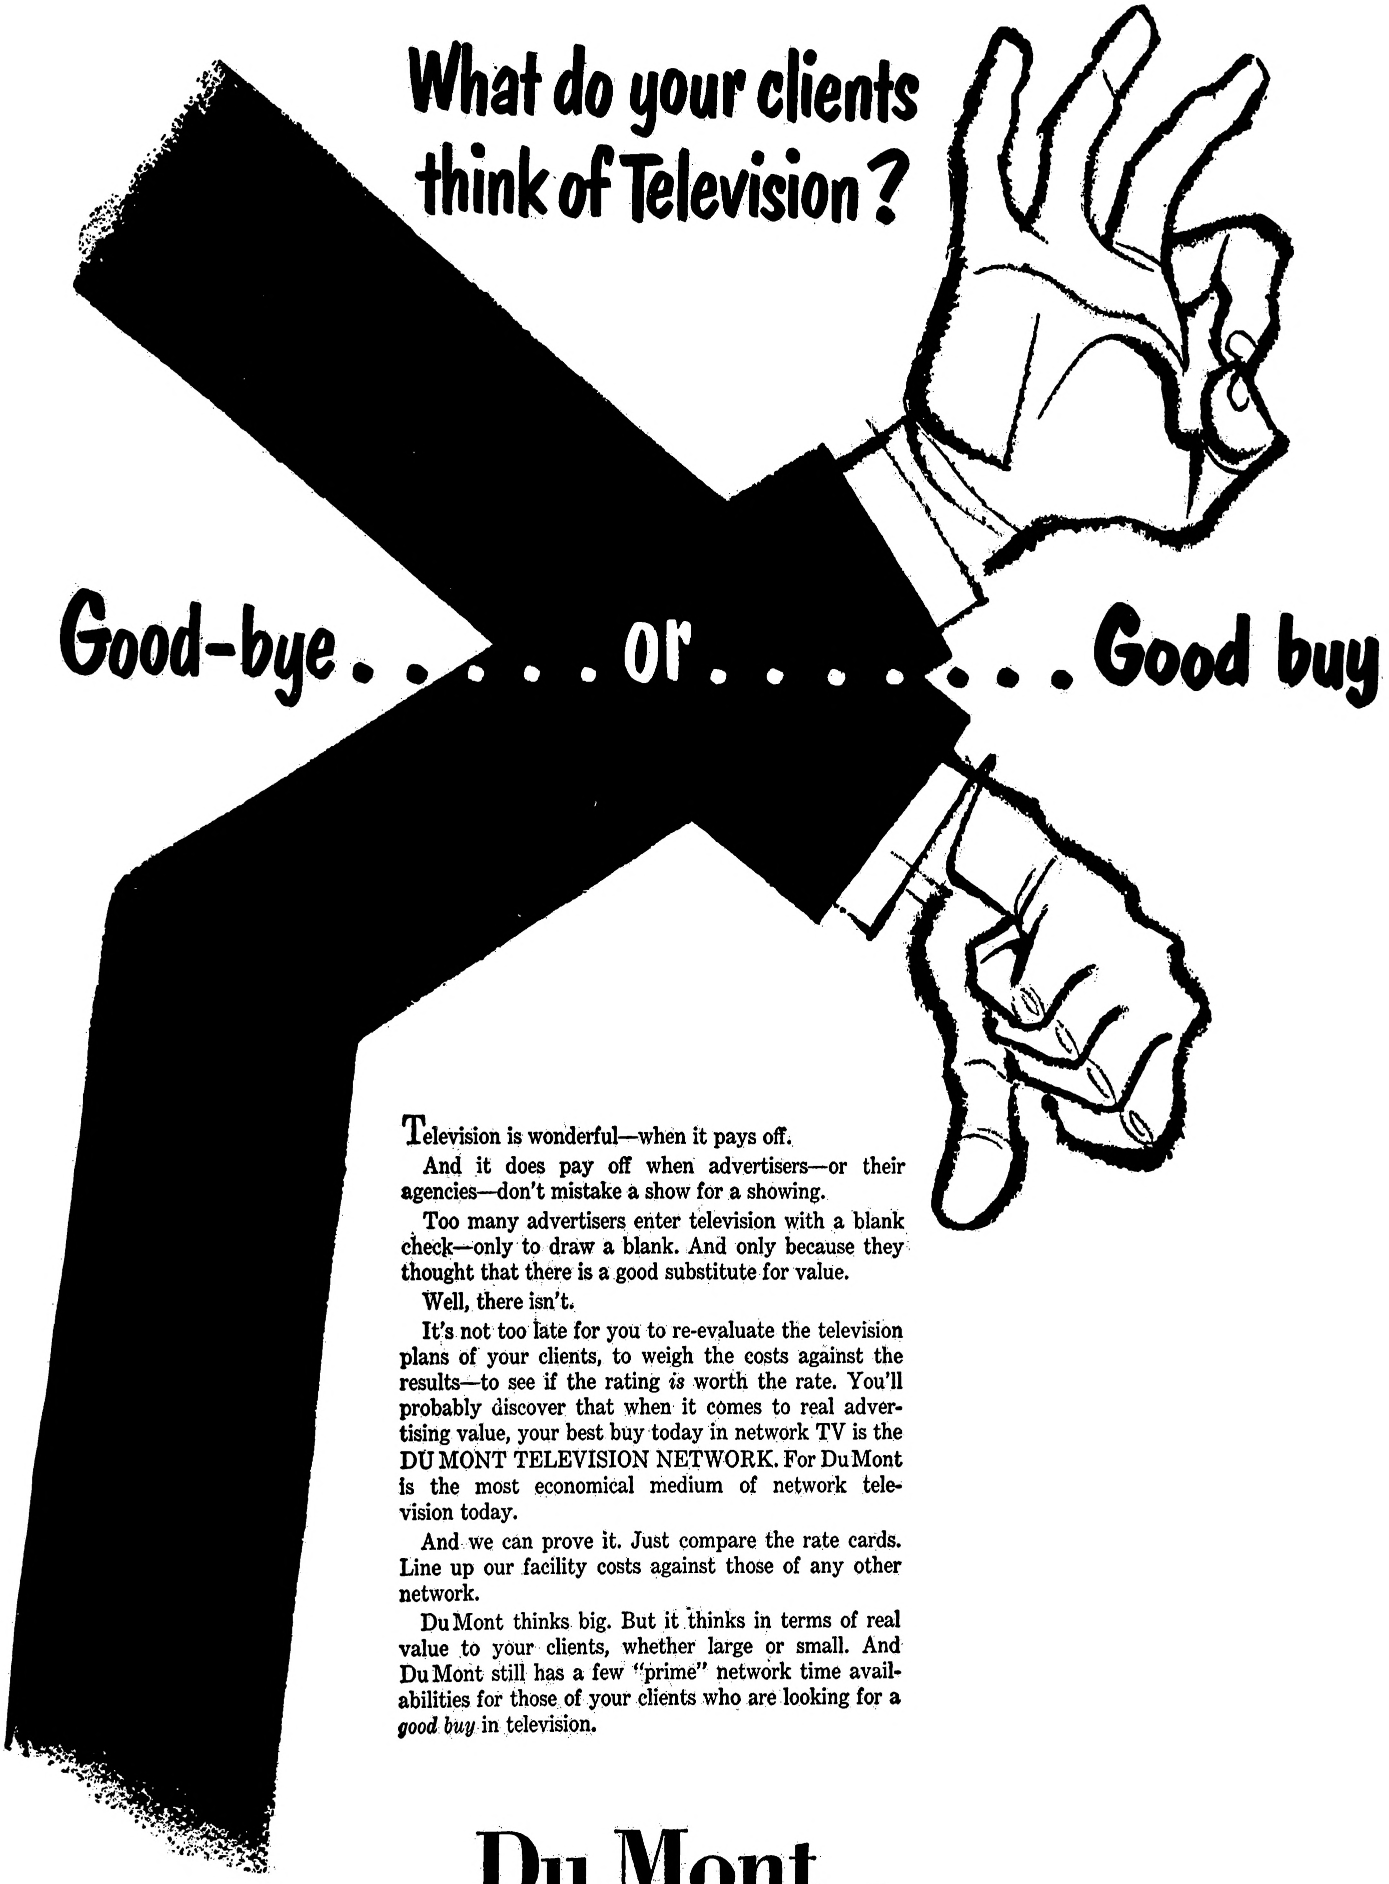
What do your clients think of Television?



Television is wonderful—when it pays off.

And it does pay off when advertisers—or their agencies—don't mistake a show for a showing.

Too many advertisers enter television with a blank check—only to draw a blank. And only because they thought that there is a good substitute for value.

Well, there isn't.

It's not too late for you to re-evaluate the television plans of your clients, to weigh the costs against the results—to see if the rating is worth the rate. You'll probably discover that when it comes to real advertising value, your best buy today in network TV is the DU MONT TELEVISION NETWORK. For Du Mont is the most economical medium of network television today.

And we can prove it. Just compare the rate cards. Line up our facility costs against those of any other network.

Du Mont thinks big. But it thinks in terms of real value to your clients, whether large or small. And Du Mont still has a few "prime" network time availabilities for those of your clients who are looking for a good buy in television.

WHAT is Back of THIS RECORD?

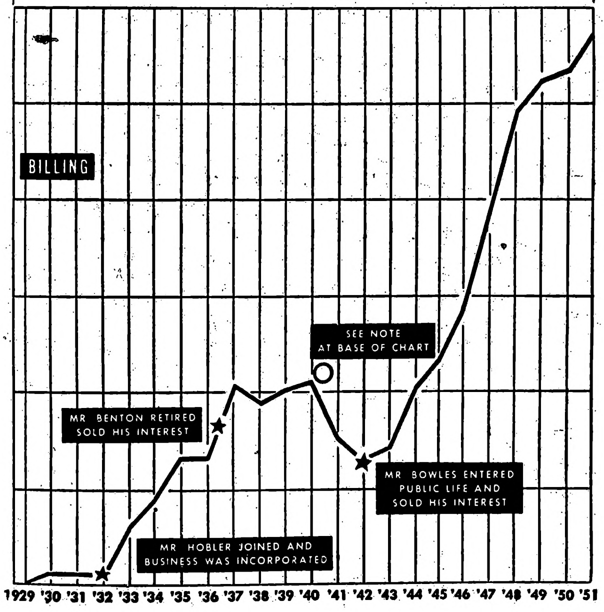
Of 30 Products Advertised Nationally by Benton & Bowles 25 Rank First or Second in their Fields.

GROWTH OF BENTON & BOWLES

Since 1941, over 50% of yearly increase has come from existing clients in expanding campaigns and in new assignments.



NOTE: At the end of 1940, Benton & Bowles lost the Colgate-Palmolive-Peet account and the Continental Baking account. In 1941, and shortly thereafter, these were replaced with accounts in the same fields, which are among our present clients.

OVER the last ten years B&B has grown dramatically. Our business has more than tripled and the success of our clients' business has gone hand in hand with this growth.

Behind any record of business growth like this, it is natural to expect there is some core philosophy at work and a special set of circumstances.

Both are true in our case.

Our philosophy is simple. We believe the relationship of advertiser and agency is one of the most intimate of modern business relationships. On the agency's side, it is a partnership that must far transcend an interest in purely advertising operations. It embraces an interest in the business of our clients as a whole—their products, their sales and their profits.

This philosophy is, however, a minor part of the whole story. The major factor has been our clients. We have been fortunate in having experienced clients who know their business—from product and manufacturing to merchandising and pricing. And—they appreciate and know how to use the special talents an advertising agency can bring to bear.

Over 700 People to Serve 18 Clients

We have been favored, too, by special circumstances. The actual structure of our business has helped us achieve our working philosophy. For while B&B today ranks as a large agency, now among the first seven or eight in total billing, the number of clients we serve relatively small. There are only eighteen active accounts. With over 700 people made available to this number of clients, there is, we believe, a depth of service that fits in a well-rounded way each particular client's needs. Further, due to this almost unique structure of our business, we find that the principal heads of the business can and do have daily familiarity with and active participation in the accounts we serve.

We believe this close, personal interest and knowledge by the heads of our company, supported by our large executive group and the range of facilities of a large agency, are circumstances not generally prevailing today. We are sure that this same personal concern invites the atmosphere of frankness and forthrightness which our clients have told us they appreciate in our relationship.

Advertisers interested in discussing client-agency relationships are cordially invited to get in touch with us. Many of our facilities are now sufficiently large to enable us to serve one or two additional companies without sacrifice to our present clients.

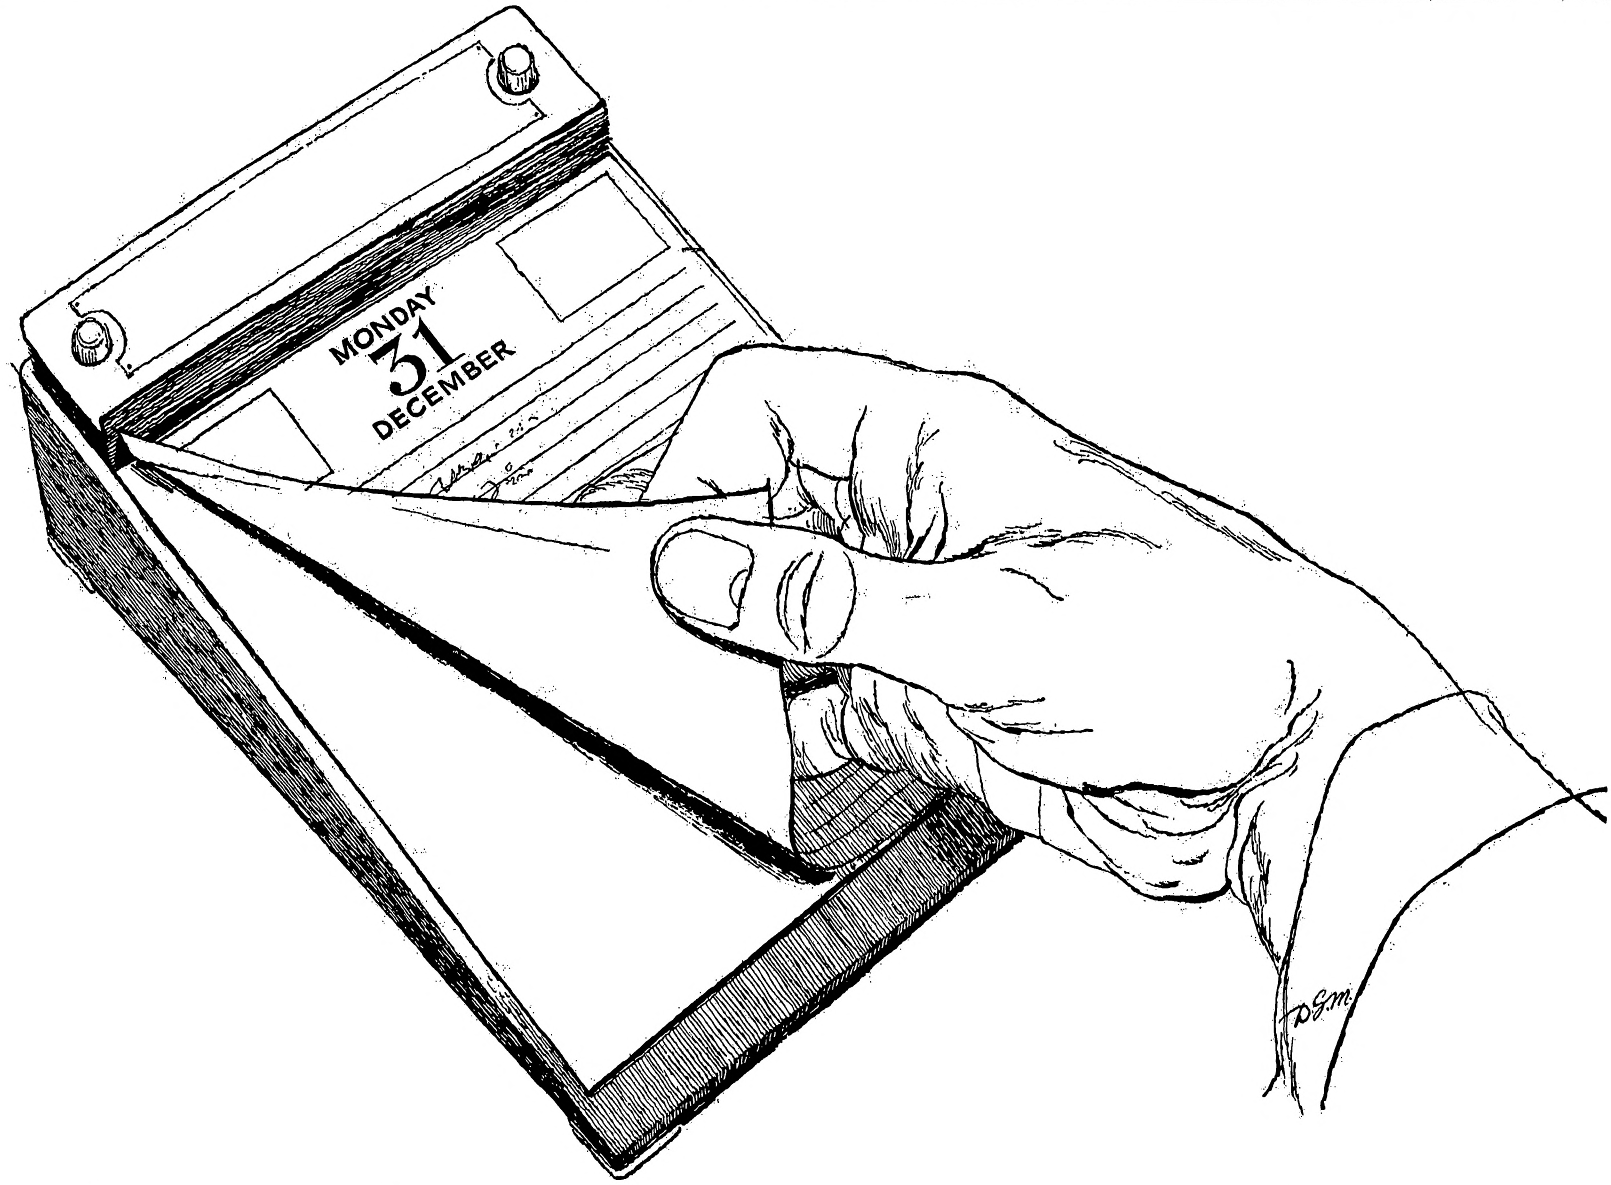
GREETINGS



As the year ends...

TRADITIONALLY, year's end is a time for taking stock, for adding up a final score.

The score at Young and Rubicam shows that again in 1951 there was a sizable increase in the amount of dollars placed through our agency with television networks and individual local stations.

It also shows that, as the year ends, Young and Rubicam is placing the following radio and television shows for its clients:

TELEVISION SHOWS

"Paul Whiteman Review" for the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, Inc.

"Young Mr. Bobbin" for the General Foods Corporation.

"Goodyear Television Playhouse" for the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, Inc.

560's the Rave Wave On WFIL-adelphia Sets!

Best 4/5 buy in Philly these days isn't 90 proof. It's WFIL's share of the city's radio audience —and it's 100 per cent proved!

Says Broadcast Measurement Bureau's latest survey: four-fifths of Philadelphia radio owners regularly set their dials to WFIL at 560 kilocycles.

That means when you schedule WFIL, 1,400,000 people are listening in the city alone. That means people with $3,682,770,000 in disposable cash hear your pitch.

And if you want to spread around a bit, count the ears lent to WFIL outside the city—in all the 14-County Retail Trading Area. Here are a million more prospects . . . another $3 billion in buying power.

And then there's the huge bonus area beyond . . . but why go on? Just remember, you're first on the dial in America's third market when you schedule WFIL.

WCBS-TV's Aft. Roster Set for Jan. Revamp

In order to clear its morning programming log with the advent of the Arthur Godfrey simulcast Jan. 7, CBS-TV is reshuffling the complete late afternoon schedule of WCBS-TV, its N. Y. flagship. Revamp dictated by the fact that the Margaret Arlen show is now aired cross-the-board from 10:30 to 11 a. m. Since the web wants to pre-empt that time to build a solid block after the Godfrey simulcast, Miss Arlen is moving into the 4:30 to 5 p. m. strip.

From Jan. 7 until Jan. 28, Miss Arlen's show will be followed by a feature film series, "Film Theatre of the Air," from 5 to 6 p. m., which will eliminate the current "Laugh Time" from the 5:30 to 6 period. Starting Jan. 28, though, "Homemaker's Exchange" is to be cancelled, Miss Arlen will move into its time from 4 to 4:30, with "Film Theatre" going 4:30 to 5:30 and "Laugh Time" returning from 5:30 to 6.

Jello Dropped Me

anatomical comparisons were made. Martha was blocking her famous "Mr. Paganini" routine when Mister and Mistress Television arrived. She came to the bit where she leans back onto the grand piano and leers hoydenishly over her portable treasure chest. "Eat your heart out, Dagmar," she ad libbed without missing a musical beat. "Reminds me of San Francisco," Pi interjected, drolly. After that show the studio audience, which is usually headed for the exits during the closing commercial, stayed in the theatre cheering until Miss Raye came out and made a curtain speech. It was electric. Backstage we could hardly believe it. At last inspiration and teamwork had slain the TV dragon, and Martha Raye was Brunhilde.

Fred Allen was next in the galaxy. Here is the entertainer's entertainer, genuine gentleman and a fountain of real wit. Rushing before the camera after a breathless 15-second costume change into a train conductor's uniform, he ad libbed, "I'm a little late. I had to wipe off the engine." Perhaps by the time this is published we will have done right by him and presented his rare talents properly. We hope so. This is a labor of love.

There was also a parade of guest stars on these various TV programs. Valerie Bettis, one of the most versatile female performers we have; the uninhibited Joan Blondell; Paulette Goddard, that rare species of film glamour girl who has genuine respect for other mediums of entertainment and is religiously five minutes early for every call; and, lastly, one of the few persons who makes one really proud to be a member of the entertainment industry, lovely Jane Froman.

So, as Richard Rodgers says, not only does show business let us do the work we enjoy the most, but it pays us for it, too. So, thank you, General Motors, Motorola, Norge, Pet Milk, Kelloggs, Snow Crop, Liggett & Myers, RCA, NBC, William Morris and thank you, J-e-l-l-o, for the drop which let me see stars.

Mpls. Eyeing Politico Campaigns With Fear; Liable for Any Slander

Minneapolis.

Radio and TV stations here are looking forward with trepidation to the forthcoming political campaigns, which are expected to be fraught with considerable heat. The apprehension is due to the Minnesota state legislature's failure to pass the Minnesota Broadcasters Assn.'s sponsored bill to give relief to them from a law which subjects the radio and TV stations, as well as the speechmaker, to court action which a political candidate, making an ether wave address, commits slander.

Nine states already have passed laws protecting the stations, it's pointed out by John Meagher, association president.

Stations are not permitted to censor any political speeches and can't even demand to see a copy of the speech in advance, and if they allow radio or TV time to one political candidate, they're required by federal law to grant the same to all his opponents, Meagher also points out.

Local stations' policy has been to talk things over with each candidate and ask him to submit the speech on a friendly basis, according to Meagher. If there's anything they consider libelous in it, he says, the station head talks the matter over some more with the candidate in an effort to induce the latter to be more tactful.

If any station here is sued, the association is prepared to back a test case in the courts, declares Meagher. He thinks that if the station can show that it did everything possible to discourage the libel, the courts would give consideration to such efforts.

Despite the risks involved, all local stations will be giving time to political talks the same as usual, both in the public interest and for the revenue they provide.

San Juan-Drake Set For MGM 'Cuban Love Song'

Alfred Drake and Olga San Juan have been set to do "Cuban Love Song," fourth in the hour-long "M-G-M Musical Comedy Theatre" series which M-G-M Radio Attractions is producing for Mutual. Fifth vehicle will be "Born to Dance," with Vera Ellen and a male star still to be selected.

Marx B. Loeb is directing the shows taped in the east. Raymond Katz is producing the airers, both in Gotham and on the Coast.

Chi Cubs Give Okay On Midwest Network

Chicago.

Despite the agitation to curtail the broadcast of major league baseball games into minor league territory, WIND has the okay from the Chicago Cubs to continue its midwest Cubs network next season, John Carey, WIND commercial manager, expects to line up some 35 outlets again for the diamond hookup.

The WIND network encompasses four states—Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin and Indiana.

Liggett & Myers for Chesterfields is again picking up the tab. Bert Wilson handles the play-by-play on the broadcasts, which include both home and road games.

San Antonio—Stan Nelson, announcer for KITE, has been named new production supervisor replacing Alec Chesser who has resigned his post with the outlet effective Jan. 1. Chesser joins Houston advertising agency.

'CELEBRITY TIME' MAY GET OFF SKELTON HOOK

CBS-TV's 9:30 to 10 slot Sunday nights, which opens up Jan. 13 when the Fred Waring show cuts back to a half-hour length, may be occupied by the B. F. Goodrich-sponsored "Celebrity Time."

"Time" is now in the 10 to 10:30 slot, where it's been taking a heavy beating in the ratings from the Red Skelton show, on the rival NBC video web. Since CBS has been unsuccessful to date in lining up a new sponsor for the half-hour being vacated by Waring, Goodrich is mulling the advantages of moving back a half-hour, such as a bigger station lineup, less competition, etc.

Seattle—Ben Harkins, veteran radio scripter and performer and former vaudevillian, is now an account executive at KJR, local ABC Outlet. Harkins was formerly program director at KXA here and recently of the team of Mooney and Mack, radio-TV vocal team.

LONGINES - WITTNAUER CHRISTMAS FESTIVAL
With Symphonette, Choraliers, John Butler dancers; Frank Knight, announcer
Producer-director: Alan Cartoun
30 Mins.; Tues. (25), 5:30 p.m.
LONGINES-WITTNAUER WATCH CO.
CBS-TV, from N. Y.
(Victor Bennett)

One of the few national advertisers to go for these special Christmas one-shot extravaganzas this season, Longines-Wittnauer presented an okay melange of music and dance via CBS-TV Christmas Day. Featuring the Symphonette under baton of Eugene Lowell, the Choraliers and a ballet group under the supervision of John Butler, the show was similar to what Paul Whiteman or Fred Waring do every Sunday evening on video.

Program, however, lacked the sparkle and verve of similar type productions. Orch and the all-male choir, doing a variety of carols and other tunes attuned to the seasonal motif, sounded good, and the dancers, while seemingly uninspired, provided the requisite visual dressing. But the show lacked the necessary warmth and a feeling of personal intimacy, at times even achieving a stuffed-shirt atmosphere. Best of the offerings, because it involved more closeups of the singers, was the drinking song before an open fireplace, and a musicalized version of "'Twas the Night Before Christmas."

Sets were interesting and served as neat background for the performers. Frank Knight, who announces Longines' weekly shows on CBS Radio and TV, made for an affable emcee and program host. With the emphasis on public relation and goodwill, the blurbs were confined to institutional copy for the most part, except for one straight pitch near the closing.

For seven years, United States Steel—through its full-hour program, Theatre Guild on the Air—has brought into America's homes the genius of the great actors and actresses of our time... in distinguished dramas of past and present. Coming up this season are such outstanding productions as Oliver Twist, The Sea Wolf, A Square Peg, The Second Threshold, Dear Brutus and The Bishop Misbehaves.

With such performances as these, the honored stage of the Belasco has become the scene of radio's most honored show—the U. S. Steel Hour.

PEGGY LEE SHOW
With Russ Case Orch, guests
Writer: Charles Monroe
Director: Bruno Zirato
Producer: Louis Melamed
15 Mins.; Tues., Thurs., 7:30 p.m.
Sustaining
CBS, from N. Y.

Peggy Lee, who has been active recently on video with guest warbling stints, is showcased here in a neat, unpretentious musical show. Quarter-hour stanza moves smoothly in an informal mood, spotlighting Miss Lee's svelte vocal style against Russ Case orch's excellent backgrounds. Incidental chatter between numbers is pleasantly brief and lightweight.

On the preem (25), Miss Lee delivered a varied repertory of tunes, including "You," "Solitaire" and "Try A Little Tenderness." Guest slot on the show was filled by the Four Lads vocal combo who did a fair number, "Sit Down And Write The Folks," for their solo turn and joined Miss Lee on a lively rendition of "Shrimpboats."

Hayes-Healy Show Set For Coast Originations

Peter Lind Hayes and Mary Healy, set for featured roles in Stanley Kramer's upcoming "5,000 Fingers of Dr. T" for Columbia release, will originate five broadcasts live from Hollywood for their CBS-TV "Star of the Family" show, while working on the film.

Now in the Sunday night at 6:30 period, "Star" moves into the alternate Thursday night at 8 slot starting Jan. 10. Hayes and Miss Healy, his wife, are slated to fly to the Coast Jan. 24, to be followed a few days later by producer Perry Lafferty and the entire crew. They'll be working on the Kramer picture for 10 weeks but, since the show will be on a skip-a-week basis by that time, it means only five programs will emanate from Hollywood prior to their return to N.Y.

American Tourists Remain the Keel To Help Keep France Ship-Shape

By MAXIME DeBEIX

Paris.

The prime minister of the French King Henry IV once opined that ploughing and grazing were the two main props of French economy. If instead of living circa 1600 he had gazed at present doings, he might have reconsidered his opinion and amended it as follows: the two main props of French economy are the American taxpayer and the American tourist.

It is true that the French peasantry is the keel that prevents the ship from capsizing, but French economy is currently hitched to the overseas dollar. From 100,000 Yanks who went overseas in 1946, the number jumped to nearly three times that visiting France in 1950. Not all of the 3,000,000 tourists visiting France were Americans, but those 10% Americans provided nearly 90% of the coin dropped in France by foreign visitors of all nationalities.

The most important show biz phase, from the standpoint of economics, is, of course, the picture business. American distribs this year did not have to suffer too much. They had, of course, to fight taxes, quotas, limitations of all sorts and work against the fools and knaves whose immediate cure-all for the crisis that is plaguing the French picture industry was the commie-instigated cry of "Cut in half the 121 import permits given yearly to U. S. product." As thanks to for quality to the efforts of the Yank distribs and despite the natural preference of the French for their own product if it is good, American pix garnered about 45% of the local grosses, and kept up business despite the diminishing number of admissions resulting from a tilt in the rates, and also through efforts of most of their flackeries, spearheaded by RKO.

Piping a tune about the local film industry is like playing a funeral march. There is extant a confidential report drawn by Pierre Cheret, chartered accountant, official technical and financial adviser to the French Cinema Administration. Its title is "1951—the Crisis of French Cinema Production—Its Origin, Its Causes, Its Eventual Remedies." No prosecutor could voice a more scathing indictment of local habits. The causes named are mostly "a general disregard of the basic principles of any commercial or industrial activity," which explains partly Cheret's mentioning that out of a yearly budget of about $12,500,000 (at 400 francs to the dollar), there is sure to be a 30% dip in the red, which explains the yearly 70% interest rate sometimes asked for picture money. Another cause is that producers "have next to no personal investment in the pictures" and also that the proceeds of the Fonds d'Aide (a bonus raised by means of a supertax on admissions) is badly appropriated.

Studios Mostly Dark

As is, the French setup is a shambles. Most producers, including the bigger ones, have either stopped producing altogether or are defaulting on their obligations, like the Borderie Bros., who can't pay the talent on their "Salaire de la Peur," which had to fold after Henri Georges Clouzot had spent 80,000,000 francs and got only three reels shot; or Robert Dorfman, of Silver Film (production) and Corona (distribution), who suffers currently from nervous breakdown while his bankers suffer from trying to recoup about 500,000,000 francs.

The studios are mostly dark, and the morale of picture personnel at a very low ebb, even assuming that the American opposition is not enough to cover the facts. But the real remedy, at least according to the heart of the French, has been found by a former director, Marcel L'Herbier, who is currently manager of the Official Cinema School (IDHEC), which is government-subsidized. He is currently agitating to have one competent guy placed i charge of managing an official cinema that would get a government appropriation equal to that of subsidized legiters, meaning $3,000,000 a year. This figure was stretched to $6,000,000 at the industry's latest rally.

Meanwhile, the Bank of France has requested all banks to report what their connections and commitments are i the pic industry. So it's no wonder, considering that the technicians are making things as tough as possible, if Yanks are keeping shy of co-producing here. Franco-Italian productions had gained impetus, but are fast losing it due to the technicalities the French are raising at every turn.

Localites, who had been very chary of offerings old pix for video, have found the quick coin lure an incentive to dust their shelves. Unfortunately, they have product that's not always fit to use on TV, and they also have an exalted idea of the value of their celluloid. A great many people, both locally and abroad, are considering making vidpix here: What the difference in cost will be compared to the difference in quality of product will cue the future. The most successful pic producer, Ray Ventura, of Hoche Productions, is going into that field. His feature, "We Shall Go to Paris," garnered enough coi to make things easy.

Radio in France being non-commercial, it is easy to understand that it would not be fit even as a sustainer Statewise. Only Radio Luxembourg, Radio Monaco and Radio Andorra are commercial.

Legit's Peculiarity

The legit phase of showbiz is something peculiar i that operations here differ so much from one type to another that they have to be considered separately.

First, there is the mass business, revues or musicals, which are practically a monopoly of Paul Derval, of the Folies Bergere; Henri Varna, at the Casino de Paris and the Mogador, and Maurice Lehmann, who has the Chatelet and is now going to run the Opera and Opera Comique vice George Hirsch. They produce big shows, intended to run for months. They gun for the tourist and out-of-town trade, and both Derval and Varna want the lure of Yank talent.

The U. S. practice of out-of-town tryouts has become popular, via provincial, Belgian or Swiss stands, before the Paris opening.

A new revue outlet is brewing, The Theatre de l'Empire, now part of the Pierre Louis-Guerin empire. He already has the Club Lido and several others, and after having reopened the Empire with ballets, plans to turn it into a revue house. It grosses about $3,000 nightly, to become $5,000 when the scale has been brought in line with other revue houses.

Strangely enough, during this season the next most important item in show biz was ballet. At the Empire, the Marquis de Cuevas ballets, with Rosella Hightower, Maria Tallchief and George Skibine garnered about $2,500 nightly. At Herve Dugardin's Theatre des Champs Elysees, Kathryn Dunham did lush business.

The lyrical theatres (Opera and Opera Comique), doing their sock business on ballet nights, come under this heading. The Opera management changed from the George Hirsch regime, much criticized, to that of well-regarded showman Maurice Lehmann, operator of the Chatelet. The lyrical theatres are getting a state subsidy of about $3,000,000 yearly, and it's understood that Lehmann intends to handle finances and ballets himself and promote Philippe de Bondeville, currently manager of the Opera Comique, to art director for both Opera and the Comique. This would mean probably the fading of Serge Lifar's influence in ballet.

Another form of entertainment that got a large part of the Paris amusement franc was the shows presented by Pierre Louis-Guerin at the Palais des Sports, such as "Holiday on Ice" and the Aquacade.

Sold U. S. Some Legits

The French sold U. S. a few legiters, but used comparatively few foreign plays this season. The most successful one was Shaw's "Androcles and Lion" at the Tsingos' Gaite Montparnasse.

The French legiters, of course, are run on two different principles. Some produce plays that are expected to garner worthwhile returns, such as plays of Jacques Deval ("Samarkand"), Henri Bernstein ("Victor," and now "Felix"), or Andre Roussin ("Little Hut" and now "When the Child Appears").

But considerable publicity is given to shoestringing legiters produced by those who have mostly mind getting a government or city subsidy to put on shows that are supposedly needed to keep up French prestige. In these can be included the subsidies allowed so-called decentralization theatres, mushrooming on taxpayers money. However, they are somewhat beneficial in providing employment for some of the 5,000 actors here, of whom only about 10% make a decent living and of whom about 50% are practically starving.

Vaude in Paris is mostly in the hands of Mitty Goldin, vet showman who is highly regarded by all talent for not taking advantage of the practical monopoly he has in the business. His ABC is the equivalent for Paris what the old N. Y. Palace used to be and is again now that Judy Garland is there.

Paris hotels having no equivalent of the N. Y. Maisonnette or the Persian Room, nightclub talent is confined to niteries, the foremost and a visitor's must being the Club Lido on the Champs Elysees. Pierre Louis-Guerin and his producer, Rene Fraday, scout yearly tne world for internantional draws, and pay big salaries, permitted by a monthly take of about $200,000.

Despite their gyps and clips, the Montmartre and other minor joints scattered about town did comparatively good business last year due to the influx of tourists.

CLUB OF ACES

Few American tourists in England ever get a look-in on its private clubs. London clubs, especially, are virtually unknown to American visitors, although VIPs have been known occasionally to get a guest card. The general impression, however, is that most of these clubs are dismal and sepulchral old houses populated in the main by Boer War generals dozing under copies of the London Times.

During my many assignments to the British capital I have looked in on several of these institutions, but the two most exciting clubs I have ever found existing anywhere are the Escape Club and The Guinea Pigs.

The one in which a playwright or a reporter would be likely to find a treasure house of dramatic material is the Escape Club, which used to meet at the Allied Officers' Club in Piccadilly. Here could be found a cellar with the wines of every country in Europe, and two chefs who know how to cook most of the dishes famous on the Continent. Practically all the club members had escaped from Occupied Europe at one time or another—some of them with their wives and children. The mansion in which the Club was housed belonged to the Rothschild family. Around the tables, at mealtimes, the members and their guests discussed stories of their escapes, the incredible hardships endured, and the ingenuity and inventiveness practiced by the members in making their getaway.

The second and equally dramatic of the clubs is The Guinea Pigs, also known as "The Few" (Churchill's Few to whom is owed so much, etc.). Composed of the men of the RAF who came down from the flight over Britain in 1940 with torn and tortured bodies—the men who barely survived—the club was organized by a famous plastic surgeon who took what was left of these heroes, kept the breath of life in them, repaired them with grafted flesh and transplanted sinew, and resurrected them. So badly were some of them burnt by fire and scarred by bullets that it didn't seem possible that their bodies could ever take up the work of human life again.

While they were conquering pai and struggling back to health, following operation after operation, they called themselves "The Guinea Pigs." Out of this was born the most exclusive flying club in the world. The amazing thing is that nearly 400 of these reconstructed humans went back on the job as front line flyers and many of them are to be found today in the upper echelons of the RAF. Few experiences left to a foreign correspondent could equal the thrill of sitting down over a drink with the men who saved Britain—and the world.

International Vaude's 'One World', Overnight From London to Chi

By VAL PARNELL

(Managing Director of Moss' Empires, Ltd., Europe's Biggest Chain of 'Live' Theatres, which includes the London Palladium)

London.

"All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players" may or may not be true (and if it is, who constitutes the audience?), but as regards vaudeville performers it may reasonably be stated that their stage is all the world.

Val Parnell

There can be no other profession composed of so many diverse nationalities working together for the same end—the entertainment of the public. And is there any other industry which, as a whole commands such a world-wide market as that of vaudeville? Ever since the days when strolling players, tumblers and musicians were looked upon as "rogues and vagabonds," the professional entertainer has roamed the surface of the earth, ready and willing to perform for any group of people, from the courts of kings to the crowd gathered in the market place.

This age of travel by air has speeded up their worldwide wanderings, so that an artist can play a Sunday concert in London, England, and open the following night in Chicago, Ill. This, incidentally, is an actual case. If you're curious, it was Vic Hyde. As a result, the country of origin of a performer seems to matter less and less as his, or her, opportunities for internnational engagements become more frequent.

The circus itself as we know it today was started right here in London (by Philip Astley in 1770), but it has so spread throughout the entire world that its place of origin has been largely forgotten. The same is beginning to apply to Television!

The ever-increasing demands of TV, especially in America, have recently increased the opportunities for our British artists, for instance, to appear in the U. S. Thus the interchange of performers has become even brisker, with stage stars, film artists and vaudevillians becoming more "globally-minded" than ever before as they are whisked from one continent to another to fulfill their engagements in front of film cameras, television cameras and live audiences in theatres and clubs.

Neither they, the audiences nor the press should fall into the trap of imagining that these artists are being "exported" and "imported" because they are necessarily "better" than the home product. It is merely because that they are different, even apart from being an instance of a world demand being met by a world supply.

When appearing in a new country there is, perhaps, the additional feeling that he not only represents himself as a performer, but also that his country of origin is "on trial"; especially as newspapers are quick to resent the incursion of acts brought in from abroad if they do not appear to be "better" than those in the same, or similar, line of business already domiciled in that country. I think this applies to both our great nations. In this respect, the artist has to justify himself and his backers to give all-round satisfaction, but with more and more interchange of artists taking place practically every week, it is to be hoped that more emphasis will gradually be given to an artist's talent, and less to his country of origin, so that a "foreign" performer does not have to go on with an additional "chip on his shoulder" because he is in a strange country. It is frightening enough without that!

The ideal before us is the free interchange of vaudeville acts from all over the world to all over the world. Much has already been done in this direction, as we have all seen, with the result that unofficial "ambassadors" from their respective countries, in the form of variety artists, are showing audiences in different parts of the world that no one country has the monopoly of talent and that skill and personality are an international commodity. They are also taking back to their countries of origin descriptions of what is being done elsewhere, so that the standard is constantly being raised as a result of this wider knowledge of what is happening in all branches of show business in other countries.

Here, then, is an example of true international cooperation and friendly rivalry which can be set before our leaders and representatives as an instance of what is being done in one particular sphere. If they can achieve a greater understanding between nations as the vaudeville profession has done and is doing, in its own range of activities, there is hope for a better future for all of us.

The Parisian Idea

Paris.

Playwright Sacha Guitry was discussing with a newspaperman the allegations of "collaboration" against the playwright who thought he settled everything by concluding, "And what's more, during the Nazi occupation I wrote a book on French history and not in one of the 400 pages did I once mention Germany. Now wasn't that heroic!"

The same Guitry was asked to lunch with a frugal businessman who ordered meagre fare. Guitry is a renowned epicure. The industrialist, impressed by his distinguished guest, wanted to know, "When do you think you would like to lunch with me again?" "Right away," said Guitry.

When John F. Royal was here recently as special consultant on National Broadcasting Co. matters he recalled when in 1919, he played Sarah Bernhardt at his 105th Street Theatre in Cleveland, which he managed at the time for Keith-Albee. She gave a sock performance and sought out Royal, "And now you can send a good report to New York, non?" This struck him as very funny because the Divine One needed no kudos from anybody at any time, and particularly during her fling into Keith vaudeville.

Victorian ("Madame Sans-Gene") Sardou was a good playwright but a notoriously poor stage director, and when he was once trying to show a young actor how to deport himself, a veteran actor chided Sardou, "Don't do that! You know this young actor has no experience—he's liable to listen to you!"

Lavish U.S. Films Still Appeal to Argentina; '52 B.O. Looks Bearish

Buenos Aires.

Film grosses reached highest levels in Argentina in the first nine months of 1951, tapering off later with the start of torrid weather, competition from the outdoors and an incipient depression.

The tapering-off period happened to coincide with an abundance of American releases after the long famine caused by a two-year suspension of film imports. This suspension was prolonged by the local authorities more than was actually necessary, to insure the choice playing time going to the locally-made films without undue competition.

A comparison of the figures for the first five big grossers of 1950 and 1951 shows to what a degree movie attendance increased in Buenos Aires as a result of the growth of the population, and to greater purchasing power due to constantly increasing wages.

First six grossers of 1951 were "The Red Shoes" (EL), 12 weeks, $184,690; "Los Isleros" (San Miguel), 12 weeks, $151,000; "Domani e Troppo Tardi" (Italsud), 17 weeks, $125,690; "La Culpa la Tuvo el Otro" (Belgrano), 12 weeks, $80,155; "City Lights" (UA), 11 weeks, $79,235, and "Enchantment" (Goldwyn) 10 weeks, $76,475.

All year, national and foreign distributors urged the government to okay very necessary price increases for film-theatre admission. These increases would go a long way to solving the financial difficulties of the local film industry and are also essential for exhibitors, whose costs have been tripled over the last few years. American distributors have also had to face increased costs due to a high percentage of expenses, mainly through increased national, provincial and municipal taxes, wage increases, increased cost of prints, accessories, customs duties and any number of other items. Pix admission scales have remained more or less stationary since 1932, the only increases have been in municipal tax additions and a rakeoff for the "Eva Peron Foundation" and Producers Assn. (for a fund to make improved local pictures.)

No Admission Hike

So far, the government has turned deaf ears to pleas for price increases, being reluctant to increase entertainment costs for the classes which keep it in power. But just as prices of newspapers have had to be upped, so are the increases in film admission scales inevitable.

Press and Information Minister Raul Apold, who is the country's entertainment czar, is mulling over with local producers and exhibitors amendments to the Protection Law, which already grants more favorable playing time, holdover terms and percentages to the locally made films. American distributors fully expect that the result of the huddles will be decreased playing time for their material.

Foreign distributors have already been served notice of the schedules on which the two biggest city circuits must exhibit national films in 1952, and as is logical, the nationals get the choicest playing dates.

This follows the trend towards ever-increased protectionism, regardless of the poor advantage taken of their opportunities by local producers, the quality of whose pictures has not become more adapted to foreign audiences. The results of the last year, however, prove that local pictures can stand up to foreign competition when they are good.

Grosses in 1952 may drop considerably, following the trend noticeable in the last couple of months, which has been rather below the seasonal average. Everything points to Argentina facing up to a severe economic depression, as the government's neglect of rural interests has a telling effect and food prices soar. Distributors reckon that in most cases family budgets will not allow attendance at pix theatres more than once or twice a week in 1952, with a consequent drop in grosses. Business in the rural districts is already very poor.

So many special factors affect picture grosses, that it is difficult to assess local taste in film entertainment from boxoffice yield. The consensus of opinion is that Argentine fans prefer American productions of lavish display, preferably in color. They do not go for sophisticated comedies and conventional melodramas or westerns, but are gluttons for suspenseful yarns and thrillers, or human interest stories of the "Life with Father," "Father of the Bride" type. Stories with a war background are not now generally favored, and the tendency of late has been to sidestep anything reminding local fans that they are enjoying comfort while other nations starve.

1951 Tax Problem For Britain

By HAROLD MYERS

London.

It may have been Festival Year for Britain, but there was not much cause for rejoicing by the British film industry in 1951.

On the surface, things looked placid enough. The J. Arthur Rank Organization had turned the corner and the latest accounts showed this group in much healthier position. Its principal competitor, Associated British, had had another successful year. To the casual observer it looked as if many of the industry's troubles were over and an era of restrained prosperity was ahead. Actually, that was far from being the case. A few weeks before the pomp and ceremony inaugurated the Festival, the Chancellor of the Exchequer delivered a staggering blow with his demand for an additional $25,000,000 year theatre taxation.

That the industry was angered at the new taxation was inevitable. But for once there was a welcome unity among all branches of the trade. Exhibitors, producers and distributors were agreed that the government had gone too far, and they fought back vigorously.

The outcome of the anxious weeks of negotiation that followed is now history. What was eventually achieved was a compromise which gave some little benefit to theatres, substantially more to British production and something like an estimated $18,000,000 for the Treasury.

Fund Enlarged

Now, under the extension of the scheme, the fund is being enlarged to net something like $10,000,000 annually. In terms of its practical benefit for British film-makers—and this includes American companies operating here—it should add something like 34% to the basic distributors' gross. For the average run-of-the-mill picture which has to rely on the domestic market for its earnings, this should be more than adequate to insure a profit. Clearly, the producers have fared well.

Exhibitors, on the other hand, have less to shout about. Admittedly, under the new arrangements they get a little bit extra for themselves, but in order to raise sufficient coin to feed the pool and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, admission prices have had to take a sharp upward swing. With commodity prices constantly on the up-and-up, this policy change represented a serious gamble. No one knew how the public would react; nor could anyone be too certain whether there was sufficient ready cash available to maintain attendance figures at the regular level.

At first, it looked as if the gamble had come off. The British weather seemed to have come to the aid of the picture industry. A notoriously wet summer drove holiday-makers into the theatres, and a boom had begun. It was, however, a shortlived boom, and today all the signs point to a serious decline in takings throughout the country.

So, the weeks to come are anxious ones for theatre operators. Most of them are waiting to see the outcome of the new tax scheme which the industry is now discussing with the government. Several alternatives have been put forward, but the odds favor a combined flat rate and percentage scheme. This would involve a seat tax on lower-priced admissions and a percentage tax on the higher scales. But whatever the system, the government still wants its rakeoff and is not prepared to make any financial concessions to the industry.

Optimism Prevails in Int'l Market For U.S. Pix After Encouraging '51

Yanks Eye $125,000,000 Foreign Payoff for Year; Quotas Remain Major Problem

By NATHAN D. GOLDEN

(Director, Motion Picture & Photographic Products Division, National Production Authority)

Washington.

Reports from all quarters of the industry, and from most of the major foreign markets for U. S. films indicate that conditions in general in the international market with regard to distribution of American movies were considerably better in 1951 than they had been during the past several years. Estimates as to dollar remittances from abroad during 1951 have ranged as high as $125,000,000, and there has been a general note of optimism with regard to the future outlook for U. S. films on the world market. However, near the end of 1951 there were reports of foreign exchange difficulties in several European countries which may forecast problems in these markets.

Nathan D.

Probably the chief factor in this brighter outlook has been the settlement of some of the major problems besetting American film companies in remitting film earnings from such important markets as the United Kingdom, France and Italy. Also, negotiations have been carried on looking forward to a mutually satisfactory arrangement in Spain Argentina, Germany, Japan and other foreign countries where the distribution of U. S. films has been limited due to legislative restrictions and foreign exchange regulations.

In some foreign markets, however, as in all postwar years, the U. S. industry ran into several problems during 1951. Threats of a 50% screen quota in Mexico, proposed restrictions on film remittances from Belgium, and a proposed decree in Brazil which would greatly affect U. S. film distribution in that country, have been the subjects of considerable negotiations in the international field.

Japan has instituted an import program limiting U. S. feature film imports to 150, and in Germany a screen quota for the showing of German films has been proposed. In most of these instances the U. S. film industry has been able to arrange for a satisfactory settlement or a postponement of the threatened restrictions pending further negotiations.

U. S. films, with their broad appeal to all audiences, continue to be the favorites of moviegoers throughout the world. Occasionally, an outstanding film from a non-U. S. producer is successful in the world market. In boxoffice appeal, however, and in acceptance by local audiences, American films in general far surpass those of other countries. A recent survey indicated that approximately 74% of the feature films shown in the world's theatres, outside of Soviet-dominated countries, were produced in the U. S.

Foreign Production Up

Although production of feature films in a number of foreign countries has increased considerably in the past few years, the strongest competition offered to U. S. films in the international field comes not from the products of other countries but rather from legislative restrictions imposed by governments on the free importation and distribution of films. These restrictions are imposed both to conserve the dollar exchange in the various countries and also in an effort to assist the development of a domestic national film industry. However, it is reported that the supply of Yank films in most countries of the world is not able to satisfy the tremendous popular demand.

There appears to be general and continued satisfaction by London representatives of U. S. film companies and of the British government over the terms of the new Anglo-American film agreement, which was signed in Washington Oct. 17, 1951. The new agreement, which followed prolonged negotiations, extends for two years, effective Sept. 30, 1951, the basic provision for the transfer of $17,000,000 annually in equal monthly installments. In addition to this amount, a sum equal to 33⅓% of the amount expended on British productions by U. S. companies, plus the equivalent of money expended for American rights to British pictures, may be remitted.

The British Government has also guaranteed convertibility of a minimum of $4,000,000 annually as the U. S. film companies' shares of the Eady Tax Plan, which provides for subsidies to producers, distributors and exhibitors in the United Kingdom. Total remittances to the U. S. under this agreement are estimated to be in the neighborhood of $25,000,000 to $27,000,000 annually.

Limits on Dubbed Pix

While there are limitations on the number of dubbed U. S. feature films permitted to be imported into France, foreign exchange authorities in that country issued instructions in July, 1951, removing all restrictions on the transfer of Yank film earnings.

In May, 1951, an agreement was reached between the major U. S. film companies and representatives of the Italian film industry providing for the release of blocked film earnings. The agreement is reported to provide for immediate release of 50% of blocked U. S. film money to the American companies on July 31, 1951, with 25% to be loaned to the Italians to aid in film production and for promotion of Italian pictures in the U. S., and 25% to be used for other purposes, including production and co-production in Italy by state-side companies. After July 31, American film earnings were to be released on this fixed formula every three months. The first installment under this agreement, amounting to $3,200,000 was authorized in August, 1951, and $1,000,000 was remitted in October, 1951. U. S. film companies agreed to impose a voluntary limitation on the number of their films exported to Italy.

After not granting import permits for U. S. films into Argentina since March, 1949, the Argentine Government in June, 1951, suddenly invited American film distributors to apply for import permits in unlimited quantity. U. S. film distributors immediately applied for import permits, and the Central Bank of Argentina approved in short order the import of some 480 feature pictures consisting largely of the finest U. S. productions in 1949, 1950 and 1951. Five of the distributors also plan to again supply the Argentine market with American newsreels. Film earnings are now accumulating, but applications have not yet been made for remittance. The announcement by the Central Bank permitting unrestricted imports of U. S. films stated that in due course the Central Bank would consider the authorization for pertinent remittances.

Lengthy negotiations have been carried on during the year between the Spanish Government and representatives of the U. S. film industry in connection with the import and distribution of U. S. films in that country. Licenses necessary to import foreign films into Spain are granted only to Spanish film producers, the number of such permits issued being dependent upon the number and classification of the domestic film produced.

Spanish Setup

The Spanish producer may use these import licenses to bring in foreign films under his own name or he may sell the license at whatever the market will bear. This not only limits the number of films that may be imported but in many cases makes it a very expensive business venture. The same procedure is followed in the granting of licenses to dub imported films into the Spanish language. Although an agreement was reported in the trade press, it was never ratified and has not been put into effect. It is encouraging, however, that the Spanish authorities have agreed to negotiate with the U. S. film companies in an effort to reach a satisfactory solution to some of the problems that have been hampering distribution of American films in Spain. The number of U. S. feature films released in Spain has been declining steadily during the past several years.

The Japanese film import program as announced by the Ministry of Finance for the fiscal year 1951 (April, 1951, through March, 1952), provides for the importation of 150 U. S. feature films. Of this total, an agreement has been reached allocating 120 features to the nine major U. S. film companies and 30 features to independents. Of the 120 feature films allocated to the major companies, 84 will have been released through the Motion Picture Export Assn. by Dec. 31, 1951, and the remaining 36 films will be divided among the nine companies.

MPEA has acted as a combined distribution organization for the nine major companies since 1946. However, effective Jan. 1, 1952, MPEA will cease to function in Japan and each member company will begin handling the distribution of its own films. The Ministry of Finance has stated that approximately 30% of film earnings during the fiscal year 1951 will be convertible to foreign currencies.

The future prospects for Yank film distribution in the foreign markets throughout the world are very difficult to forecast. Near the close of 1951, U. S. film companies were confronted with problems in Brazil, Belgium and Indonesia, and there were some indications of trouble in other markets. Negotiations were being carried on endeavoring to reach a satisfactory solution for the disposition of accumulated film earnings in Indonesia. In Brazil, U. S. film companies were greatly disturbed by a proposed Presidential decree which would have aided the Brazilian film industry but affected the distribution of U. S. films in that market.

The Belgian Government, which has placed virtually no restrictions on the importation of films or the transfer of remittances, has under consideration proposal to limit imports of U. S. feature films; prohibit the importation of positive films, requiring all prints to be made in Belgium; and placing restrictions on the transfer of film earnings. Late in November these restrictions had not been put into effect and negotiations were being carried on with U. S. film distributors seeking a mutually satisfactory arrangement.

It has been stated that the world market for American films spells the difference between profit and loss for the industry. In order to obtain its share of the international market the film industry must see to it that films exported are of the highest quality and that they give no reason for nationals of other countries to take offense at their exhibition. U. S. film producers, in planning a feature film for the world market, usually take into account foreign customs, habits and religious practices, and attempt to portray on the world's screens a picture which will not only be entertaining but will be well received by audiences in all walks of life throughout the world. Largely as the result of this practice, wherever the masses of the people have a free choice in selecting their movies, U. S. films thrive and flourish.

Lost 30,000,000 Filmgoers Aussie's Big 1952 Problem; Legit, Vaude Biz Booming

By ERIC GORRICK

Sydney.

Biggest problem facing the Aussie pic industry in '52 is how to win back to cinemas some 33,000,000 payees lost to the boxoffice over a span of six years, with the biggest dropoff. in '51, plus an estimated revenue dive of around £18,000,000 ($40,000,000).

Industry leaders have been probing for reasons for the swing away from pix. Key men have gone out into the byways and talked with the public in an endeavor to fingerprint the sourness to celluloid fare. Data garnered by the probers blueprinted many factors responsible for the cinema attendance drop from 151,144,831 in the ace 1945 span to 118,400,000 in 1951.

Majority of ex-payees blamed poor product as their reason for seeking another mode of entertainment. Others said they were tired of seeing the same old stars on the screen. Another group hit out at the low entertainment value of supports.

With rumors of war in Europe and elsewhere headlined in the newspapers daily, there had been a terrific swing away from problem pix and heavy drama minus the sex angle. Biggest seat fillers were pix geared for escapist entertainment similar to "Annie Get Your Gun" (MG), "Great Caruso" (MG) and "On the Riviera" (20th-Fox). Given a solid flow of escapist fare on a similar pattern in '52, those 33,000,000 lost payees would return to cinema boxoffices, industry toppers aver.

It has been argued that the current high cost of living, plus heavy taxation, played a major part in the '51 boxoffice low. Against this argument, however, is the fact that straight legit, revue and vaude, charging three times as much as the price for the best cinema seat, played mainly to capacity biz right throughout the '51 span. This also goes for ballet, opera, concerts and other so-called longhair fare.

Continuous Flow of Solid Product

Norman B. Rydge, chairman of the Greater Union Theatres cinema loop, and Ernest Turnbull, chief of the Hoyt loop, aver that a continuous flow of solid product from Hollywood and England will quickly win back lost payees in 1952. Pix keyed to modern day trends, including the good old-fashioned belly-laugh, will keep boxoffice busy, toppers say.

Rydge has bluntly said that the job of selling seats is industry-wide, adding that it must be tackled theatre by theatre, manager by manager, and must be pushed ahead week by week, adding that an industry that earns £34,000,000 ($75,000,000) is a much more important industry than one which earns only £16,000,000. Aussie exhibitors say that given the goods to sell in the year ahead, irrespective of any studio tag, the cinema boxoffices will tell a much brighter story.

David N. Martin's Tivoli vaude loop hit the popularity jackpot right throughout '51. "The Ice Follies" (currently in its 11th month at the Tivoli, Sydney) smashed all b.o. records in other Aussie keyers. This show should experience little difficulty in running three years in this zone. Other toppers for Martin included "Tourist Trade" and "Chez Paree." In '52 he has Tommy Trinder doing a repeat here and is dickering for Danny Kaye and other top U.S. and British talent.

J. C. Williamson Theatres, legit producers, did solidly with "Worm's Eye View," "Private Lives" (in association with Fuller), "Brigadoon," "Oklahoma" (revival), Borovansky Ballet, and medium with "Song of Norway." Coming up in '52 are "Kiss Me, Kate" and "South Pacific."

D. D. O'Connor, indie legit operator, plans return run with the Old Vic Co. and the Stratford-on-Avon Players. Little theatres pulled good payee trade with "Merchant of Venice," "Anna Christie," "Peer Gynt," "Beyond the Horizon," "The Miser," "Misalliance," "The Vigil," "Desire Under the Elms," "Androcles and the Lion," "House of Bernarda Alba," "Wil Eine Kirchenmaus" and "Children in Uniform."

Nothing New in Radio

Radio brought nothing new to Aussie fans in show presentations. There were lots of disk jockey stuff and long commercial spiels. One of the most popular U.S. waxers on Down Under airwaves is "The Hardy Family." Biggest blow to fans is the raising of the license fee from £1 to £2 ($2.20 to $4.40) per annum by the government, which controls the ether here.

Early in '52 the Robert Menzies' Liberal government will offer legislation prohibiting the taking over of any group of commercial radio stations by either British or American interests. Coming legislation is to offset the recent buy into the Macquarie network, originating through 2 GB, Sydney, by the powerful British Bartholomew newspaper group in a deal with Charles Munro, Stanley Crick and Reg Denison. It's also understood that the Menzies government will red-light any further bid by American film interests to take over local cinemas or to buy into pic loops. (Metro operates its own loop of cinemas here, and 20th-Fox holds substantial stocks in the Hoyts loop, with the J. Arthur Rank Organization a 50-50 partner in the Greater Union Theatres loop.)

Ealing, operating a studio at Pagewood, Sydney, was all set for a deal with a company headed by Charles Munro, Frank Tait, Stanley Crick, Maurice Sloman and Reg Denison, to make a series of pix in '52, first being "Robbery Under Arms," with Ken G. Hall as director. Nix means that Ealing will now have to continue solo. Eric Williams, in charge of Ealing's Aussie production, stated that the studio will make the Nevil Shute yarn, "A Town Like Alice." However, insiders say that unless there is a change in governmental coinage policy, Ealing may be compelled to cease production. Minor producers have already given up the ghost for the year ahead.

India Show Biz Beats Crisis; Films' Upbeat

By N. V. ESWAR

Madras.

The year 1951, ushered in with faltering steps, has just ended on a note of promise. It now seems that the crisis, which threatened to engulf the entire Indian entertainment world, has passed over. The clouds have especially lifted from the film field.

Despite restrictions on allotment of building materials for cinemas, India again showed considerable increase in the number of theatres that went up during 1951. There was an increase of 500 theatres over 1950. Present number of theatres in India is 3,198. These theatres are spread over 1,313 cities, towns and urban areas, leaving the 700,000 villages severely alone.

The villages cannot support a cinema. Their needs can be fed by touring camps. There are presently some 600 touring cinemas which feed the villages.

Though exhibition activity showed considerable increase, the production side did not show much progress. This despite the fact that the number of studios in India increased by eight during the year. India now has 60 studios, majority of these being in Bombay, Madras and Calcutta. Among these 60 studios, they were able to produce only 270 films last year. This is a drop of over 30 compared with 1950.

Biggest thing in India during the last year has been the organization of an International Film Festival, which is to start Jan. 24. This was originated by the Films Division of the Government of India, whose documentaries and newsreels have shown considerable improvement in the last year.

U.S., British Plays Ousting French as Leading Fare In Swedish Legit Season

By SVEN G. WINQUIST

Stockholm.

Interest in legit continues strong in Sweden. Greatest call is for modern plays, while only a few classics are included in various theatres' plans. Whereas French playwrights often dominate the Swedish theatres, it seems that British or American shows are leading the present season.

High admission prices keep legit theatres from being too popular, or real competitors to the cinemas in Sweden. One can see a class film for around 3.50 kroner (70c), while it costs between eight and nine kroner ($1.60) and $1.80) to attend a theatre performance. However, more people attend theatre performances than 10 years ago, and interest is steadily growing.

The Stockholm season has been good thus far. The Royal Dramatic Theatre started the season with Friedrich Hebbel's "Der Diamant" at the Big Stage, and Noel Coward's "Fallen Angels" at the Little Stage. Next followed "King Oedipus," with Lars Hanson in the title role, directed by Olof Molander.

Two world premieres were skedded, the Big Stage presenting Danish author H. C. Branner's "Sosken," also scheduled to open soon in Copenhagen and Oslo. Little Stage presented Swedish writer Per E. Rundquist's psychological drama, "Kalla Mig Ismael" ("Call Me Ismael").

Oscar's Theatre presented "Kiss Me, Kate" as its opener. It was an immediate hit, and the theatre plans no change during the season. Ulla Sallert and Per Grunden play the leading roles. Another American musical, "South Pacific," is mentioned for the 1952-53 season.

Vasa Theatre started the season with Terence Rattigan's "Who Is Sylvia?" with Sonja Wigert in the lead role. It also has been a big success and will probably continue for some months of 1952.

'Dream Girl' Run

Intima Teatern (Intimate Theatre), a new house, managed by film producer Lorens Marmstedt, which opened Oct. 17, 1950, with "The Beggar's Opera," found Elmer Rice's "Dream Girl" to be its most successful show, with 186 performances.

Alle Theatre is the newest legiter in Stockholm. It opened Sept. 13 with Somerset Maugham's "Home and Beauty," which is doing very well. Others skedded are "Waters On the Moon," by N. C. Hunter; "Bell, Book and Candle," by John van Druten, and "The Moon Is Blue," by F. Hugh Herbert.

The New Theatre here is scoring a great success with Jean Anouilh's "La Repetition."

The Municipal Theatre in Gothenburg started with "The Rose Tattoo," by Tennessee Williams, and "La Colombe," by Jean Anouilh, at their two stages. Next came "Hilda Crane," by Samson Raphaelson, and "Der Kaukasische Kreiderkreis," by Ben Brecht. Future plans include the American musical, "Call Me Madam."

The Municipal Theatre in Malmoe opened the Big Stage Sept. 7, with Dodie Smith's "Call It a Day." Next was "Kiss Me, Kate." "The Rose Tattoo" opened recently and is a great success.

The Municipal Theatre in Helsingborg, which started the season Sept. 11 with Sacha Guitry's "N'ecoutez pas, Mesdames," presented Samuel Taylor's "The Happy Time" Nov. 15.

Ives to London in April

London.

Burl Ives is due here next spring to fill dates at the Royal Festival Hall as well as on radio and TV. According to present plans, he would arrive in London mid-April and stay until the end of May. Festival Hall booking is already set for May 28. Ives will give a solo concert of folk songs and English ballads.

Coming over here under the Harold Holt management, Ives also is dickering for a nitery engagement at the Cafe de Paris. His dates here will be followed by a concert and vaude tour of Australia and New Zealand in June and July. Then he may hop to South Africa.

No Place for Mediocrities In the London Theatre

By CLEM HUMPHRIES

London.

Taken by and large, it is generally conceded that Festival-Year, as far as live entertainment is concerned, failed to live up to optimistic expectations. It brought no magic wand to fill depleted pockets, lure people from other amusements or to attract prospective customers to anything but the best.

The annual influx of summer visitors, although 70,000 in excess of last year's record, divided their attendance throughout the country, since every town and village during the five months' Festival season put up its own individual contribution for the occasion. This, in addition to the regular landmarks and showplaces, left little time or cash to patronize any but the most spectacular plays.

In other words, conditions in the legit theatre over the past 12 months have scarcely differed from the situation extant during the past three years. The good shows have done house-full business since opening and the mediocre ones just faded out of the picture. There seems no likelihood of a repetition of wartime prosperity when anything any management cared to put on stood a fair chance of raking in the shekels; nowadays, it is a hard competitive struggle for any project, unless of the first quality in material and acting. It is unquestionable that, with the consistent uprise in the cost of living, there is less than ever left over for amusements outside the home, when even general trade shows a continuous decline.

In keeping with Festival prestige and Arts Council sponsorship, the classics were strongly to the fore in legit last year. Heading the list were the Laurence Olivier season at the St. James Theatre with the alternating Shakespearean and Shaw plays, "Antony and Cleopatra" and "Caesar and Cleopatra." Plays were sellouts throughout their limited run, Vivien Leigh getting eulogistic appraisal of her rendering of the strongly contrasted characterizations of Cleo. Another Shakespearean opus, seldom produced, was "The Winter's Tale," with topscore marking for Diana Wynyard, John Gielgud and Flora Robson. Olivier's second production brought an unanticipated triumph for Orson Welles as Othello. Concurrently at the Old Vic, an unknown actor, Douglas Campbell, made an instantaneous hit in the same role, with U.S.-born Irene Worth winning acclaim for her Desdemona.

Guinness' Sked Hamlet

To Alec Guinness came the only discredit to the Bard when his "Hamlet" received a round panning and short shrift from the public. "Shavings," a group of Shaw playlets, also failed to attract, but a season of Shaw playlets at the Arts Theatre Club found more favor.

Of the established successes that continue to draw the crowds, "The Little Hut," "To Dorothy a Son" and "Seagulls Over Sorrento" are all in their second year. "Waters of the Moon," a slender story, triumphed because of its starring magnets, Sybil Thorndike and Edith Evans. Peter Ustinov's "The Love of Four Colonels," starring himself, and "Figure of Fun," by Andre Roussin, author of "The Little Hut," starring John Mills, are settled down to indefinite runs. The only contribution from Christopher Fry was "A Sleep of Prisoners," which played in churches in various towns.

The tryout theatres and clubs had little outstanding in the way of new offerings, depending on revivals with seasoned reputations, with two exceptions. They were "The Biggest Thief in Town," currently at the Duchess Theatre, which moved down from the New Boltons Theatre, and "Women of Twilight," the starkly tragic story of unmarried mothers, which had such a warm reception at its Embassy production that Jack Hylton bought it. It is now playing at the Vaudeville Theatre and skedded for Broadway production. "The Happy Family," a comedy about the Festival, was also recruited from the Embassy but didn't survive long in the West End. From the Arts Theatre emanated Cocteau's "Intimate Relations," starring Fay Compton, which had a limited appeal and a brief transfer to the Strand Theatre, built up on its publicity as "the play that shocked France."

The flops ranged from five weeks to two nights, this last distinction being achieved by "All the Year Round," a feeble play which opened to a hostile audience on election night at the Duke of York's. This theatre then put on the medieval tragedy, "Heloise," which lasted 10 days. It was a disappointing venture for Michael Powell, of "Red Shoes" fame, being his first stage production. "Storks Don't Talk," starring Mischa Auer, had a belligerent, abusive audience at its premiere, necessitating police intervention, which resulted in a three-day run.

U. S. Musicals Tops

The American musicals are still tops, with "Kiss Me, Kate" still doing turnaway trade after almost a year, and "South Pacific," after a mixed press reception, is booked far ahead into spring, having a three-month sellout before it opened. Whatever doubts there may have been as to the merits of the play, Mary Martin achieved a personal triumph. "The Consul" was hailed as an artistic success, but failed to draw and only ran a few weeks. The native musicals have a bigger showing this year. With the fading out of "King's Rhapsody," Ivor Novello's last show, "Gay's the Word" heads the list, the vital personality of Cicely Courtneidge being the mainstay of the production. Also in its second year is Emile Littler's "Blue For a Boy," more on the old-style musical comedy pattern, but still finding an appreciative public. His latest production, "Zip Goes a Million," proved a successful gamble, bringing the Lancashire comedian, George Formby, into his first legit role in this musicalized version of "Brewster's Millions."

Another old play that has captured public taste is J. B. Fagan's "And So to Bed," with songs by Vivian Ellis, giving Leslie Henson his first straight part after a lifetime of broad comedy. Jessie Royce Landi also made a big hit in this show. "Rainbow Square" is more cosmopolitan, having an English book and lyrics, with music by Robert Stolz; two American singers, Martha King and Gloria Lane; English leading man, Bruce Trent and comedians Sonnie Hale and Alfred Marks. Its continental flavor strikes a happy balance between the ultra native and U. S. productions.

The Hippodrome continues to house the lavishly mounted nude "Folies Bergere" revues presented by Val Parnell and Bernard Delfont. These, with the spectacular Latin Quarter shows at the Casino, proved a big draw with provincial as well as overseas visitors. "Th Peep Show" at the Palladium, "Fancy Free" at the Prince of Wales and the ex-radio show, "Take It From Us," were popular revues in less flamboyant vein during 1951, but the intimate revue has receded to the vanishing point. The two current ones, "Penny Plain" and "The Lyric Revue," both emanated from the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, in outer London.

In keeping with the international atmosphere of London's floating population, representative ballets found a conspicuous place. Apart from the Sadler's Wells productions, Anton Dolin and Alicia Markova had a special season at the Stoll, Ram Gopal and Indian Dancers made a return visit, while others were Rosario and Antonia and the Spanish Ballet, the Fernandez Dancers from South America and the Ny Norsk Ballet from Oslo on their first visit to London. Ruth Draper and Cilli Wang were other artists paying return visits who always draw their own special audiences.

The ice shows continue to increase in popularity, with Belita "London Melody" at the Empress Hall and Barbara Ann Scott in "Rose-Marie" heading the attractions. Special pantomime presentations are planned for the holiday season, following last year's successful pattern.

Eady Fund Aided British Films in '51, Sez French; Need Other Schemes Now

By SIR HENRY FRENCH

(Director-General, British Film Producers Assn.)

London.

The year 1951 brought a prospect of security to British film produc- This in turn created a revival of optimism, not the extreme optimism of 1946-47, but a moderate one controlled by reason.

Continuation of the Eady Fund the outstanding feature of 1951 for British film producers. This fund, established in 1950 for an experimental run of a year, is dependent upon an increase in the price of cinema admissions. In 1950 the estimated addition to the net boxoffice receipts — that is, after the entertainments duty had been paid to the Government — was divided equally between the exhibitors and the British Film Production Fund (Eady Fund). In 1951 it was decided jointly by the industry and the Government that the Eady scheme should be continued for three further years (making four in all); that cinema seat prices and entertainments duty should be increased still higher; and that, on the basis of the estimates accepted by all parties for the purpose of the negotiations, the addition to the gross boxoffice receipts should be divided 52% to the Government and 48% left with the industry.

Taking the four years 1950-51 to 1953-54 together, and assuming that the agreed estimates are realized, the amount left with exhibitors will be approximately 60% of th additional net boxoffice receipts after entertainments duty has been paid. Insofar as film hire is payable on a percentage basis, the increase in exhibitors' receipts will be liable to additional film hire.

Now let us consider the effect upon British producers. The first period of the exhibitors' levy comprised 47 weeks (Sept. 8, 1950, to Aug. 4, 1951); the scheme will continue to run for a further three periods each of 52 weeks, the first of which began on Aug. 5, 1951. It was estimated in July, 1950, that the levy would in the first year amount to £1,500,000 ($4,200,000) per annum. This estimate was not fully realized for the period up to Aug. 4, last when the levy was increased. This was due to a comparatively small shortfall in boxoffice receipts below the amount anticipated. It was not due to defaults on the part of exhibitors, which were negligible. The estimated amount to be received by the fund during the remaining three years is at the rate of approximately £3,200,000 ($9,000,000) per annum. This will be an important addition to the revenue of producers who are eligible to benefit from the fund. Moreover, these payments are not liable, like film rentals, to distributors' commission. In the case of many films this additional receipt will make all the difference between profit and loss.

Object of the Eady Plan

Some readers may quite reasonably be asking themselves what is all this elaborate business of percentages and voluntary levy about. The answer is that the object of the Eady plan (named after the senior Treasury official, Sir Wilfrid Eady, who first thought of it) is to give British films a slightly larger proportion of boxoffice receipts than they can secure through film rentals. The American industry would have strongly objected, and rightly so, to a proposal that, coupled with a screen quota for British films, the exhibitor should be required to pay (apart altogether from the boxoffice value of a film) a higher rental for British than for imported films. The American industry has, however, agreed for a period of four years to exhibitors making payments out of the boxoffice into the Eady Fund and that such payments should be made before film hire is calculated. The American industry's willingness to cooperate with the British Government and the British industry generally is greatly appreciated by British producers, who fully realize that if any one of the parties concerned—namely, the British Government, film distributors, both American and British, and British exhibitors —had refused to cooperate, the scheme could not have been put into operation on a voluntary basis.

To see the scheme in proper perspective it must be realized that every interest gains to some extent, except the cinemagoers who are given the choice of paying more for their accustomed seats or occupying lower-priced seats. Insofar as the higher prices increase gross boxoffice receipts, the Government, as already explained, will take more than half of the additions. Exhibitors after paying entertainment duty and levy, will be left with more money than before the scheme was introduced. Consequently, there will be a larger amount upon which to calculate percentage film hire.

Distributors, both British and American, benefit because the film rentals upon which their commissions are calculated are increased. If it is assumed that imported American films earn 70% of the national total film hire, this is a consideration of great importance to Hollywood. In addition, this additional sterling receipt has become remittable to the U. S. All producers benefit insofar as film rentals are increased consequent upon additional boxoffice takings. But producers of British quota pictures, both feature films and shorts, benefit chiefly by payments from the Eady Fund. Here again, a British quota film made by American interests, such as "The Mudlark" "Treasure Island," benefits precisely in the same proportion as a film made by British producers, such as "The Lavender Hill Mob," "The Browning Version" or "Tales of Hoffmann." The payment made from the Eady Fund is in strict proportion to the earnings of the film in Great Britain. The higher the distributors' gross, the larger the payment from the British Film Production Fund.

Too Early to Tell Yet

All these benefits, however, depend on the boxoffice showing a substantial increase. The scheme was necessarily based on estimates. Will they be realized? It is too early to say yet. The increased prices came into operation on last Aug 5. August was a month of bad weather for holiday-makers but favorable weather for cinemas. It was also fortunate that there were some very attractive films being shown during the weeks following the increase in prices. The scheme undoubtedly got off to a good start. Will it last? And if it does, where is it leading to? The ultimate objective is to make film production in Britain an economic proposition. If this objective is reached, film production should again attract private capital and the Government-sponsored National Film Finance Corp. should no longer be required to provide loans for a large proportion of the new films made by British producers.

It must be obvious that these results cannot possibly be realized if the scheme is to be wound up at the end of July, 1954, and nothing put in its' place. There is a good deal of misunderstanding about this point. When the three-year period was suggested last June two reasons were given in justification of the proposal. The first object was to make it clear that although the levy was increased at the end of the first year, it was to remain fixed for the next three years. The second purpose was to provide reasonable amount of time during which the trade could find within its own machinery a method by which British films would receive a larger proportion of the boxoffice than was the case before the Eady idea came into operation. In other words, the different sections of the trade itself were to be given time in which to devise and agree upon a scheme of their own instead of operating one requiring Government approval and closely linked with the entertainment duty. This important and difficult problem remains to be tackled.

26 Religious TV Pix Being Made at Elstree

London.

Under conditions of secrecy, a series of Technicolor TV religious films are being lensed at Elstree by Frederick Packard, son-in-law of J. Arthur Rank. The series, which it is understood, will total 26, is being produced at the Gate studios which are owned by the J. Arthur Rank group. Each film in the series, which are based on biblical stories, will run for 27½ minutes.

Name artists have been engaged to play in these films, including Leslie Bradley, who is portraying Moses; Joan Rice and Bette St. John. Latter is currently playing in the London version of "South Pacific."

West Germany's 'In Earnest' TV Will Roll in '52

Frankfurt.

Television in western Germany will start off in earnest in 1952, but while it is expected to be widespread, the telecasting time will be on a considerably smaller scale than in England or France, not to mention the U. S. While German video will be private-run, there will be no commercial video programs, as in England and in the planned telecasts in Switzerland.

At this time, German TV is still in the experimental stage and only one station is operating. By the end of 1952, however, video experts hope there will be some 50,000 German TV set owners. The expansion of the TV net throughout Germany is nevertheless an easy possibility, since technicians will have practically no geographical problems to cope with. Additionally, distances in Germany are small by American standards, facilitating the building of numerous relay stations, which could also be used for local telecasting.

At the present, the only TV station of western Germany is located in Hamburg and operated by Nordwestdeutsche Rundfunk (NWDR), the country's largest radio network. TV programs consist of two-hour casts every Monday, Wednesday and Friday, between 8 and 10 p.m. Most of the programs are vidpix, with a very small percentage consisting of TV shows and live TV shots, such as sports events. There are less than 100 TV sets in Hamburg, despite the fact that the city has a population of 1,600,000. NWDR also operates a handful of public TV booths where viewing is free. NWDR-TV has a viewing radius of about 10 miles.

While this telecasting is only in an embryonic stage, plans for 1952 would establish regular TV stations all over the country. German TV, as is radio, would be privately operated by the big radio networks. These are NWDR; Bayernfunk, in Bavaria (Munich and Nuernberg); Radio Frankfurt; and Suedwestfunk (Stuttgart and Baden-Baden). NWDR has four AM stations, in Hamburg, Hannover and Cologne. As in the radio field, NWDR-TV is expected to cover the largest part of the country.

The German TV system would be similar to that in the U. S. It would use the 625-line system, but for about two or three years there would be no color telecasts. At present, TV transmissions cost 200 to 250 marks ($47.60 to $59.50) per minute. As with radio, German TV would be set up on a subscription basis, with set owners paying a monthly average of five to eight marks ($1.19 to $1.90).

The big deterrent to fast development of TV in Germany is the cost of TV sets. During the recent Berlin industrial fair, radio manufacturers exhibited about 40 different type of TV sets, with prices generally ranging between 1,200 and 2,000 marks ($285.60 to $476). These prices are definitely out for the average citizen. There are about 5,000 sets already available for sale, but the demand is very small, and while NWDR-TV does hope for 50,000 subscribers (in all of Germany) by the end of 1952, this could be achieved only with cutting of prices. With present manufacturing costs, this is not very likely.

The German TV sets generally have 9-by-12-inch screens.

Give British Pix a Break or U. S. Industry Will Suffer Too

By TOM O'BRIEN, M.P.

(General Secretary, National Assn. of Theatrical & Kine Employees)

London.

The British film-producing industry continues in the doldrums. It faces one setback after another. Thousands of film employees have lost their jobs, with little or no prospect of getting them back. We are helped to a very limited extent by what is, in fact, the government subsidy. The entertainment tax is a crippling burden and harmful to exhibitors, producers and workers alike. Despite it all, continue to make very good films, some of which are second to none.

The American picture industry may be tempted to believe that if Britain ceases to make pictures it will be a good thing. What a mistake this is! I know of nothing more dangerous for the American film industry or, indeed, for international relations than that America should be the sole film-producing centre of the world. Nothing will be calculated to increase the anti-American feeling abroad than for Hollywood to have a real monopoly of world film production. Those of us who, day in and day out, advocate and work for good Anglo-American relations, know that this is the stark truth.

American exhibitors must, once and for all, give a real break for good British films. This break will not injure the American industry; in fact, it will do it good. The vast millions of American cinemagoers have as much right to see regular presentations of British films throughout the U. S. as the millions elsewhere who see American films. It is manifestly unfair, and is calculated to stimulate antagonism over a wide field for good British films to be denied general exhibition in the U. S.

The Day Might Come

The day might come, and come very soon, when the American film industry on a whole will go on their hands and knees and pray for a virile British film-producing industry and for British films. It might be too late then. No one likes the same thing all the time, and what our American friends should realize is the strong possibility that there might be a world revulsion to American films. If that day comes, friends of America, like myself, will have to resist the temptation of saying "I told you so."

I know there will be an outcry from various sections of the American film industry to let the British film industry stew in its own juice. It is easy to propound a principle or policy, but carrying it out is quite another matter.

For a long time I have advocated the establishment of a permanent Anglo - American films council. The lack of unity in the respective film industries is largely responsible for this body not being set up. What a pity. Many of the leaders of the film industries on both sides of the Atlantic continue to live in a fool's paradise. They have lived for so many years in the big money that they don't think that the things can be changed overnight. But change they will, and the change cannot be stopped because there is no instrument or machinery in existence to stop it.

The American film industry is particularly vulnerable. It is in the hands and under the control of a very few brilliant men who started many years ago the hard way and who have reached the evening of their lives content in having built a film empire. But what of the morrow? What is to happen to this vast and complex American industry when the builders of that great industry are gone? Who is there to follow? Bank managers, publicity experts, star gazers, and a motley crew of hangers-on? These will never run an industry. Rather, they would rui it. There is yet time for these illustrious men in America, and the few counterparts we have in Britain, to get together and do something to provide a means where their life's work will not go up in smoke after they have gone.

Films' Influence

If films are to influence the thought of the world, if they are to take its part in preserving the peace of the world, the screens of the world must be freely open to the best films that are made in any part of the world. Woe-betide the country that forces its own thoughts and its own wares on the rest of the world, and prevents the thoughts and wares of other nations entering into their own!

There are great men in the film industries everywhere. Let these in the English-speaking world, to start with, get together and work hard for a mutual understanding and solution of their trading problems so that others may follow.

TV ADDING VITALITY TO SCOTS' SHOW BIZ

Glasgow.

Show biz is flourishing in Scotland, despite high cost of living. And now—a new development is approaching with the arrival of television.

Theatre and cinema operators aren't worried. They see in TV a useful fillup to their own promotions. Already number of cinemas are being wired for video, in anticipation of the British Broadcasting Corp. granting them licenses for relays.

In March the first Scottish video programs will transmit from the new station at Kirk ' Shotts, Lanarkshire, halfway between Edinburgh and Glasgow. It will be one of the most powerful stations in the world. At the outset, programs will be largely English.

As always, American performers have earned high popularity in Scotland. This year didn't bring as many top-liners as in earlier seasons, but undoubtedly, the act that made the deepest impression was the Andrews Sisters. They came to Glasgow's Empire Theatre and clicked big.

Judy Garland had a great reception at the same music hall in a one week date. Donald O'Connor also scored strongly in variety, accompanied by his wife. Deep River Boys, now almost a bi-annual institution in Glasgow, were another U. S. act given a top Scotch welcome. Among the lesser names who impressed was a Canadian, Fran Dowie and his wife and partner, Candy Kane. Fran has a mock-cowboy comedy act that's likely to go big. "Sugar Chile" Robinson also appeared at Glasgow Empire to good biz.

The Scottish comedians hold their own big following and continue to hold down high salaries, despite recurring criticism that new gags and material are needed. Several are looking to television possibilities. Harry Gordon, Tommy Morgan, Alec Finlay, Jack Anthony and Jack Radcliffe are in the top rank, although the last-mentioned was the object of much criticism following his appearance at the Royal Variety Performance in London, when he cracked jokes of doubtful taste before Queen Elizabeth.

Among younger artists, Jimmy Logan, nephew of Ella Logan, stands out and is fast approaching the first rank of Scottish comics. He's ably backed by radio, having his own weekly variety show "It's All Yours."

Other promising performers i Scotland include Jimmy Neil, whose homely patter goes down big in Will Fyffe style, and Josephine and Alexis Crombie, sisters who may team up.

Pantomime and summer seasons reign supreme in the land of Lauder and Auld Lang Syne. Some criticize on the score that they last too long. Pantomime runs well into April and summer seasons, from May to October. Little is left for new productions or good straight plays from London.

Domiciled in Scotland (and currently playing panto) is English comedian Freddy Sales. He lives in Glasgow, made a name here when he stood-in for Dave Willis.

Big event in the legit and music side continues to be the annual Edinburgh Festival, in which, last fall, British pic star Margaret Lockwood appeared as Eliza Doolittle in "Pygmalion."

British Bonanza Replaces Lagging Interest in Foreign-Language Films

By NOEL MEADOW

The touchingly loyal audiences for foreign-language films which have grown to maturity in the past two decades are wavering in their allegiance.

The rapid expansion of this group had been fluffed off as insignificant by Hollywood for many years, but had more recently caused American producers to show signs of deep anxiety. They may have had the perception to realize the reason behind the phenomenon: Not that this section of American moviegoers loved the foreign films more; but they loved the Hollywood stuff less.

A retreat from foreign-language film patronage has come suddenly in the past year, but Hollywood needn't indulge in the delusion that the whole thing has blown over and the prodigal has returned to its boxoffice fold.

The rebellion is still It's just taken a new turn.

There has been a switch to British films, and the rebels are picking up strength faster than ever. No more listening to languages they can't understand—no more speed-reading of the visual titles.

The pessimists can explain the new twist in this way: Anything but Hollywood films!

But that might be going too far. There is no denying that the British productions have a special charm of their own—perhaps an interesting but unhurried pace that is psychologically better suited to the cause of relaxation, which is what people go to films, for, after all.

For the British product (via Alexander Korda and J. Arthur Rank) to gain American audience favor has taken the best part of decade. Boxoffice resistance seemed to have a twofold cause: The tough-to-understand British accent, and that certain minimum of action.

But a subtle change has been wrought to make the British pronunciations more clearly understood. There is no confirmation for this, but it is evident that the English producers, pitching for the American market, have quietly gotten their players to cooperate in a campaign to promote pronunciation that the U. S. could savvy. The inescapable fact is that they're a lot easier to understand than they were a few years ago.

And the changed character of the British film is also conspicuous. Stories have become more zingy, and the development of the "suspense" film has become a virtual British monopoly.

There can be no denying that television has done its ample share to bring about popular acceptance of British films here. They are being widely shown on TV screens, though the reason is no news to anyone. They're cheaper. But whatever the underlying economic motive for their use, the fact is that the American ear has become adjusted to the British way with a word—even in the old, unreconstructed pictures whose players had not yet seen the true light. It's this stuff out of the vaults that TV is using.

British Sleeper

As a result, to cite one example, a British sleeper, "Tony Draws a Horse," is doing uncommonly well across the country, after an 11-week premiere at New York's Park Ave. Theatre. Among British pix of the not-too-distant past which couldn't have done much better than they did are: "Red Shoes," "Kind Hearts and Coronets" and "Tight Little Island." Thriving reports have been forthcoming among a more recent crop, namely "Trio," "The Wooden Horse" and "Tales of Hoffmann," and, by all means, "The Lavender Hill Mob." Even "Oliver Twist," which had poor sendoff on a wave of controversial publicity, is pulling audiences.

On the other hand, most foreign-language films have been dying in New York, where they could usually rely on getting back a considerable portion of their distribution costs, if they had any stuff at all. The city which had about a score of theatres devoted to foreign-language first-runs a few years ago now has exactly two.

Behind this sudden switch, too, is a twofold cause:

Foreign producers — especially French — have priced themselves out of the U. S. market by demanding exorbitant advances from prospective American distributors, and tightening censorship here has made the risks of distribution too much of a gamble, even without the tougher economical demands from abroad. As to censorship, there are the examples of "The Miracle" (Italian) and "La Ronde" (French), the latter having been kept by censorship from getting important playing time.

As a result, with but a single exception, there has been no really "big" foreign-language click here for a year. That exception of course, is "Bitter Rice," an Italian import, which remains the most sensational thing in this class and still a factor in the market. Because of wide distribution, it is reputed to be the biggest foreign-language money-maker of all time. In the past few years, the only foreigns to approach it were "Bicycle Thief" and "Paisan."

Other Interesting Grossers

Two other interesting grossers of 1951 were: Discina's "Manon," (French) although it still has - sorship setbacks in certain territories; and "The Emperor's Nightingale," but the latter, although of Czechoslovakian origin, had an English commentary.

Not to be ignored among the reasons for decreased sales resistance to British film fare is the recent exchange of English and U. S. stars. British players Alec Guinness, Michael Wilding, Laurence Olivier, Jean Simmons and Alastair Sim are among the hottest things on the Hollywood horizon, and Britisher David Niven and James Mason are seen often in films made in either country. Niven, Mason and Wilding followers aren't too fussy about the origin of a motion picture in which their favorite appears.

These popular British names have replaced such famous French and Italian topflight personalities as Viviane Romance, Suzy Delair, Louis Jouvet, Jean Marais, Anna Magnani and Michel Simon.

With the increasing demand, two American independent distributors have come along rapidly because they could supply it. Snader Productions has tied up a long list of Sir Alexander Korda pictures, and Dr. Arthur Epstein, heading Fine Art Films, has acquired U. S. rights for a number of British product.

Snader has come along with a unique TV tie-in. Setting up Telescriptions, as an allied agency, Snader Productions will sponsor the Korda films and other Britishers for first-run and subsequent-run theatre showings, and will then, before they are squeezed completely dry of potential audience, turn them over to its Telescription counterpart. The latter has already tied up many of the nation's TV stations for showing the films via that medium. There will also be a two-way exploitation tieup. Hence, the first of these films will be taken from the theatre market sometime next spring and will be shown, still fresh, to TV audiences.

Louis-Guerin to U.S.

Paris.

Pierre Louis-Guerin of the Lido, who also has the Empire and has booked the Sonia Henie iceshow, is leaving on a U. S. scouting tour Jan. 15. His producer, Rene Fraday, leaves a few weeks earlier.

Meanwhile, Guerin is presenting under Jules Borkon aegis, the Teresa and Luisillo Spanish ballets at the Empire. Latter opened sock and is grossing close to $3,000 nightly.

Of Old Heidelberg And 'Student Prince'

By LT. COL. BARNEY OLDFIELD

Heidelberg.

Frau Teresa Ernst-Schoenenberger says she'll probably never get the picture she wanted so long. She had just read of the death of Sigmund Romberg.

Frau Ernst's house is full of pictures—and memories. She owns the Hotel Waldhorn ob der Bruck in Heidelberg, Germany, and if you'll climb up the 36 stairs with her, she'll show you where Prince Reuss-Koestritz, of Saxony, as a student, looked out of his window and saw a girl named Kathie in 1863. The lightning that struck the prince and Kathie was purely local in those days, but for a guy named Meyer Forster it was an idea for a play called "Old Heidelberg"; for another named Viktor von Scheffel it led to poetry and student songs; and much later, Sigmund Romberg put it to music and it became the hardy perennial of the Shubert garden, "The Student Prince."

Frau Ernst's establishment is faithfully reproduced in the operetta's opening scene. She has been on the job since 1907, and since that time estimates she has climbed up and down the 36 stairs from the main floor to the room in which the prince was quartered an average of 30 times a day, seven days a week. To this time, she has shown people of 46 nations over the premises which spawned the romance (she had 45 of them on the books before World War II, and picked up an Arab sightseer to make the 46th last October).

Frau Ernst always starts with two framed pictures just inside the dining room, Norma Shearer and her late husband, Irving Thalberg. Miss Shearer's screen version in the late '20s for Thalberg's Metro did much to make the inn a tourist stopping place. Frau Ernst's mother, now dead, had written a condolence, and the answering letter is framed with Thalberg's picture, dated Nov. 10, 1936.

Werner Futterer (nee Bateman, of "Victoria Regina" with Helen Hayes in 1938) is a German actor who has made several Heidelberg pix and is well up among the faces. Lawrence Tibbett, who has probably seen "The Student Prince" through as many times as there are stairs in the inn, is hung in the Brown Derby manner, and the page in the guestbook where he has written almost falls open automatically to show his remark: "Simply fascinating, 1946."

Lubitsch and Cerf

One of the New York long-stemmed types signed i , too, Marion Bradley, who notes her vintage, "Billy Rose's Diamond Horseshoe, Nov. 23, 1945." Ernst Lubitsch is down for passage in 1928. There is also either a disclosure of a first name for the first time publicly, or it's someone else—a listing of "Alfred Bennet Cerf," who, if the Cerf. disowns New York and gives Hollywood for an address.

Another of the trade who has gone to talk over old times with Romberg, Scheffel, Thalberg, the Prince and Kathie on the Other Side is Mady Christians, who found the setting and the banks of the Neckar River inspiring. Cary Grant was in, Frau Ernst says "with somebody."

Hotel Waldhorn is closed now, because, like all places which deal in memories, it has tended to get a little musty and needs a paint job, a little heating, and some wallpaper. It hasn't yet gone the way of the Red Ox Inn, on the other side of the river, which has to put up with substitutes for the drinking songs of German variety which run variously as "Don't Send My Boy to Illinois," "Whiffenpoof Song" and "Caissons Go Rolling Along," emblematic of the Army's European Command hq. being in town.

By the way, what really did happen to the prince. He did marry the princess, but Frau Ernst doesn't know who she was. Nobody thought to take notes in advance of the big hullabaloo later, and besides, there were lots of princesses in those days.

The fact that the prince fell for Kathie, a summertime barmaid, was the big news, the makings of song and play.

Kathie? She went home to Vienna, and married an older gent who had a big stable of horses—dray horses, that is, not racehorses.

Real-life moral: If you can't make hay, feed it.

The First Hundred Years—1950-51 (Or, The London Story)

By NAT KARSON

London.

It'll be a cinch for you." That's what the man said to me in the lobby of the Savoy in August, 1949. The man was Joe Vogel, veepee of Loew's, and it sounded so easy—doing a new stage show every three weeks at Metro's Empire Theatre in London. Ah, London—the prewar England I knew in the '30s—stately, dignified and leisurely, none of that New York rat race, just a civilized existence doing the kind of stuff I had been perpetrating at Radio City and on Broadway. No more finding scripts to produce, auditioning for backers and fighting with the Shuberts on house terms, just a nice little resident company of singers, ballet, orchestra and rhythm dancers, 3,000 miles from Lindy's—yes, it was going to be a leadpipe cinch.

"You'll never find the type of dancers or singers you require in this country; they just don't exist in England." That's what they all told me on my arrival in London. But I wasn't buying it! No—not in the country that had produced the Sadler's Wells ballet and the original Tiller Troupes of the early '20s—and besides, what did we require other than people with average intelligence and enough training in the basic rudiments of dancing and singing? Beyond that we were prepared to train our company to exact specifications. So-o—no dancers. Well, approximately 2,000 showed up at various auditions, which we finally weeded out to two troupes of dancers numbering 30 and 20, respectively. Singers — and good ones — were in abundance, and there was no trouble filling our complement of vocalists. So, we were in rehearsals, three weeks of it and one to go—when, Boin-n-n-g! ! !—a strike! It seemed that British Actors Equity and the Variety Artists Federation couldn't agree as to who was to have jurisdiction over our resident singers and dancers. We at the Empire had no quarrel with the basic contract, since we were paying double the basic minimum for 12 shows, as we were doing 24 per week. And further, we had voluntarily increased the rehearsal salary, but there we were in the middle of it just one short week prior to our opening. Pickets, frontpage publicity, excitement—all well and good—but what about the rehearsals? The two unions finally resolved their differences in the form of a temporary joint agreement, and so we carried on in that final short week replete with moments of impending disaster, mechanical difficulties, nightmarish last-minute rehearsals. I was ready to take the first plane back and reopen "Nellie Bly!"

"It's always a great privilege to see a genius at work." That's what one of the byline journalists said in scoffing at our auditions. The Metro press department has asked me, in view of the great interest in the new policy, if I had any objection to admitting the press to auditions. I explained that it was not customary in the States, as auditions are a cold, hard facet of show business, not altogether pleasant. However, since I was unfamiliar with local practice, I bowed to their judgment. The "genius" crack appeared the following day. "Ah," I said to myself, "a little anti-American bias." This and other vague West End mutterings—"he'll never open on time etc."—were not calculated to make me feel any more comfortable or happy. That's all I needed now with all of the preproduction headaches. I awaited the opening-day reports with not a little trepidation.

"Well, at least, there are plenty of vaudeville acts in England." I said to myself that I had seen hundreds of acts in London variety halls, prewar and postwar, and radio had not encroached upon and killed vaudeville as it had in the States. This was going to be no problem. But I encountered this kind of baby talk: "Pantomime season, you know, old man. All our very best acts have been booked up since last summer and will be playing pantomime for the next 12 weeks." So here I was, stuck, and with a British quota yet (50% of all acts in variety theatres must be British). Frantically, I cabled the States and the Continent. Somehow, we got enough acts to open.

"L.C.C. Makes Further Cuts i Allocation of Steel and Timber." Such were the headlines in '49. Well, I couldn't get dancers, acts, there were technical hitches—now I had to face the brim regulations so necessary in an England emerging from a particularly chaotic war period with its shortages. What with the licensing restrictions and curtailed materials, I would have to depend on British craftsmanship to overcome this lack of basic necessities and still maintain a standard of production. Oh, well, I wasn't any worse off than the next producer. As if this weren't enough, I was formally introduced to the "power cut." Suddenly, a phone call at 11:53 a.m., —"Say, there's a power cut coming in at 12, there'll be no lights for the stage show." I was on the verge of giving it all up then and there and rechristening the show "Dancing in the Dark!"

"Empire Girls Steal Royal Command Performance Honours" (quote from London dailies). These were the dancers they told me I couldn't get. As a matter of record, our Empire Girls are acknowledged to be the finest dancing troupe in England and the Continent, and have performed at two Royal Command shows within 24 months. They are in tremendous demand for all important charity and gala functions. Our little ballet company has turned out quite a bit of talent, some of it migrating to Sadler's Wells. As far as our singers are concerned, a number of them have graduated to more important parts in current West End shows.

"Hall, Norman & Ladd Hit of Royal Variety Show" (quote from London papers). Faced with the problem of securing acts for the Empire, I scoured the provinces and the more obscure music halls, with the result that many an unknown act has played its first West End engagement at the Empire. It's quite a kick to cite the success of the following: Fayne & Evans, who went on to score in the last Royal Variety Command Performance; Rex Ramer, who stopped the show cold opening night of "Folies Bergere"; Bill Hurley, who at the moment is hot with his first recording.

"Minister of Supply Suggests Cuts in Luxury Materials" (quote from London papers). So maybe there'll be no more spangles and a little less of costly fabrics, but then after two years of working with British craftsmen I'm not at all concerned. Somehow or other they manage to create an illusion with a deplorable lack of materials. Don't take my word for it, just ask Rodgers & Hammerstein, Jo Mielziner, Jack Hylton and Lem Ayers, whom I am certain will agree with me that "Carousel," "South Pacific" and "Kiss Me, Kate" were more than adequately reproduced here in terms of scenery and costumes. In many instances I feel that the London production was much better.

"Imaginative." "Colourful." "Inventive." "Brilliant." I could go on quoting. I can only tell you that my anticipatory fears about a biased British press were utterly groundless, that it has been most encouraging in its praise.

I get a lump in my throat when a British audience screams the house down for a Danny Kaye, a Bob Hope, a Judy Garland or a Mary Martin, whether it be at the Palladium, Drury Lane or any other West End theatre. But I get a bigger kick out of the realization that the British public has taken into its hearts the all-British resident company at the Empire—the orchestra, Empire Girls, choral group and ballet. And if we here at our little gilt and plush lean-to in Leicester Square have done one small bit to solidify our Anglo-American relationship, it's worth all the blood, sweat and tears of the past two years. I wouldn't exchange this experience for the world.

Video's Increasing Influence On British Film Business

By SIR PHILIP WARTER

(Chairman, Associated British Pictures)

London.

Let there be no mistake about it. TV is making friends and influencing people. This new medium (still in its infancy) is making, and will continue to capture a substantial share of the British public's interest with its variety of programs, especially its key asset of presenting the news.

We in the film industry were naturally concerned when TV first began to cast its shadow over our theatres. Some even called the cathode tube the shadow of a monster whose eventual appearance would cause a crushing disaster from which the industry would never recover. Others warned of the great transformation of cinemas to TV theatres. Of course this isn't the first time the film industry has been frightened by scientific achievements or other crises. Shadows have been with us before, just as frightening and gloomy as the TV shadow, or, as I prefer to call it, "the five o'clock shadow" which can be cleared away with a blade or an electric shaver. In other words, we are faced with a "five o'clock shadow" situation which, if neglected, will put our industry in a very drab position and, before we know it, we'll not only appear down and out but begin to believe it ourselves.

We in the industry must assess the competitive value of television as opposed to the value of motion pictures, and we must also examine ways in which these new developments in electronics can assist us technically producing better product at a more economic price. We must also learn (as we did with radio) how to use this intimate medium as a means of advertising and promoting our pictures.

From statistics that are available to us, it looks as though a large proportion of regular cinema patrons are in the 17-to-25 years age group while at the present time, at any rate in Great Britain, apart from certain sports items, television is inclined to appeal to the older people. It is, of course, very noticeable that when television comes to a new era the novelty value alone attracts a much wider circle of viewers than when it has settled down and the novelty has worn off. This fact is generally admitted in America and it has been noticed here where the London cinema receipts, which were hit badly during the novelty period, are now on the upgrade. In the Midland area, where TV is still the new rage, receipts have fallen sharply despite the high spending power in this essentially manufacturing area. The conclu- , therefore, is that provided we can maintain and improve the standard of the films we show to the public and pay constant attention to the service and comfort of the patrons in our theatres, we need not fear a serious decline in attendance as a result of a TV antenna on Mr. and Mrs. Public's roof. It must also be remembered that in addition to novelty drawing power of TV, the hire-purchase monthly payments reduce spending money for cinemas, but thereafter the boxoffice does not suffer to the same extent.

Large-Screen TV

One of the ways which has been suggested for competing with this new living room attraction is large-screen television in cinemas. As I understand it, the proposal is that large-screen television should take the place, to some extent, of the supporting program. Personally, I am inclined to think that this idea unsound except, perhaps, for a limited number of large city houses. The cost of large-screen television, both for equipment and programs, would far exceed the amount that exhibitors can normally afford to pay for supporting bills, and they would be faced with need, either to increase admission prices, with a risk of losing attendances, or else to reduce substantially the feature film hire. Latter, in the long run, would eventually reduce the quality and drawing power of the feature films which, basically, are what the public pay to come and see. In fact, more now than ever, our studios should continue to produce bigger and better films which over the past year have proved that the public does prefer a seat in the cinema to an easychair in the lounge.

In the field of publicity, the industry is making extensive use of radio which over the years has become an accepted and effective promotional outlet. Obviously then, the visual method of showing the public extended trailers, specially prepared scenes, or special adaptations, and using guest stars, should have a much stronger appeal than radio. In fact, this medium is still undeveloped and I feel certain that the use of the TV screen opens an entirely new selling approach which must show results at the boxoffice.

I also believe that new techniques in film production can be developed as a result of research in electronics. It is interesting to note that a company has been formed in England to exploit certain ideas in this connection. The industry should take a deep interest all TV developments and should certainly adopt any technique which will improve or facilitate production.

As more and more of Great Britain is being initiated to TV, it is most encouraging to note that the cinema is still, by public choice, the best form of entertainment. We are, of course, very grateful for Hollywood product, which has certainly improved in quality in the past year.

Buzzell to Europe For Mag Story Deal

Edward Buzzell, freelance director since leaving Metro about two years ago, sailed from New York Saturday (29) on the Queen Elizabeth for Europe to work out a deal in which he'd produce and direct a film version of a Cosmopolitan mag story, "The Third Girl From the Right."

While declining to reveal the identity of his Continental associates, Buzzell said he would discuss the project with individuals in London and Rome. He then planes to Rio de Janeiro to look over studios in nearby Sao Paulo, where the venture may be made.

BSO in Paris Bow

Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its first appearance in Europe next spring. Orch will give three concerts in Paris in May, under the sponsorship of the Congress for Cultural Freedom.

Charles Munch, symph's musical director, will share the podium with Pierre Monteaux, as guest.

Tokyo Takes On Tinsel by Nite

By RUSS SPLANE

Tokyo.

You wouldn't know her today. Tokyo, that is. The bomb-scarred capital of six years ago which early occupation troops watched digging herself out of the dusty rubble of war is a tinseled city today. Still drab in spots in the harsh light of day, Tokyo takes on color and glamor at night that make it sparkle like an Oriental gem. Night life in Nippon has made a sock comeback, and to many Americans fighting in Korea or on occupation duty in Japan, Tokyo has become the Paris of the Far East.

Current upbeat can be traced not only to Japan's gradual recovery from the ravages of the last war, but to the artificial period of prosperity which a large segment the population is enjoying because of the present conflict in Korea.

There is little evidence by night of the rigid austerity which the Japanese are supposed to be practicing to get the country on its feet and free from American dollar aid. • Before the present power shortage brought on restrictions on kilowatt consumption, Tokyo's half-dozen popular entertainment districts were a blaze of neon and incandescent invitations to pleasure. City officials report that by December, 1951, more than 2,000 licensed bistros were operating.

Joints range from tiny standup bars, about the size of an eastside necktie emporium in N. Y., to lavish nightclubs like the two-storied Club Teito, the gaudy Grand Palace, the rowdy Show Boat and the popular Harem, which reportedly employs 600 girls as hostesses and dancing partners. Lavish clubs of this nature not only have English names, but offer American-style entertainment. Western dancebands, fast-talking emcees, girlie lines, singers and specialty acts make up the standard bill. Vocalists sing American pop tunes in English and orchs play so many U. S. tunes they sound like a recording of one of last year's Hit Parades.

Police Crackdown on Strippers

Strippers were standard attractions in nearly all clubs until early in 1951 when police instituted a crackdown that has driven the peelers from the better bistros. Gals are reported to be playing smaller cabarets on an unscheduled basis, doing a quick turn at one joint, then moving on to another.

Ban on strippers does not affect theatres, and many comely misses are peeling for pay and plaudits at the burley houses and in the popular revues staged at a dozen or more theatres in Shinjuku or the flamboyant Asakusa district of Tokyo. A recent innovation in the latter area which became a sock success in 1951 is a "strip kabuki," a parody on the classical all-male "kabuki" play which depicts the usual band of heavily-costumed warriors, but irreverently adds a scantily clad female who engages in sword fights and generally winds up without any sartorial accoutrements whatsoever. Customers love it.

Theatres in Japan are okay for Allied patrons, but majority of the cabarets are still "off limits" to occupation forces. Rule is that establishments serving food or drink are taboo unless specifically posted as "approved" for occupation personnel.

Despite the outward glitter, many Tokyo night spots claim that steep operation expenses cut into profits so heavily that they are barely breaking even. High prices keep away many Japanese patrons who are not benefiting directly from the "procurement boom." Biz picks up for two or three days after end-of-the-month pay days, then slackens off. Average white collar worker can't afford to patronize a nightclub where beer sells for 600 yen ($1.65) a bottle and where the hostess who sits at his table expects a sizable tip. He may go to a more modest cabaret, where beer in 300 yen and where he can get by with a nominal 10% tip. Or he may duck into a standup bar in one of Tokyo's myriad byways, where he can buy a shot of tolerably good whiskey for 100 yen (28c). But whatever his inclinations, there are plenty of opportunities in Tokyo.

Intra-Table Phone-Call Nitery Highlights Berlin's Big Cafe Biz

By PAUL GORDON

Berlin.

Berlin, still a hotspot for international politicians, also is a city with plenty of hotspots for nightclub lovers (who, of course, are international). The Berliners refer to these places as "Bars" or "Tanz-Kabaretts." The prices are high and Berliners are poor but nevertheless business is good.

The most "sensational" bar is the Resi, 400-table affair which has the largest dance floor of any night club in town and a 23-piece orchestra to go along with it. There are two water shows a night which consist of numerous fountains being sprayed thisaway and thataway under changing colored lights. It's a sort of water ballet (the orchestra invariably plays something from the Tschaikowsky Nutcracker Suite) with just a nozzle instead of Esther Williams.

The main attraction of the Resi isn't the large dance floor nor the water show. What really attracts the customers (especially the single ones) is the communications setup. Each of the 400 tables is equipped with a telephone and a vacuumatic mailbox which is just what the doctor ordered if you want a dance with a fraulein at a table across the floor, (If she's beautiful, someone will have her on the phone before you can read the table number. It wouldn't be a bad idea to take a pair of binoculars to this place. Among other purposes it facilitates reading the phone number hanging over the table).

Last August the Resi was a favorite with the "Oklahoma" cast which appeared here during the Cultural Festival. Celeste Holm, Mary Marlo, Ridge Bond, Pat Johnson and all the cast dropped in at one time or another. They all made a big hit with the Berliners readily accepting all invites to dance.

Still the plushiest joint in town and still the best place for a good meal is the Queen Bar. No VIP or celebrity comes to Berlin without dropping in the Queen Bar for a lobster, filet or shashlik. The Queen is located in the Grunewald area where beautiful mansions with huge terraces are common.

German Jive

Berlin has one place which resembles a little of 52d street and a little of Greenwich Village. It's a jive joint known as the "Badewanne" (the bathtub). Drummer Joe Glaser emcees in this cellar below, what used to be, the prewar, world-famous Femina club. The room is done in red and black with giant sketches of Lionel Hampton, Duke Ellington, Stan Kenton, Woody Herman, Harry James and Tommy Dorsey on the walls. Many Americans stroll up to the bandstand and join the jam session.

The best night club, complete with floor show and all, is the Splendid at Nollendorf Platz. This place has a 50c entrance fee which seems rather ridiculous when a scotch and soda sets you back a buck. But it isn't in effect to keep the drinkers out. There are too many Berliners around who can't afford a dime for a beer but can afford plenty of time to watch the Splendid floorshow.

For American in Berlin there's nothing like a Saturday night at the U. S. Press Club. Berlin used to have over 200 correspondents here when the Press Club was first opened. At that time it was exclusively (emphasize the "exclusively") for correspondents and their invited guests. General Frank Howley used to be one of the favorite invited guests here.

35c Scotch at Press Club

Today Berlin has approximately 15 correspondents. It takes a lot more to support a Press Club than 15 correspondents so there is a very liberal policy of giving out "guest cards" which are good for a year. On Saturday night just about all the "guests" are there and they keep Bartenders Alex and Kurt, and Rudy Piesker and his combo, on the job until 8 o'clock on Sunday morning. A scotch and soda here is 35c. Familiar faces around the Press Club in 1951 included William L. Shirer, Stewart Alsop, Edward R. Murrow, Drew Middleton and Marguerite Higgins.

Top names from Broadway and the Coast in Berlin in 1951 included Bob Hope, Marilyn Maxwell, Joan Fontaine, Arthur Godfrey, Joseph Than, Jan Kiepura, Martha Eggerth, Celeste Holm, Judith Anderson, Guthrie McClintic, Les Brown, Spyros Skouras, Francis Lederer, Robert Stolz, Jerome Whyte, Peter Davis, Robert Schnitzer and Jean Dalrymple. The latter, by the way, is now living here as the wife of Col. P. D. Ginder, who commands the 6th Infantry Regiment.

Berlin also has its existentialist hangout. It's a place known as the "Ewige Lampe." The floor show here runs for three hours, starting at 9 every evening. The sets look as if they were designed by Salvádor Dali.

Another popular spot the small cocktail lounge, "Volle Pulle," which is run by former filmstar Winnie Markus. It is sort of the Lindy's of Berlin, a popular spot for the after-theatre crowd and the actors who drop in for a drink and a bite of shashlik.

Two other spots well known in Berlin are the Eldorado, which features female impersonators, and the Golden Horseshoe. The latter has a riding ring in the center, surrounding the dance floor. The patron can dance or ride. After a few drinks some people have tried to do both at the same time, but it just doesn't go.

'House Girls'

There are plenty of joints in Berlin. Many of them have very modernistic decorations with high prices and watered drinks. Without an exception, these expensive ones have a doorman out front who not only keeps an eye on your car but also keeps an eye on the "house girls." These girls are allowed to drum up business at a bar, which is much better than operating on the corner of Augsburger Strasse and Kurfurstendamm.

Another type of joint in Berlin is that which offers a series of strip-tease acts. These places are usually pretty rundown as far the conditions of the building goes but they get prices on par with the most expensive clubs. The big trick of this trade is to space each strip a good 15-minutes apart. A strip (actually in many cases it is not even a strip, but just a gal in a French bathing suit dancing the "Rhapsody in Blue" or the "Bolero in Green") usually lasts about two minutes. So, for a half hour of drinking watered drinks at high prices the customer gets four minutes of "naked" girls.

Another type of night spot to open during the past year in Berlin is the "Spiel Casino." According to Berlin law, gambling joints are verboten. Some promoters of the game "Decarte" petitioned the Berlin supreme court in 1951 asking that Decarte be permitted in Berlin because it was a game of skill, not chance. When a favorable permission was handed down, the Berlin senate lost no time in passing laws regulating the number of, and the operation of, these "Spiel Casinos." A lot of night spots which were on the verge of bankruptcy immediately switched over into a very profitable business.

East Vs. West Zones

There is quite a contrast in Berlin night life between the East and the West zones. As far as the East Sector goes, there just ain't any night life.

Typical Commie method in combating the West Berlin showwindow was an editorial in one of their newspapers a while back titled, "Bananas, Buicks and Brothels." They pointed out that the West Berliners have become too materialistic, succumbing to American capitalism. They imply that the East Germans are much better off without the bananas and the Buicks. With regard to the brothels, they may deny they have 'em, but the West Berliners remember all too well the days of Russian occupation in 1945.

Best Wishes to Everyone,

Known and Unknown

Britain's Changing Show Biz Pattern As TV Moves Ahead

By CECIL MADDEN
(Assistant to Controller, BBC Television Programs)

London.

Television is changing living habits for Britons by bringing entertainment and current life (this has been Festival of Britain year with its Battersea Pleasure gardens thrown in) to rural districts where many have never been inside a theatre. The housing shortage caused by war blitzing has forced families to double up with their daughters and their husbands and children, who between them can usually invest in a television set. And this is where Grandma comes in—Grandma who was too old for anyone to take out to a show or the movies. Now Grandma sits permanently installed at the family TV and misses nothing on the screen, not even a repeat performance, of an Elizabethan tragedy. So today Grandma is probably the best informed person in the country and will soon be quoting Shakespeare and Ibsen.

Well, what is the state of TV in Britain today? There are now just over 1,000,000 TV license holders paying £2 each, and probably at least 100,000 more pirates who pay nothing, but are being rounded up. Compare this with 11,000,000 radio license holders paying £1. Since the Government decided to raid 15% of BBC's entire license revenue towards cost of rearmament, television has to budget with extreme care on a relative shoestring. The BBC's charter will be debated in Parliament in the next six months, with some pressure for a measure of sponsorship and BBC against this as avowed policy.

To recap history, BBC started first television service back in 1936 (first program of which I myself directed) sadly and instantly closed by war in 1939. Re-opened in 1946 TV remains a monopoly under the BBC umbrella, expanding to the Midlands in 1949, to the North in 1951—with two powerful transmitters due to open in 1952, covering Scotland, Wales and South-West England. Thus some 80% of the country will be served, assuming manufacturers can get components and the 66% purchase tax on the sale of sets is not too great a sales deterrent. But the Government cuts regretfully force abandoning of giant White City project and five low-power stations planned for Newcastle, Aberdeen, Southampton, Belfast and Plymouth.

Children's TV Click

Probably the greatest success of the year has been the development of Children's TV, catering from five to 15 years old, with huge adult parent public joining in at weekends. Restricted to one hour daily with specially written plays, serial novels (Treasure Island, Little Women, Sara Crewe, Railway Children) ballet, sport, nature, animals, costume, art, competitions and magaines, juvenile taste is carefully moulded. Robert Morley eagerly created and starred in a comedy series "Parent-Craft" for children, with Alan Bromley (who also scored hit with Trafalgar adventure play "Powder Monkey") as director. First quarter hour daily is devoted to younger children, mostly with new puppet characters such as ('Timothy Telescope') or ('Vegetable Village,') the rest of hour working up robustly in the age groups.

Children's documentaries are "Men of Action," subtly suggesting careers, "Junior Wranglers" were popular debates, and histrionics came fast and furious in "Play the Game." Film star Valerie Hobson ran "How To" series, actor Humphrey Lestocq started new career as foil to "Mr. Turnip" puppet, light comedian discovery Bruce Gordon scored as "Man in Armour."

Program scheme differs from the U. S. in length—mornings, two hours of film for trade purposes: afternoon: 3-4 for housewives, with summer sports additional; 5-6 for children: evening; 8-10:30 p.m. for general public. Northerners, alleged to go to bed early, are demanding earlier evening start, which is a likely future development.

Outside events, notably public functions and movements of the Royal Family, remain outstanding attractions with General Election reflected up and down the country in the new TV coverage of the change to Conservative Government. In Election, telecasts Anthony Eden revealed himself an effective fireside personality. At fees available sporting promoters remain intransigeant on professional bouts. England, land of no baseball, has its own summer time-filler in cricket with football (Rugby and Soccer) in winter and growing interest in televised ice-hockey. Important microwave link program was across Channel from Calais, auguring well for Parisian week being mulled for 1952. BBC runs its own newsreels at 15 minutes, new three times a week with Sunday summary, has reciprocal arrangement with NBC.

Drama at full length (sometimes up to 2¼ hours) remains backbone of TV with many stars ready to appear when free. Local playwrights Rattigan and Priestley obliged with special TV Festival offerings. Absorbing Naval POW play "Albert," collaboration of Guy Morgan (British) and Edward Sammis (USA) obtained highest rating figures in BBC's own viewer poll. "Night of the Fourth" a German thriller and "To Live in Peace," an old Italian character piece (not the film story), were surprise hits. Amongst American plays recently mounted were "Lillian Hellman's "Little Foxes," "Dinner at Eight," "Petrified Forest," "Claudia," "The Golden Door"—oh, and "Apple in Eden" altogether new script so light it almost vanished in lingerie and a bath tub which were summarily censored out for repeat performance.

No Kinescoping

Equity restrictions so far prevent any kinescoping whatsoever and Musicians' Union likewise prohibit relays from any theatres as remotes. Agreement, however, is likely soon on TV pickups from straight plays. Invited rehearsal, however, brought spectacle of the year with Langdon's "London Melody" from Empress Hall on stage and ice with Norman Wisdom and Belita.

Variety relied on established favorite floorshows "Cafe Continental." "Top Hat Rendezvous" and "Music Hall," adding Terry Thomas crazy hit "How Do You

Britain's Changing Show Biz

View?" Eric Barker satirical comedy half-hour and Jewel and Warris "Turn It Up" knockabout show. British version of New York's "What's My Line?" caught on with political quiz "In the News," a Friday night "must." "The Passing Show" was series of five 90-minute full scale cavalcadees of 50 years of British show biz with four human stories spanning the times, bridging favorite musical comedy excerpts, which mostly starred lovely American songbird Irene Manning.

Authenticity of medical series "Matters of Life and Death" caused widespread attention also documentary series on Law Courts (from scripter Duncan Ross and director Ian Atkins). "I Made News," weekly crime series introduced the actual character in very case along with dramatization. Loch Ness monster program, no leg pull, produced many eye witnesses with remarkably sincere evidence of its existence.

"Picture Page" girl Joan Gilbert won Television Society award and with Pin-Up announcer Sylvia Peters heads many popularity polls. In fact the three regular staff announcers lead over artists as household gods.

Novelty experiments have been i televising of instrumental music, also staging of full-length studio operas, "Butterfly," "Boheme," "School for Fathers," "The Consul" and "Belle Helene"— latter to mixed notices.

Recent U. S. visitors interviewed from London's Alexandra Palace studios included Clifton Utley, Lizabeth Scott, Jose Ferrer, Evelyn Keyes, Theodor Uppman, Margaret O'Brien and Tennessee Williams.

New idea of surprise items inserted unscheduled at sudden notice shewed flexibility and often cause viewers to regret having missed a gem, one such being Irish playwright Lennox Robinson's unexpected complaint that the royalty rates would ruin writers. Another, Naval Captain Brown's unemotional account of Anglo/U. S. joint recovery from sea of Russian MiG in Korea, 100 miles behind enemy lines. Mr. and Mrs. Carlin astonished all by their adventurous Atlantic journey from Canada to London in an amphibious jeep, crowning all by driving their precarious vehicle up the lift into the Lime Grove TV studio itself.

It is probably true to say that the endless choice and more violent tempo of American TV suits America and the solider British brand fits the quieter British way of life, at any rate for the time being. The twain might meet, but they seldom do in plays on Broadway or Shaftesbury Avenue and it is more likely that common ground would be found on comparisons of living and customs. When nations realize we are fundamentally the same, television may do much to speak peace across the world, so with Continental TV now a fact, though up to now only on small scale for restricted hours in France (819 lines), Denmark and Holland (625 lines), with Belgium due to follow and Spain dickering, thanks to Britain's lead (still on 405 lines, incidentally) international TV may be just around the proverbial corner for a real window on th world.

U. S. Army Runs Biggest Agency For Talent in GI Shows for Europe

By GEORGE F. GAAL

Frankfurt.

The U. S. Army is believed to be running one of the biggest, if not the biggest talent agencies in Europe, providing entertainment to American soldiers on the Continent.

There some 300,000-plus American GI's now in Europe, with an additional 50,000 or more Yank dependents. Their presence here, and their possible further increase, will make the Army's entertainment program enlarge even further.

This vaudeville agency is incorporated in the Special Activities Division (SAD) of the European Command (EUCOM), headed by Brig. Gen. Charles H. Schwartz. SAD has three branches, the EUCOM Exchange System (post exchanges, commissaries, snack bars, etc.), the EUCOM Motion Picture Service, and the Office of the Chief of Special Services. Latter outfit's entertainment branch handles all talent booked for the GI circuit, directly or through agents authorized by the Army.

An estimate of $2,000,000 yearly-minimum in salaries for talent is figured on the basis of actors presently employed service clubs throughout the command. There are some 375 European entertainers now working in these clubs. Most of them are Dutch, French, English, Irish, Italian and Danish. If their salaries are figured to average $100 per week, which is a low average, then these salaries alone would come to almost $2,000,000 a year.

In addition to them there are German entertainers and musicians, plus a small number of Yank talent hired in Europe. The German acts are all booked by German agents. The talents do not include USO shows, and name stars from Hollywood or Broadway, who appear on the GI circuit on a no-salary basis.

Dreher Elected Prexy Of K.C. Musicians Local

Kansas City.

In its annual election recently local musicians union boosted Ted Dreher to the presidency for 1952. He had been treasurer of the organization, Local 34, American Federation of Musicians. Al Phillips, who had been filling an unexpired term as vice-president, was elected to the position for 1952. Larry Phillips was reelected secretary. New treasurer is Olin James. Guy Davis was elected sergeant-at-arms.

Board of directors consists of Charles Dickert, who served part of 1951 as president; George Weiser, Ruel Joyce, William Trumbauer, Rubert Willis. The vacancy in the top spot was created when Frank Lott, longtime prexy, retired last October. Local also picked Dickert and Willis and delegates to the convention to be held Santa Barbara, Calif., next June.

Recall Heyday of British Composer And Int'l Rise of U.S. Songsmith

By JOHN ABBOTT

(Director of Francis Day & Hunter, Ltd.)

London.

Gallons of ink have been spilled, conferences of Briting songwriters held from which delegates have been appointed to interview British Broadcasting Co. officials, questions asked in Parliament, all with the worthy idea of getting a fair quota of British-produced songs to the public over the air.

The BBC has listened sympathetically, circularized bandleaders, artists and others, but with little result, if the showing in the weekly hit parade is any criterion. The percentage of the home-produced article is about one in 10—not a very encouraging outlook for British writers.

With an experience of over 50 years in England and America in the pop music business, I have been trying to trace the reasons for the decline and fall in the popularity of British songs and the rise to the premier position of the American creations, not only nationally but internationally.

The responsible factors are numerous, but consist mainly in the kind of songs required to fit the various changing moods of the public over the last half century, plus the greater opportunities afforded to the imported article.

The heyday of the British writers was undoubtedly in the late '90s and the early years of the 20th century, and synchronized with the popularity of vaudeville. At one of these West End places of entertainment, it was no unusual thing to get a bill with 20 to 25 acts, the majority being vocalists and stars in their own right.

The Golden Opportunities

These golden opportunities, as usual, created a school of writers who could provide songs to fit the style and characters created by individual artists, because their strength was in the characters they portrayed. Artists like Albert Chevalier, Gus Elen and Alec Hurley; Dan Leno giving us humorous pictures of shopwalkers, Tower of London beefeaters; Vesta Tilley bringing to life the mashers of the day in "Piccadilly Johnny," "Following in Father's Footsteps" and "The Midnight Sun"; while Ella Shields and J. R. Rickaby burlesqued them in "Burlington Bertie" and "They Built Piccadilly for Me"; Vesta Victoria in domestic situations like "Waiting at the Church" and "Poor John"; George Bastow with his Army prototypes, "The Galloping Major" and "Captain Gingah"; Eugene Stratton a great artist in minstrelsy singing such songs as "Lily of Laguna," "I May Be Crazy" and dozens of others. And, of course, Harry Lauder in his romantic and humorous Scotch studies.

But why go on—there were hundreds of others, great artists creating good songs, many of which still live and will in time become traditional.

The point is that these characters no longer exist and, in a mixed holiday crowd, it would be difficult to distinguish the city bank manager from the one who supplies the needs of his customers from a barrow, all being more or less cast in a common mould. Vaudeville, or the music hall as they were more generally called, was changing in its character, assuming the cloak of respectability under the influence of the feminine portion of the population, who saw no reason why they should be barred from sharing in the pleasures enjoyed by their sweethearts and lesser halves.

The situation on the other side of the Atlantic was decidedly different; only a few years had elapsed since the passing of the act which conferred the benefit of copyright on British musical and literary works, and anything new in the way of comedy songs, ballads or the outpourings of a literary genius was welcomed. Tony Pastor made regular visits to England, not only to secure the services of vaudeville stars, but to get a supply of up-to-date comedy songs.

Re Stephen Foster

Looking through the indices of copyright entries at Washington made many years ago, I was amazed to find that a big percentage of compositions entered there consisted of sacred songs and rather maudlin ballads with little claim to popularity. In the middle of the 19th century America produced only one great writer in Stephen Foster. He showed his versatility when he gave the world "Camptown Races," "Oh, Susannah" and "Jeannie with the Light Brown Hair." Here again Foster was working to get something in the way of a pattern in supplying songs for the numerous minstrel companies coming into popular favor.

After that, with the exception of several patriotic songs produced by the Civil War, there was little until towards the end of the century, but America, while importing British pop songs, ballads and musical plays, was learning and catching up. In opening its doors to emigres from Europe, they were importing not only the hewers of wood and the drawers of water but something spiritual and cultural. They brought with them traditional melodies which were often blended and used in popular songs, and they produced and gave opportunities to great composers and authors.

Today America has almost ceased to import, but exports its musical products all over the world. Gone are the days when Gilbert & Sullivan operas, or a musical comedy by Leslie Stuart, drew admiring audiences in New York, but today London theatres await the latest Rodgers and Hammerstein, Irving Berlin and Cole Porter successes.

American pop writers also have golden opportunities through commercial radio, television, sound films and gramophone records to get their works before the public, and it is in this respect that the style of the British composer is somewhat cramped.

An English bandleader making up his usual half-weekly program feels that he is bound to include something from the latest musical play, excerpts from cinema films and a few numbers from the American hit parade. And by the time he has listed one or two standards, there is precious little room for the hundred homemade songs struggling to find a place in the sun.

Hence the reason for the continual cry of the British writer for encouragement. But hope still springs eternal.

Music's Potentialities In Television

By ANDRE KOSTELANETZ

The potentialities which television brings to music are as tremendous as they are obvious. For the first time in history music in the form of operatic or concert presentation can be witnessed in their entire effect not only by those attending the performance in the auditorium but by millions in every big city and small community.

The potentialities which music brings to television are equally tremendous. Although the television industry is young, opinions are being voiced increasingly that this form of entertainment absorbs material at a greater rate than it can be created. This is not only true of comedy material or straight plays, but also of the personalities performing them. More than once I have heard the criticism: "I have watched this actor in several different roles and he is always very good—the same face all the time!" I believe this is one of the reasons why some smart actors, though young and personable, have begun to "hide their faces," as it were. They balance a "straight" appearance with performances as character actors, hidden behind beards, character makeup, wigs, ets.

Music, on the other hand, doesn't present these problems. Past history has proven, through operatic performances, concerts, radio, records, etc., that we are perfectly willing to listen to the same piece of music time and again while we might get slightly bored seeing the same play, even with a different cast, more than twice or three times. To explain the whys and wherefores of this would take too long at this point, as we would have to discuss the emotional and mental makeup of people. But let us not forget that good songs are being written daily—certainly at a greater rate than good dramatic material. This wealth of continually appealing material which music offers is, I believe, the biggest boon to television—certainly so in the long run.

Great strides have been made during the last few years in the actual presentation of music on television, although it seems to me that there is still too mush preoccupation with showing the technicalities of a musical performance. Although it may offer a technically interesting picture on the screen showing, through a closeup, how an attractive singer becomes unattractive while singing a high-note, and although it might make an equally intriguing shot to show how a pianist hits the keyboard with his fingers a violinist works his left hand, these technicalities diminish the final effect of music. They distract and rob the audience of a certain magic and illusion which should be part of a good musical performance. In the final analysis, an audience is only interested in the musical message, not in its mechanics.

For this same reason I believe that the current preoccupation with the "roving camera" is carried too far. Admittedly there is an educative value in featuring an instrument on the TV screen at that particular moment when it is heard most prominently in the orchestra. Continuous repetition of this same effect, however, becomes tiring and obvious. Such effect should be used like a spice in cooking. In showing an orchestra on the screen we should remember that when we attend a live performance we never lose sight of the entire orchestra, although our eye may rove for a moment to a particular section.

Just as there are different kinds of dramatic presentations we have to consider different forms of presenting music on TV. There is the concert or opera which is broadcast from the actual auditorium; then there is the musical presentation which is especially created for the cameras in TV studios. On such programs we might not only show the orchestra, but feature a musical scene as interpreted by singers, dancers, instrumentalists, etc. For such projects we need spacious and well-equipped studio facilities which are still at a premium.

Imagination's Free Rein

Not until studios, especially designed for musical presentations have been built, will we be able to give our imagination the necessary free rein. Such studios should have the necessary space for presenting on the same program a full symphony orchestra, a ballet, and several sets in which musical numbers can be enacted. These studios should make use of such modern technical equipment turntables, hydraulic stages, etc., and if the producers desire that an audience witness the TV broadcast, then facilities should be such as to enable the audience to watch the entire performance without being in the way of those working on the show.

I also believe in musical stand-ins, so as not to tire out the performers while cameras, lighting, etc., are being set up. A singer, more so than any other performer, is only able to give his best performance if he is not exhausted by overlong rehearsals on the day of the show, for otherwise his voice will betray the strain on him.

Last but not least I would like to stay a word about the music itself. I firmly believe that TV will be such a boon to it that new works will be especially commissioned and composed for TV presentations. In budgeting a musical program money should not only be expended on the presentation of already existing works, but also toward encouraging and finding new ones. The TV medium is much too important to remain a borrowing agency from other media; it should take the leadership and become an outlet for new compositions.

'Puss on Ice' a London Hit; Arnold Circus Oke

London.

With three American stars heading the cast, Claude Langdon's new blades pantomime, "Puss In Boots on Ice," preemed at the mammoth Empress Hall Thursday (20). This sumptuous production will undoubtedly pay dividends on its $300,000 investment. Eric Waite, as the King, skates with great skill and a fine comedy sense, which will appeal to the moppets while Jimmy Carter and Alice Farrar the Prince and Princess glide with spectacular charm. With a cast of more than 100, including a corps de ballet and flying ballet, production is first-rate seasonal fare and should draw big in its three months season.

The second major London circus opened the same day (20) at Harringay Arena. For the fifth year it is presented by Tom Arnold, with Sabu heading a big international cast. One of the highlights of the show is aerialist Rose Gold, who reenacts the thrilling high leap recently performed over the Seine [illegible] Paris from the Eiffel Tower.

Among the many specialty acts to receive ovations were the Schumann Horses, The Andalusian Sextet, Enrico Caroli, the Great Pusztan Troupe of springboard acrobats, the Mazur Bros., Four Fellers, the Eight Flying Croneras and the Amazing Briton. Animal acts play a major part in the show.

French Assembly Keeps Theatre Admission Tax

Paris.

The National Assembly has continued the admission tax on Paris theatres. The funds from this are to be used to subsidize the privately-owned Paris theatres to the tune of 110,000,000 francs, about $300,000).

Since the state-owned theatres are practically exempt from tax, this means that the funds gathered from privately-owned houses will be used to subsidize a smart, selected few.

I Like To Remember...

By MRS. GUS EDWARDS

My devotion to the songs of Gus Edwards is a mixture of many things. To me, each song is a milestone, a happy reminder of yesterday and the hundred little things that made it merry and perhaps a little sad. I've shared Gus Edwards' songs with the world —they are sung hundreds of times a day on radio, on records, in theatres and on people's tongues—but the memories behind these songs are mine alone. I cherish them and it's no wonder I like to remember:

"Schooldays"—featured Gus Edwards' "Song Revue of 1910." VARIETY — yes, I still remember that clipping — predicted bright futures for Georgie Price, Eddie Cantor, Walter Winchell, George Jessel, Herman Timberg and Lila Lee. They were talented youngsters that Gus had recruited from ferryboats, street corners, alleys and wherever youngsters happened to be singing dancing. What wonderful youngsters they were! Walter Winchell—so handsome and a real heartbreaker. Georgie Price —a seven-year-old bundle of courage and talent, the spunkiest kid I've ever seen. Bert Wheeler—our lovable "bad" boy, who caused many a black eye with his backstage scuffles. And, of course, Eddie Cantor and George Jessel, inseparable from the first day they worked for Gus.

I remember the early heartaches of producing the first "Song Revue." Gus had an instinct for spotting talent and a genius for working with youngsters, but alas, the big booking agencies didn't share his enthusiasm for kid shows. After being turned down by everyone, Gus finally persuaded the manager of the old Hammerstein Theatre to take a chance on his youngsters. What an ovation on opening night! A dozen curtain calls and Gus taking bow after bow, with his talented babes screaming with glee because we were "in." Then came offers from everywhere — "the Palace," London, Paris. Eventually we played them all.

Trouping The World

What fun we had trouping all over the world—Gus and I with our family of young stars. In those days vaudeville salaries were not lucrative and travelling expenses made it necessary for us to do a little fibbing about the ages of our company. Gus managed to convince one skeptical train conductor that the youngsters required only half-fare tickets when suddenly George Jessel appeared wearing his favorite derby and smoking a big black cigar! And he was only 11!

I also like to remember "Sunbonnet Sue" and the way Georgie Price used to sing it to Lila ('Cuddles') Lee. I'll never forget one performance in particular. We were on the last lap of a cross-country tour and had played all the top cities except Chicago (which had a city ordinance prohibiting youngsters on a public stage). After much pressure, Gus agreed to take a chance and bring the youngsters to the Windy City.

Opening night was an exciting event. Chicago theatregoers had been waiting for Gus to play their town, the press had been wonderful and the theatre was sold out. Then came the fly in the ointment. Five minutes before curtain, the Gerry Society served notice that the kids couldn't appear. Things looked pretty black but Gus saved the day with an idea that gave us quite a chuckle.

Instead of sending Georgie and Lila out on the stage, he let them do "Sunbonnet Sue" on the steps leading from the stage to the orchestra pit. The rest of the show was performed in the aisles, in boxes and from the first row in the orchestra. The Gerry Society was helpless; technically, we weren't performing onstage. The audience loved it and the show went over big.

"I Just Can't Make My Eyes Behave" recalls memories of Flo Ziegfeld and Anna Held. Gus wrote this song at Ziegfeld's request for one of his "Follies." It helped make her a great hit in this country and cemented a friendship between Gus and Ziegfeld. Ziegfeld was delighted when one of the kids would be tapped for the "Follies." Eddie Cantor, Mae Murray, Lillian Lorraine and Mitzi Mayfair were just a few graduates into Ziegfeld shows.

"When Old New York Was Young" reminds me of Reisenweber's in 1917 where Gus startled New Yorkers with the first lavish floorshow in this country. He produced a show of legit stage proportions—but as a cafe offering it was unheard of . . . $15,000 for beautiful costumes, a line of gorgeous girls and a fine dance orchestra. These were all innovations. Some tables were reserved for the entire season, with the same "men about town" coming back night after night. That was the beginning of the real big restaurant cabaret, the forerunner of today's Latin Quarter and Copacabana.

Singing Commercial

"In My Merry Oldsmobile" was one of the first hits Gus ever wrote and probably the first singing commercial. In later years, another Edwards hit, "Tammany," was to be turned into a singing jingle for Barbasol. In those days it was hard to get an Olds, and Gus occasionally became irked when performers who merely sang the song received a bright, shiny car while the composer walked. In retaliation, he wrote "Take Me Back In Your Cadillac," which poked gentle fun at the Olds. He had been promised a car by the Cadillac company, as it was interested in the exploitation value of an Edwards song. When the great day finally arrived, Gus was introduced to a top official who informed him, "Sorry, Mr. Edwards, Cadillac merged with the Oldsmobile Co. this morning!"

Of all Gus' songs I have a particular affection for "By the Light of the Silv'ry Moon." My devotion to this song is purely emotional for within those famous 20 bars are memories of the first trip Gus and I took through the Grand Canal in Venice in 1915. We were very young, and one beautiful night we cruised through the Canal in our gondola.

Other youngsters whom Gus started on the road to fame in later years included Ray Bolger, Eleanor Powell, the Duncan Sisters, Groucho Marx, the Lane Sisters, Hildegarde, Earl Carroll, Ann Dvorak, Mervyn LeRoy, Lilyan Tashman and Jack Pearl, to mention a few.

Perhaps the continued success of his songs and the triumphs of his youngsters are the best memorial any showman can have.

Disk Jockey Review

ROCH ULMER
WHB, Kansas City

Roch Ulmer is new to these parts, but is no newcomer to radio and the music biz. After a long spell at KSTP, St. Paul, he put in about a year as production manager at KFEQ, St. Joseph, Mo., before joining WHB last September. Recently the time schedule has been made up to give him two long sessions, one from 2 to 4:15 ("Club 710") each afternoon, and the other from 11:15 p.m. to 1 a.m. He also handles "The Weather and You," a five-minute daily shot at 6:45 p.m.

The two long shows are straight record sessions, Ulmer going in for most anything in the field of music. On the late show he plugs requests by wire, and draws a fistfull of telegrams nightly, indicating a lively and extensive listener following. Afternoon round features pops of the day and standards, but on the evening show the edge goes to the varied and unusual recordings.

In the jockey role. Ulmer keeps chatter to a minimum and also keeps it crisp and sprightly much of the time. Chatter also reflects his familiarity with the recorded note. Over all Ulmer turns out a very listenable platter session.

How Corny Can We Get?, Or How Binge Of Offbeat Music Brought Sock '51 Payoff

By HERM SCHOENFELD

New sounds and new talent took over the music business in 1951. It was a year-long jag of gimmicks, novelties, alfalfa tunes and electronic stunts the climaxed a trend away from the old song patterns building since the end of the last war. With the end of the offbeat cycle not yet in sight, the songmakers are now seriously and intensively pondering the question: "How corny can we get?"

The disk end of the music industry is apparently aiming to push the current cycle to its outermost limits. During the past year, the offbeat binge has brought the biggest payoff since the spectacular profits of the war period. While the solid songs, with few exceptions, laid bombs saleswise last year, the novelties and country tunes have been breaking through on wax with a steady succession of hits. The disk-makers have found that new sounds can sell their merchandise and they have been garnishing their platters with echo chambers, jazz harpsichords, multiple-voice dubbings and other forms of electronic exotica. There are no signs in the wind that the disk companies will reverse their field in the coming year. The present formula has proved to be the right recipe for the public taste.

But while the diskers have come up with the key to the mass market, the publishers made little progress during the past year to reestablish their operations on a solid basis. The old squeeze is still on. The record companies are still firmly in the saddle of the music business; sheet music sales, particularly on the hit novelties, have continued to sag; mechanical royalties are not enough to pay the overhead; and the multiplicity of small firms, with no staffs and sometimes no offices, are furnishing tough competition in an offbeat song market.

For the major publishers, the most hopeful sign for the future has been their steadily rising take from performance rights. During the past year, the income of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers hit an all-time peak of about $12,000,000 despite the absence of licensing agreements with the picture companies. Radio, in face of video's inroads, accounted for over $8,000,000 of the total, with television chipping in over $2,000,000.

ASCAP's TV income is seen growing to the single biggest source in a few years, while a new avenue of performance revenue may be opened up as a result of the Kefauver-Bryson amendment to the Copyright Act, which would compel jukebox operators to pay 1c a record per week as licensing fees. With an estimated $5,000,000 to come from the jukeboxes, if the amendment passes, the era of a $25,000,000 ASCAP melon is drawing near.

Emergence of BMI

One of the most important by-products of the recent cornball cycle has been the emergence of Broadcast Music, Inc., into a high-powered licensing organization. Operating with an extensive stable of folk publishers, headquartered in Nashville, and a flock of New York "hillbilly" outfits, BMI during 1951 had its greatest play on the best-seller lists since its formation 10 years ago. BMI hits included such whoppers as "Tennessee Waltz," "Come On-a My House," "Cold, Cold Heart," "Slow Poke" and "I Get Ideas." BMI's own publishing firm, under Julie Stearns' direction, came up with "Because of You" and "Jezebel" for a record-breaking year. Topping the previous year's activity by a considerable margin, BMI shelled out about $2,650,000 for performance rights for the fiscal year ending July 31.

The "new sounds" pattern of the music business, however, gave the biggest break of all to new talent during 1951. The disk-buying public, which is centered in the 12 to 16-year-old age bracket, brushed off most of the established name singers for youngsters with a fresh, and sometimes weird vocal attacks. For the major diskers, the click of the newcomers took them off the hook for the heavy minimum guarantees made to the vet stars who failed to pay off as expected.

The new constellation of disk stars gave bigtime status to such vocalists as Tony Bennett, Rosemary Clooney, Les Paul & Mary Ford, Guy Mitchell, April Stevens, Johnnie Ray, The Four Aces, Eddie Fisher, Tommy Edwards and Del Wood. One of the most phenomenal clicks of the past year was Mario Lanza, who straddled both the longhair and pop fields with his multimillion sales for RCA Victor on such numbers as "Be My Love" and "Loveliest Night of the Year." Lanza was one of the few "legitimate" voices to break through this year but, once again, his powerful tenor fitted the definition of "new sound."

Whether the disk companies are building genuine new vocalists or only selling electronic and stylistic gimmicks, only the future will tell. How many of the newcomers who clicked in 1951 will be part of the disk picture in the years to come? Some of the youngsters, who rode to the top via tricky novelties and background effects, are proving to be one-shot flashes in the pan. They are already having trouble in getting followup hits, and the tendency of the artists and repertory brain-trusters to duplicate the same sound patterns on the sequels is only accelerating the downward slide.

Paul-Ford's 6,000,000 Sale

Such artists as Bennett, Ray and the Paul-Ford team have shown enough stuff during the past year to produce clicks back-to-back. The Paul-Ford duo, with their soundtrack dubbing technique, racked up a 6,000,000 sale this year with their cuts of "The World Is Waiting for the Sunrise," "Mockin' Bird Hill," "Whisperin'" and a couple of other best-sellers. For the year, they are sharing bestselling honors with Patti Page, a vocalist who broke through in 1950 with "All My Love" and followed up with a spectacular string of a dozen consecutive hits on the Mercury label.

The shifting pattern of the wax market also resulted in a radical reshuffling in the positions of the major diskeries on the bestseller lists during the past year. Columbia Records, which early in 1950, had been banking on its longhair long-play catalog to make up for the deficit in its pop operations, surged to the top during 1951 with its roster of young vocalists and a new administrative team headed by Jim Conkling, who took over the prexy spot early in the year after the resignation of Ted Wallerstein, and Mitch Miller, pop a&r chief, who has hit with his "experimentation" with jazz harpsichords, English horns, echo chambers and offbeat vocalists. The last 12 months have been the biggest year in Columbia's history.

RCA Victor and Capitol also perked considerably during the past year in their pop operations to boom the whole disk industry over last year's retail gross turnover of $150,000,000. Decca slipped off its 1950 clip but the company has been maintaining its solid financial standing due to the strongest pop catalog business in the field. Among the smaller companies, Mercury has also had an exceptional year, paced by such artists as Patti Page, Vic Damone and Eddy Howard. London Records, on the other hand, folded its American waxing operations to concentrate exclusively on distribution of British-made platters.

The ever-shifting a&r picture at the major companies brought two important switches during the year. At Decca, Dave Kapp, brother of the diskery's co-founder, Jack Kapp, exited the company in a policy disagreement with Decca prexy Milton R. Rackmil. Morty Palitz replaced Kapp at Decca, and Kapp moved into the RCA Victor pop a&r spot held by Charles Grean for a little less than two years. Mitch Miller, meantime, was inked to another two-year pact with Columbia Records, signalizing the company's intention to travel in the same offbeat groove which paid off during 1951.

Disk-TV Link Stronger

The past year saw a growing liaison between the disk and television industries. In a concrete way, Decca prexy Milton Rackmil made a bid to move into the vidpix field via the diskery's buyout of the majority holdings in Universal Pictures and the eventual merger of the two companies.

Television also had a strong positive impact on disk sales during the past year. Fears that video saturation would eventually cut into the platter market were completely dispelled in 1951. The year-end statistics showed that the disk industry take had increased over the previous year while the circulation of TV sets was reaching into 14,000,000 homes with an estimated audience of 60,000,000 people. As one trade exec explained it, "TV is keeping 'em at home and that gives us a shot at the public."

Although video has proved a valuable adjunct in selling wax, the new medium has played an insignificant role in making hits to the disappointment of most publishers who are looking for some way to take the business out of the hands of the record companies and the disk jockeys. But video, unlike the early days of radio when new songs were made by live plugs, has confined itself to the playing of standards and established hits, with new entries getting the complete brush on important shows or relegated to minor programming spots.

No change in video's stance on new songs is expected with its continued growth. Countering the belief that TV, like radio, will inaugurate new era for young songsmiths, vet trade execs point out that radio was forced to make its own hits. Two decades ago, disks did not have the power it has now, with the result that radio had no outside criterion to go by in the selection of its material. That factor, plus the power of such names as Bing Crosby, Guy Lombardo and Kate Smith to make hits overnight, gave radio the self-confidence to plug new tunes. Currently, however, TV can afford to play it safe because it has an objective check in disk-bestseller lists. Tunes that sell on wax are held to be surefire material for TV shows, and programmers are taking few chances in testing untried song material on high-budgeted shows.

Along with the new sounds, last year saw the complete breakdown in the barriers between pop and country music. Once confined to the hinterlands, the backwoods tunes and the alfalfa artists have been harvesting spectacular sales in the urban centers. Such names as Eddy Arnold, Tennessee Ernie, Red Foley, Lefty Frizzell, Ernest Tubb, Stuart Hamblen and Roy Acuff, among others, have developed into the most consistent bestsellers on wax in the business, surpassing most of the top pop names on the major labels.

The click of the cider-jug ditties was highlighted during 1951 by the "Tennessee Waltz" phenomenon. The biggest hit in 20 years, the number sold over 4,500,000 on disks (over 2,000,000 via Patti Page's version alone) and over 2,000,000 copies of sheet music. The number started late in 1950 and continued on the bestseller lists well into 1951. Other mountain-born clicks this year include "Cold Cold Heart" and "Slow Poke," both of which are headed for the golden 1,000,000 record-seller circle.

Political pundits, meantime, can read their own lesson for the 1952 elections in the year's biggest hypo, "Old Soldiers Never Die," which was taken from General Douglas MacArthur's address to a joint session of Congress following his return from Japan last spring. Within a few hours after the address, all the major labels were rushing versions of the "Old Soldiers" p.d. tune to the market in addition to long-play platters of the full MacArthur address. But despite the disk jockey hypos, the newspaper bally and the mag spreads, the "Old Soldiers" etchings and the L-P platters laid a big egg in the disk market.

The Funny and the Unusual, Or Disking's Early Days

By JIM WALSH

Vinton, Va.

During the almost 75 years since Thomas A. Edison invented the phonograph, plenty of funny things have happened in connection with the oldtime cylinders (known then as "rollers") and the still-dominant platters.

Probably most of the funniest occurred in pioneer days when techniques were experimental and all sorts of makeshifts were resorted to, but I can't withhold a feeling of envy for a certain New York record-collector. This bird, name unknown to me, is said to have friendships with the different record companies that allow him to obtain masters that were discarded when something went wrong. He specializes in those on which Crosby, et al., express their chagrin in the most uninhibited language. A New Yorker who has heard some of the rejects tells me that a number of the girls—not necessarily Tallulah, either — deliver themselves even more pithily and to the point than do the boys. Anyway, a fellow with such a collection need never be shy a barrelful of laughs.

But getting back to my thesis of the funny things that happened in the old days, vet tunesmith Fred Hager still chuckles at something that occurred in the '90's, when he was directing recording bands for Edison, Columbia and Zonophone. Fred, the first man to make a commercial violin record, recalls that he conducted a band in a room so small there wasn't room for the slide trombonist to do his stuff. So Mr. Trombone had to stand on a chair out in the hall and toot his horn over the transom.

Pres. Taft's Personal Recordings

One of the funniest stories I've heard in connection with the phonograph had a political angle. It was told me by the late George O'Connor, a Washington attorney who has been a favorite White House entertainer through every administration from William McKinley's to Harry Truman's. Back in 1912, genial William Howard Taft was running for re-election to the Presidency but not getting anywhere fast, with Theodore Roosevelt opposing him on the Progressive ticket and the Democrat, Woodrow Wilson, obviously in the lead. Taft knew he was in for a licking, but he didn't let it get the best of his sense of humor. He summoned O'Connor to the White House, and said:

"George, I've just made some Victor records, giving my views on public affairs, for use in this campaign. Now I want you to do me a favor. I want you to go to the Victor plant at Camden and make two records especially for me. I want you to sing two of my favorite songs that have a direct bearing on the way things are going in the campaign.

"What are the songs, Mr. President?" roly-poly George politely inquired. And the President almost burst with laughter as he replied:

"They're two old minstrel numbers—'Tain't No Disgrace to Run When You're Skeered' and 'If He Comes In, I'm Goin' Out.'"

Recognizing that the "he" in Taft's mind was Wilson, O'Connor entered into the spirit of the joke. He did go to Camden and make the records. They, of course, were not put on sale, and only about half a dozen copies of each were pressed. O'Connor afterwards became a Columbia recording star, but that was the only time he ever did any recording for Victor.

Nuts to "Home on the Range"!

I also remember O'Connor's saying he used to enjoy watching Franklin D. Roosevelt writhe when somebody—anybody—began singing "Home on the Range." Roosevelt, he said, especially hated that song, but one of his aides, Marvin McIntyre, liked to form impromptu quartets and harmonize the number in barbershop style, so he circulated the report that it was FDR's favorite composition.

The hoax was so successful that the average American now religiously believes that "Home on the Range" was THE Roosevelt song. Apparently, the President chose to bear the torture rather than publicly express his sentiments, but O'Connor quoted him as saying: "George, if you ever dare to sing that dirge in the White House I'll shoot you!"

George didn't.

'Everybody Works But Father'

Let's skip now from an American president to a onetime king of Greece.

One of the big American song hits of 1905 was "Everybody Works But Father," originally an English comic ditty that was revised for use on this side by Jean Havez, advance man of the Lew Dockstadter minstrels. The song also went well overseas and came to the attention of Prince George of Greece, who was amused by the easy-going manner in which his father, King George, discharged his royal responsibilities.

The prince heard the number when he visited an English warship that was cruising in the Mediterranean, and some of the ship's officers played a recording of it. Being delighted with the tune, and even more with the words, the prince obtained a copy of the record and a gave a dinner in Athens to some of his intimate friends, at which he invited his father to be present. After the banquet he played the "Everybody Works But Father" record. And, as related by the now-defunct Talking Machine News, "Everybody present who understood English appreciated the criticism of King George, but no one laughed more heartily at the joke than he did."

The Big Victor Fire

Phonograph companies in the old days seem to have been especially prone to fires. In England, the Edison Bell Co. was burned out several times, and the disastrous Edison fire at West Orange in December, 1914, is still a vivid memory to many grizzled Edisonians. Ten years farther back, on Sunday, April 25, 1904, Victor's entire instrument plant at Camden was destroyed, with the loss of about a quarter of a million records. And here is the way a reporter for the conservative Philadelphia Press described it:

"There were several thousand talking machines on which cylinders had been placed. When the flames reached the floor where these were stored, the heat set all the machines working, and for a few minutes there was a volume of noise that would have made a steam calliope sound like a penny whistle. In the machines were scores of popular songs and recitations and dozens of reproductions of stirring marches by bands. With them all going at once it was bedlam broken loose. Half a dozen machines were giving a spirited rendition of 'There'll Be a Hot Time In the Old Town Tonight' while from others there peeled the notes of 'Fireman, Save My Child.'

"'Gee!' exclaimed a young hoseman, as he paused to listen, 'this is the first time I ever worked at this trade with music on the side!'

"The performance did not last long, however. In a few minutes the floor fell, and the machines went down to the solemn accompaniment of 'The Dead March In Saul.' Some of the firemen who heard the machines playing from a distance thought that people had been penned in the building and were crying for help. These had to be held back from rushing to the rescue of the supposed victims. It took four hours to get the fire under control."

The London Express facetiously reported that the fire was started by an incendiary whose life had been made a hell by constantly hearing Victor records of the then-reigning hit tune, "Hiawatha."

The Phonograph Clock

Another gent with an imagination and a solid literary background, although he was no reporter, was the fellow who constructed a clock that had a phonograph attachment. The year was 1908. This ingenious device announced each hour with a spoken quotation from Shakespeare. The face of the clock was painted to represent the lowered curtain of a theatre. As the minute hand touched 12, the curtain would roll up, disclosing a miniature stage with two tiny figures, about three inches tall, perfectly modeled and costumed. They appeared to be talking with each other. At six o'clock the following was heard:

"How's the day? On the sixth hour, at which time, my lord, you said our work should cease"— a quotation from act 5 of "The Tempest." Other hours were announced as follows:

"The bell then beating one" ("Hamlet," Act 1).

"Sure, Luciana, it is 2 o'clock" ("Comedy of Errors," Act 2).

"The clock hath stricken three" ("Julius Caesar," Act 2).

"How far into the morning is it, Lords? Upon the stroke of four." ("Richard III," Act 5).

"At 5 o'clock I shall receive the money" ("Comedy of Errors," Act 4).

"Let's see, I think 'tis now some seven o'clock" ("Taming of the Shrew," Act 4).

"The eighth hour—be that the uppermost?" ("Julius Caesar," Act 2).

"It's supper time, my yord—it's 9 o'clock" ("Richard III," Act 5).

"Ten o'clock; within these three hours 'twill be time enough to go home" ("All's Well That Ends Well," Act 4).

"Eleven o'clock the hour" ("Merry Wives of Windsor," Act 4).

"What hour now? I think it lacks of 12" ("Hamlet," Act 1).

Unfortunately, the name of the genius who devised this classic timepiece doesn't seem to have been preserved.

That Dog Fight Record

The average man of 1951, who has been driven almost beserk by hearing someone in his cups play the same maudlin number over and over on a jukebox may think nobody ever suffered worse tortures than his, but even as long ago as 1903 the phonograph could be, and frequently was, an instrument of torture. Witness this letter written by a justly annoyed gentleman to a New York paper:

"A dozen times a day a dogfight in its most realistic form is performed on a phonograph, apparently to the unalloyed delight of my neighbors. A hoarse-voiced 'tough' announces the terms of the fight in tones only possessed by that variety of mankind of which he is a representative . . . At last the fight is on, and if you were actually assisting at it, in defiance of the penal code, you could hardly get a more realistic sense of the elevating amusement. The talking machine tells the whole story. If the dogfight was actually taking place on the lawn, and the refuse of humanity had gathered there to see it, the proceedings would hardly be more real than they seem in this machine reproduction . . . From repeated hearing of that phonograph I feel as if I had now subjected myself to criminal arrest for violating the law by sneaking into that sort of ring."

The complained-of record was "A Scene at a Dog Fight," made in the early 1900's by the late Len Spencer, an imaginative oldtime recording artist, and the animal imitator, Gilbert Girard. If Len and Gil knew of that letter they probably were pleased by the backhanded compliment to the fidelity of their recorded work.

BMI's 'TV Sketchbook' To Suggest Tele Scripts For Song Showcasing

In a move to hypo video performances of tunes from its affiliates' catalog, Broadcast Music, Inc., has shipped out the first edition of the Television Sketchbook to ad agencies and TV stations around the country. BMI's Sketchbook is a compliation of songs with accompanying ideas for TV production.

First edition contai 44 songs with 13 BMI publisher affiliates represented. E. B. Marks and Peer International lead the pubs with eight songs each. The song production sketches were scripted by Stephen Hunt White and Stephen Falk Krantz. Book was distributed cuffo.

'First Born' in London, Jan. 28

London.

As an extension of the Arts Theatre Club, which is limited to members only, Alex Clunes has taken a lease of the Winter Garden Theatre for normal public presentations.

Opening attraction will be Christopher Fry's "The First Born," which starts Jan. 28.

Veteran Songplugger Recalls Glamor Of Early Tin Pan Alley Era

When W. R. Hearst, Sol Bloom, Frank Keeney, Carl Laemmle, William Fox, Harry Cohn, Irving Berlin Were Songpluggers Or in the Music Biz

By RAY WALKER

Miami.

I am one of the very few songpluggers on the job before 1900 who is still at it and keeping busy. I'm now plugging "I Found A Peach On Miami Beach" for Charles Abel, Miami Beach music pub.

My plugger career covers 53 years. I started in 1898 for Willis Woodward Co., in the Star Theatre Bldg., 12th St. and Broadway, N. Y., plugging "Hot Time In the Old Town Tonight." For sweeping floors, wrapping packages, running errands, delivering music to stores and being generally handy I got $3 a week. When I used one of Woodward's 2c postage stamps for personal correspondence, my salary at end of week was $2.98.

In 1900, George C. Tilyou, of Steeplechase Park, Coney Island, published the song, "At The Steeplechase," and hired me to see that everyone on Coney Island received copies. The fife and drum corps at the entrance on the Bowery and Tilyou's Walk played it over 100 times a day. The corps there in 1940 still played the song. Wonder if they are the same men or descendants of the original fife and drum corps?

James T. Quirk had a publishing business on 34th St., N. Y., in 1901. He published "I'm The Messenger Boy In Demand." I started a trio, with Thomas Potter Dunne and Arthur Carlton, to plug it. We were such a success agents offered us vaude dates, and we were booked into Huber's Museum on 14th St. for $45 a week. I left the trio before playing there. Willie Howard, who had been working as a plugger for Witmark, took my place. When Carlton quit the act Eugene Howard replaced him. Later on Dunne quit to do a single, and the Howard Bros. continued as a team, still wearing messenger boys' uniforms.

Doty & Bril, in 1902, had a music pub business on 28th St. "Tin Pan Alley" was born there. Charles Doty, of the vaude act, Steele, Doty & Coe, was of this company, for which I plugged "My Lady Lou" and "Game Of War."

Hearst In Tin Pan Alley

None of obits I read of the late William Randolph Hearst mentioned his one-time music business. He had the American Advance Co. at 57th St and Broadway in 1904. I plugged "The Man With The Ladder and the Hose" for him.

Frank Keeney, later to become a powerful theatreowner, then owned Keeney's Fulton Theatre at Fulton St. & Nostrand Ave., Brooklyn, and started a music pub business about 1904 on lower Fulton St. in that borough. George Botsford worked there with me.

Sol Bloom, who became a congressman later on, was a music publisher in 1904. "Sunflower and the Rose" was the one I plugged for him.

Carl Laemmle, who founded Universal Pictures, also had a pub biz that year. I plugged "You've Got Me Going, Kid" for him.

William O'Gorman, coroner of The Bronx, started the Atlas Music Co. on 28th St., in 1905. For him I plugged "I'm Going to Tell On You" and Billy Tracey's first song, "Ching Foo." Bill Kelgard was pianist there with me.

A Brooklyn pawnbroker, Gabriel Selig, started the Selig Music Co. on 28th St. in 1907. I worked for him in 1908 and plugged "All Aboard For a Good Old Time" and "Best of Friends Must Part." Latter was one of first songs by Irving Berlin, but he never mentions it in the list of those he has written. Wonder if he has forgotten it? I still have a dance orchestration of "All Aboard," introducing the chorus of "Best of Friends."

Charles K. Harris Co. was on 31st St. in 1908. Meyer Cohen,

Future of the Band Biz Remains '52 Problem

By MIKE GROSS

Although the opening months of 1951 loomed as the beginning of a resurgence of the dance band, the year is closing without any positive answers; the future of the band biz remains the big questionmark for 1952. During the year, a few remaining name orchs held on to their top-dog status in the booking scramble, but the new names, with few exceptions, found it tough going.

In an effort to give the band biz "new look," agencies went in for new orchs, package deals, guarantee cuts and promotional hypos, but were stymied by opposition from the majority of ballroom operators to accept new names or formats. The ops' reluctance to stray from the practices of the past is held as the major factor in the overall b.o. drop. Their reliance on the w.k. orchs and a few of the newer names who have broken through in the past couple of years, such as Ralph Flanagan and Ray Anthony, has paid off at the gate, but there weren't enough of these attractions to push a 52-week operation into the black.

Standout among the old name bands was Guy Lombardo, who continued to rack up solid grosses. Several of the other names also fared well in one-niters and location dates, but since they comprised only a handful of the band biz retinue, it wasn't a representative picture. Ops kept grabbing these names just as they did in the halcyon days but the newcomers remained an agency headache.

Due to the paucity of name attractions and the refusal to gamble on new orchs, terpery owners pulled away from a six-day week operation. Eastern ballrooms, especially, began to concentrate on weekend shindigs and sluff off the midweek dances by stressing a big name barrage for the Friday-Saturday affairs, they drew enough to carry over the sluggish biz during the week.

Attempts were made by agencies to hypo operators' interest in promotion and exploitation. Pessimistic attitude taken by many of ballroom owners on their dance dates curtailed their coin outlay for newspaper ads or radio time. Through enlarged press books, flyers, etc., the agencies tried to show how planned promotion campaigns could boost b.o. Ballrooms, which channelized their exploitation coin expenditure according to plans laid out by the agencies, generally saw the results in upped returns.

Ballroom Setup Changed

Along with promotion, agencies pressed the need for a complete renovation of the ballroom setup, especially in the east. Offish biz in this area was attributed to the makeshift and shabby halls which were passing as dance emporiums. Bands, which cleaned up in the modernized, well-kept ballrooms of the west and midwest, continued to make poor showings in the east's seedy spots. Despite pressure from the bands as well as the agencies, few of the operators shelled out any loot for renovation.

The year also saw little improvement in the impact of bands on wax. With the market spotlight still on vocalists, a solid band instrumental meant little in the market. Diskeries bypassed their orch pactees to give the best songs to its vocal stars. Although some of the orchs were able to break through with a hit, total sales seldom came close to those racked up by a vocal disk pitch. Flanagan, on RCA-Victor, and Anthony, on Capitol, came through during the year with occasional clicks, and though sales were only moderate the bands showed a wax profit.

Agency men feel that the public is getting its fill of gimmick sounds on platters and will want to hear melodic instrumentals again. They claim that the new sound craze has reached its peak and the dwindling terp clientele will start coming back to the ballrooms. Evidence of the forthcoming return to melody was also demonstrated by several of the diskeries' artists and repertory heads, who said, in the closing months of the year, that they're going to stress the tune and not the gimmick.

Another factor contributing to bands' problems was the dearth of top sidemen available for steady orch work. The demand for a good instrumentalist on TV-radio and recording dates has reached the point that many sidemen have dropped out of the band picture completely in favor of freelance band assignments. These men pioneered a new elite of radio-recording specialists, and the orch leaders found it difficult to buck the lure of regular hours and bigger coin in assembling a topnotch crew. An additional employment problem which beset the orchman was the difficulty in getting youngsters to serve apprenticeship as band instrumentalists. Many of the youngsters were called up by the draft while others showed preference for small combo work.

The small combo field developed during the year. Units of five to seven men, usually headed by a name instrumentalist, started getting terp dates as well as nitery bookings. With the dearth of big name orchs, operators took on the small bands and discovered that the terp devotees would come out for them just as often as for a large unit. Lower guarantees on the combos also influenced the steady stream of bookings.

Biggest b.o. draw in the combo field were the jazz units. In New York, Chicago and San Francisco, the jazz groups found new spots open to them with a large new audience comprised mainly of youngsters who had received their jazz indoctrination via collectors-items platters. Predominance of jazz boites in these cities was a throwback to the 1920s. Its impact was also evidenced by the b.o. cleanup of jazz concert packages. Such units as "Jazz At The Philharmonic," Billy Eckstine-George Shearing, and Stan Kenton scored heavily in their separate tours during the past fall.

Year also saw a fadeout of rhumba orchs. Facing a grassroots area closeout, the Latinos began to deemphasize their south-of-the border rhythms and add a wider selection of pop melodies. With the exception of Xavier Cugat, the rhumba orchs found themselves limited mostly to the N. Y. and Miami Beach locations.

Strong musical moneymakers in 1951 were the rhythm and blues units. Although their appeal was centered mainly in the hinterlands, the Negro combos were able to rack up as much as $750 to $1,000 a night. Disk royalties matched their live b.o. and the indies which etched the b&r groups, such as King, Alladin, Savoy, Atlantic and Jubilee, his consistent top sales figures throughout the year.

HAM AND EGGS ON WAX

By ALAN KAYES

(Commercial Manager, RCA Victor Red Seal)

It has been no secret for some years past to operatic impresarios that when all else fails there is always Ham and Eggs—or Cav and Pag, as the three-sheets list the twin-bill operas. That these two sterling examples of Italian verismo are boff at the boxoffice has been proven again and again by savants of the business from Gatti-Casazza right on down to the Met's Mr. Bing, not forgetting Fortune Gallo, and Salmaggi. Thus, by a peculiar juxtaposition of words, Ham and Eggs are bread and butter in the opera trade.

But what is of particular interest of late is the fact that Ham and Eggs, and sister operatic productions of the Italian, French and German schools, are also becoming the bread and butter, along with Tchaikovsky, J. Strauss and Beethoven, of the classical end of the record business. It wasn't always thus.

For many years RCA Victor's Red Seal catalog contained a sprightly assortment of operas on disks—complete and in tabloid form. While there was always a modest customer interest, no record salesman ever had the feeling that they were his own bread and butter, much less a dealer's cushion for the peaks and valleys of consumer demand.

All that has changed. In the past two years RCA Victor has released a spate of operas. Some had been dormant in the catalog for more than a decade. One fast look at the windows of record shops during the Christmas season was enough to show that dealers were featuring opera on disks—not to the exclusion of other forms of repertoire—but alongside the records that for years have been known as standard Christmas items for the longhair customers.

It isn't difficult to trace the new trend. It started with, has accompanied, and in some instances has outstripped, consumer transition to new-speed records and instruments. Strangely enough, the demand for full-length opera on microgroove disks has not been limited to long-play versions. The 45 rpm disk is getting a healthy share of the business in complete versions.

Classics Go Pop

Then, to thoroughly confound the crystal-ball gazers of the industry, operatic repertoire which once was known as Strictly for Connoisseurs has begun to bob up on best seller lists, proving, if anything, that Everyman, in addition to being the salt of the earth, is also a Connoisseur. Thus RCA Victor's Glyndebourne Festival versions of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" and "Marriage of Figaro" are giving our recent studio production of "Carmen" and the Toscanini off-the-air "La Traviata," a good race for the consumer dollar.

Chronologically it is difficult to pinpoint the nascence of public interest in grand opera on disks as a volume phenomenon. As far back as 1946, three years before the new-speed revolution the industry, RCA Victor had announced plans for full-length operas, to be made under acoustically ideal studio conditions, featuring outstanding stars under contract to the Red Seal label.

It is generally known that Toscanini was to have conducted the first of these studio-planned productions. Had it not been for a series of contretemps, the off-the-air version of "La Traviata" which RCA Victor released in October, 1951, with Licia Albanese, Jan Peerce and Robert Merrill in the starring roles, actually would have been a studio production.

But circumstances prevented this. The plan gestated for another few years. Then, in the spring of 1949, RCA Victor, instead of dipping a dainty toe into the cold waters, plunged bodily with a studio production of "Rigoletto," starring Leonard Warren in the role he has made his own at the Metropolitan, the ubiquitous Peerce as the Duke, and Erna Berger as the Gilda. It may be of passing interest to Broadway producers and angels to know that the nut for a studio production of "Rigoletto" was roughly the same as the current going rate for raising the curtain on a three-act drama which calls for a couple of scene changes and a full crew of stagehands. It will probably be of more specific interest to the money chasers of show biz to know that within a year of its release "Rigoletto" was well an its way off the nut and sailing out of the Red Seal into the black.

Real Productions

With this encouraging public reaction as proof of the putting of risk capital into operatic disk ventures, RCA Victor has gone further into the field. Last June, an all-star cast, headed by the Met's Rise Stevens, and with Met batoneer Fritz Reiner at the conductor's microphone, went to work in midtown Manhattan on a complete "Carmen." The nut was even greater than that for "Rigoletto" but once again, public reaction is proving that the risk was a sound one and the project shows signs of quick amortization.

At the same time RCA Victor engineers, employing an alchemy best known to themselves, gave the masters of the Glyndebourne Mozart operas going over, along with the Sir Thomas Beecham "Faust" and "Magic Flute," and came up with a quality of sound in finished versions now on the market which is so remarkable that many critics still don't believe these recordings originally were made a decade and more ago.

This is not to suggest that RCA Victor has been the only sturdy pioneer in opera on disks. Our worthy competitors are providing their share of first-class opera on records. And the proverbial bedroom operator is also in the act, securing masters from sources best known to himself and slipping them into the market at a rate limited only by the necessity of moving from one P. O. box to another in order to avoid discovery.

This may suggest that competitively, the companies that are investing substantial amounts of money in domestic productions of recorded opera, and giving gainful employment to union musicians, choristers and principals, are somewhat at a disadvantage.

But the public, that same Everyman, has a wisdom and perceptivity which is in direct ratio to the cost and worth of the project. With a covey of operas to choose from, Mr. and Mrs. Public have become more selective. They bypass the shoddy versions for the quality production.

No sane person makes long-range predictions in the record business. But it is pretty safe to assume that a trend has been established in classical recordings which will continue for some time to come. The trend, if I have not made my point, is recorded Grand Opera, full-length and tabloid, is here to stay.

The Thankless Muse

Saga of a Quest to Recompense George Cooper Who Collaborated with Stephen Foster

By JAMES J. GELLER

Hollywood.

Two incidents of comparatively recent vintage brought back a few vivid memories of a personal experience with an old songwriter. The first, the Federal Court's drastic decision which affects a large slice of the enormous income of the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers. The second was the annual contest of the Society for the Preservation and Encouragement of Barber Shop Quartet Singing in America, which concluded its yearly convention on June 11 at the Civic Auditorium in Omaha before a gathering of 10,000 faithful devotees. Among the close harmony exhibits which filled the air were "Sweet Genevieve," "Beautiful Isle of the Sea" and "Bring Back My Bonnie to Me," all of which originated from the prolific brain of George Cooper about as far back as four score years ago.

It was exactly 27 years ago that Harry Staton of the N. Y. Herald Tribune Syndicate assigned me to write a weekly series of nostalgic pieces under the general heading of "The Story Behind the Song." Each contribution purported to narrate the little known facts in connection with a popular ballad of the past. They were illustrated handsomely by Reginald Birch's pen-and-ink drawings which were frequently superior to the text.

It was the venerable Henry J. Sayers who, by the way, was credited in 1891 as author and composer of the rollicking "Ta-ra Boom Dere," that started me sniffing on the trail of "Sweet Genevieve," copyrighted in 1871.

I located Cooper in an old frame red dwelling of two stories at 2172 Washington avenue in The Bronx, N. Y. As I recall, he was a genial and friendly man of medium height, smooth shaven, a strongly lined face, a trifle robust, laughing blue eyes behind rimless spectacles, a full head of silvery white hair, and in his nineties. He beckoned me to the outside porch where we both sat on the wicker rockers. He was immensely flattered that a so-called member of the press had condescended to look him up after more than a quarter of a century of total obscurity. I asked him for a few anecdotes relating to the writing of "Sweet Genevieve" and what inspired the song. He told me that the ballad was based on the sentimental remembrance of his wife who died during their first year of bliss. Her memory haunted him at every turn. Fifteen years after his tragic loss, he wrote the lyric in quick order and sold it for $5. It was a common occurrence for authors and composers in that distant harvest to create a song in a few minutes and promptly relinquish all claims to it for a meagre sum.

The rhymes and jingles that Cooper hurled on his early public possess a cadence and rhythm that can be the envy of the better songwriters of today. His lyrics were vastly above the prevailing doggerel of the time. His lines can be scanned, his sentiments are genui Oscar Hammerstein 2d and Richard Rodgers could appreciate him.

Cooper digressed for a few minutes to loving exhume a number of the old favorites which were whistled, sung and bawled at the early public from the old minstrel shows and variety theatres, to whose languid rhythm, singers, contortionists, hoofers, tightrope walkers and jugglers performed their routines.

When Cooper casually tossed off a remark concerning his song collaboration with the gifted Stephen Collins Foster, I perked up and listened most attentively. Told me how he first met Foster before the American Civil War, nursed, tidied, fed and looked after him generally until he, Cooper, enlisted in the 22d New York Regiment which participated at Gettysburg and other campaigns. Mustered out of service, he resumed his collaboration with Foster on more than a score of published songs that are registered in the copyright office at Washington. It was George Cooper who telegraphed the melancholy news of Foster's death to a brother of the deceased in Cleveland. The original wire, "Stephen is dead. Come on," still preserved in the Stephen Collins Foster Memorial on the campus of the University of Pittsburgh, together with an ambrotype of Foster and Cooper as they posed for an unknown photographer.

When I referred to the popularity of his songs on current phonograph records, he revealed his feelings against a powerful recording corporation that was making beautiful use of his material without payment of royalty. Cooper explained that any composition copyrighted prior to 1909, could be recorded mechanically without payment to author, composer or publisher. "Thank goodness," he said, with an indifferent shrug of his shoulders, "I receive my Civil War pension of $30 monthly."

A Tin Pan Alley Quixote

I was a little touched. Voluntarily, I embarked upon a crusade which might bring, I hoped, a little extra collateral for his lean pocket. I wrote direct to the president of a phonograph recording company, calling attention to the impoverished status of the old songwriter in his nineties, barely subsisting on a small Civil War pension and whose songs were being used for commercial gain by his corporation, without payment, even though it was sanctioned by legal monkeyshines. Such soloists as John McCormack, Alma Gluck, John Barnes Wells and other professionals were rendering Cooper's material on phonograph disks, not to mention various quartets and trios. Perhaps he should grant, I rambled on, some modest compensation as a fitting gesture to a deserving old man in the twilight of life. My plea was promptly shelved.

My next essay in folly was to storm the ASCAP headquarters, then housed at 56 West 45th street, where I spoke to two members of the administration board, J. C. Rosenthal and E. C. Mills. I inquired as to whether they knew or recognized the name of George Cooper. They were frankly unable to place him. When I repeated a partial list of Cooper's contributions as well as his collaboration with the memorable Stephen Collins Foster, they regarded me as if I were affected by the rays of the moon. They summoned Silvio Hein from an adjacent office. His contacts among the loiterers of Tin Pan Alley had also earned for him the reputation of an old song antiquarian.

Rein remembered Cooper. I can see him a trifle dazed when I informed him that the old gentleman was among the living. He dug deep in his memory and began humming snatches from a number of Cooper's songs. I reminded them that he enjoyed no remuneration or income from the constant performances of his ballads, that ASCAP's boast of guarding the people who wrote the songs of a nation instead of the laws, could now be gloriously put into practical use. All that I brashly suggested to ASCAP was to admit Cooper into the ranks so that he might benefit from the quarterly dividends. I was advised this could be accomplished at the recommendation of the administrative board, especially in view of the fact that his backlog of songs were being played and sung frequently by professionals. As a result, the affable Hein was commissioned to make certain Cooper was not imposter.

That same day, Hein and I taxied to Cooper's home on Washington avenue. The old man was delighted to meet a fellow songwriter: more so in the case of one who so well remembered his lyrics. He listened with quiet enjoyment as I dwelt on the purpose of my second visit. Accordingly, Cooper signed an application blank in his wavering hand as he quoted a line from Oliver Goldsmith about the belated recognition which finally arrived "when life's taper comes to a flickering end."

Shartly after, ASCAP generously forwarded a quarterly check for $500 to the old songwriter. Three months later, after receiving his second dividend, Cooper was stricken with pneumonia and passed away after a brief illness, in 1926.

Grace Hayes' St. Louis Blues

Last year I told you of my debut at the Palace theatre, and this year I shall re-play a couple of dates that subsequently followed that strange and terrifying experience.

You may recall, the billing was Grace Hayes & Co., but I neglected to mention the rest of the company. Grace Hayes, definitely considered a "class" act, naturally had to dress the stage with a handsome young accompanist. on several occasions we also had to dress the handsome young accompanist. . .he drank! He drank periodically (one every five minutes) and eventually wound up "Alcoholic Unanimous." Curiously enough, there was a strange alliance between the accompanist and myself; we were always broke, and my mother's tight grasp on the community pursestrings soon made her the over-all "heavy" in our little play. His salary went immediately for booze, and my $20-a-week allowance methodically found its way into the nearest marble machine.

St. Louis in the dead of winter is dead enough, but in the year 1934 it became the setting for a dramatic scene that would have made Madam X run for cover. The handsome one was stiff as a billygoat and was threatening not to play the supper show (the one VARIETY always catches) unless a slight advance on next week's salary was immediately forthcoming. Mme. Hayes was expounding at great length on the theory that the show must go on, I'll call the union, you can't do this to me, that's loyalty for you, etc. Finally the great man stumbled to the piano and gave the down beat for the opening of our act.

After a couple of warmup tunes, my mother gingerly directed the spotlight to the popular young composer at the piano and announced triumphantly that he would now play a medley of his hits. By this time the popular young composer was breathing heavily and glaring indignantly at the unsuspecting audience. Suddenly and without warning he bellowed a "Haw! Haw!" at the audience then placed a fixed stare in the general direction of Miss Hayes, encircled his puckered lips with his thumb and index finger, and emitted a shrill and soul-shaking razz.

Miss Hayes, severely shaken by this ad lib, retired to the wings and eagerly awaited the last bow the popular young composer would ever take with us. As he stepped from the blinding spotlight into the dark recesses of the velvet curtain, I'm quite sure he never knew what hit him. It seems Miss Hayes had borrowed a stage brace from an innocent stagehand, and anyone will tell you that a stage brace in the hands of a panic-stricken star of stage, screen and radio can be a most formidable weapon. She laid him low with one well-placed blow, and then went on to finish the act.

After the show quite an argument took place regarding the advance in salary, as well as the low punch in the wings. We thought we had escaped our giddy friend, and mother and son were scurrying past the front of the theatre just as the audience was wandering aimlessly back into the cold, cold night. several of them recognized us and stopped us briefly to tell us they had enjoyed the show, and it was so nice to see mother and son doing so nicely together, and then it happened a voice rang out on the cold night air and as we turned, there he was, stripped from the waist up and looking like a wounded sea-lion . . yelling at the top of his voice, "Well, for Fally Markus' sake, can't Grace Hayes' piano-player even have a nickel for a telephone call?"

Piscatorial Thespian

Pt. Pleasant, W. Va.

We had an actor on our showboat one season who loved to fish and as soon as the boat was landed and tied up he would go ashore and put out a handy line that he would anxiously watch throughout the day and at night when the fish were biting good he would hurry out during the performance and re-bait the hooks between scenes.

We were doing "East Lynne" that year and my wife, Josephine, was playing Lady Isobel. The actor in question had the part of Sir Francis Levinson. One night we were playing Cottonwood Point, on the lower Mississippi, when the actor came up missing during the elopement scene. Lady Isobel had desperately repeated his entrance cue several times but nothing happened. "Take me away Sir Francis Levinson," she cried in a final attempt. "I am wretched —jealous—mad———" But there was still no Francis.

By this time the rest of the cast and crew were frantically searching for the missing actor and just as the curtain was about to be lowered on a hopeless situation, the actor came rushing on stage. His shoes and trousers were spattered with mud. Out of breath and trembling with excitement he whispered to the enraged Lady Isobel: "I just caught the damndest, biggest fish!"

Austria 'ASCAP' Revolt Ousts Veteran Leaders

By ROBERT STOLZ

Vienna.

While looking over my previous anniversary articles for VARIETY, I read again my 1949 piece, entitled "Meeting After Death." It was a short story about the life of the Austrian Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (AKM) up to 1938, its real death in that year, its resurrection in 1945. My first meeting with my "Mother Society" had the subtitle "Emil Oswald's Mission." That article was an optimistic preview of the future. According to my opinion, there could be no failure. Everything had to come off right.

Today, looking back, I must say that the AKM has fulfilled in all fields all hopes which have been placed in it. Still, in the last part of "Emil Oswald's Mission" something seems to have gone wrong.

A recent circular of the AKM dated Oct. 29, 1951, which fills me with immense amazement as well as a little sadness. This circular contains the information that the General Assembly of the AKM of Sept. 25, 1951, has recalled after only one year of office, the entire board of AKM, although this board had been elected for a period of five years. At the same time, the circular announces that the general manager of AKM, Emil Oswald, has left the Society on the same date.

The general manager's exit was reportedly caused by a one-sided act of termination of Oswald's contract by the new board of the AKM and that with immediate effect. Oswald, at this, has taken legal action against the AKM in the Austrian courts because of breach of his contractual rights, demanding from AKM fulfilment of his contract as well as payment of damages.

Now an entirely new wind is sweeping the AKM since its last extraordinary General Assembly of September, 1951. A revolution, organized with a great deal of skill, swept away from the board men whose names seemed forever to be associated with the history and fate of the AKM. Men like Rudolf Sziecyznski (composer of "Vienna, City of My Dreams"), Dr. Fritz Stein (one of the greatest experts on copyright law), the well-known writer Dr. Adler, Mr. Sitka (owner of Hofmeister Figaro, the biggest sales-organization of published music); men who for decades have been unselfish advisers in the management of the AKM do not appear on the Board of the AKM any longer. Schlee of the Universal Edition, composers like Hans Lang and Hans Jellinek, and last but not least, young Hochmuth, the most successful Tin-Pan Alley music publisher, have left the Board as well.

New Brooms Sweep AKM

Aside from Prof. Josef Marx, the newly re-elected President, there are mostly new "brooms" that came in and the proverb goes "New brooms sweep well." Even with the proverbs, matters are not as simple as all that. Sometimes the new "brooms" believe they are sweeping well while the old ones stand aside watching the mistakes the new "brooms" are making.

The formation and building of the new AKM from scratch is being regarded as a matter of course. The house, in its present state, with the most simple and, at the same time, most efficient apparatus is a natural thing which came by itself. The ever-growing income of the AKM (over 10,000,000 Schillings in 1951) is simply flying in through the window.

The excellent international connections of the AKM have seemingly been established by themselves. They don't want to remember that these connections are the result of hard, tireless work and efforts created with great skill and diplomacy regardless of many difficulties.

"Emil Oswald's Mission" comprised also the noble duty of regaining for the new AKM all their old prominent members. Many came back to the new AKM in spite of the fact that in the past few years AKM had little to offer. In this connection I only want to mention names like Richard Strauss, Franz Lehar and many others. All that is considered today a matter of fact.

The new board started work with a magic word: "economical measures." This, as everyone knows, is a very effective slogan and makes extremely good propaganda. Whether it will be possible to enforce effectively these new economical measures without harming the excellently working system of the AKM in Austria and in foreign countries, only the future can tell.

Every revolution brings with itself a certain amount of violence and that is perhaps the only explanation I can find for the manner in which the termination of Oswald's contract was effected. Now it is up to the courts to decide if the board has been justified in its decision and way of acting.

Like in every revolution the new heads of AKM will have to prove that they can do better than the old ones. The heritage they have taken over is a smooth-running organization with many invaluable assets. Let's hope they will do a good job running the Society. We all wish it for the sake of the great, old AKM, of the oldest Societies in the world.

Fun in a Fun Factory

Hollywood.

When I first met my wife Bernardine, she was shy and reserved and very remote from jokes. I was the first comedy writer she ever met and "Life of Riley" was the first comedy show she ever listened to. I was very happy with this situation. A few months after we were married she started to wisecrack, tell jokes and, at parties, she was the first one to come up with "this reminds me of a story." I was amazed at the sudden change in her personality. My wife really had sense of humor. But one morning I was disillusioned. I picked up her pillow and there was a batch of cards from my gag file. My file now has a padlock on it.

Pat Costello, a writer on the Abbott & Costello show, was sore because the other scripters refused to cut him in on the plugs. When they mentioned a vacuum cleaner every writer except Pat would get a vacuum cleaner. Ditto for electric toaster, typewriter, bicycle and other items of merchandise. The week "Finian's Rainbow" was in town, one of the writers suggested a gag about "Gloccomora." Pat, boiling by now, started to pound the desk and scream: "The joke is out. I say it's out, unless you cut me in on a gloccomora."

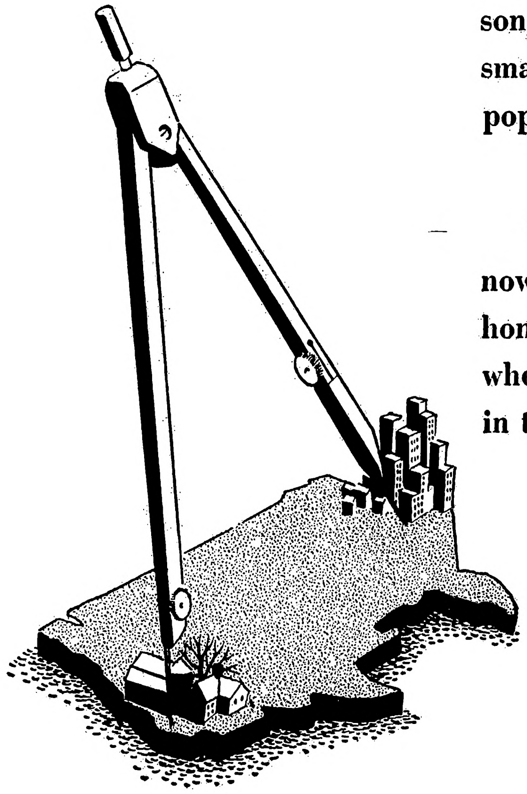
ASCAP

the music of America

Through the years, ASCAP has meant the Music of America. That is because ASCAP's repertory includes the finest music produced in the past half century.

From ASCAP's composers and authors come the songs America wants to hear over and over again—smash hits from musical plays and motion pictures, popular and standard works.

With ASCAP's simple licensing system, music is now a part of everyday American life, heard in the home through radio, phonograph and television, or wherever the public goes—in automobiles and trains, in taverns and restaurants, or at the theatre.



ASCAP local offices are on the job to serve users of music from Maine to California

Unusual Tunes as British Hits

By REG CONNELLY

London.

Since Britishers sang and danced the 1950 year out, and the new one in to the strains of "I Tawt I Taw a Puddy Tat," many unusual pop tunes have become great hits, and a few original accompanying noises contributed in no small degree to the new successes.

In '50, Gordon Jenkins had paved the way to some extent, co-starred with the folksy and punchy Weavers vocal group, with their recordings of "Goodnight, Irene," "Roving Kind," etc., True, in these instances the songs concerned were lilting part-P. D.'s, but the introduction of a new type sound had started, and this year Jenkins skillful treatment of one of the best-written recent songs, "My Resistance Is Low," was sufficient in England—where it is still possible to obtain strong concentration on an outstanding record interpretation, that will get a "yes" or "no" from listeners—to put the song rapidly in the No. 1 bestseller spot.

With vastly different and exceedingly well contrasted formats, Mitch Miller, producing an unbroken chain of successes, month by month, indisputably became No. 1 record man of the year, his series of accompaniments to Guy Mitchell's vocals on a number of pop tunes having been so sparkling and zingy as to sweep both records and singer to stardom. And in the case of Frankie Laine's "Jezebel" the same feat was accomplished with just one record. The general standard of all output on this particular label has been amazingly and consistently high, and is winning acclaim for vocalists and accompanying orchestras alike, the world over, prestige of names such as Doris Day, Tony Bennett, Rosemary Clooney, Frankie Laine, Jo Stafford, Percy Faith, Paul Weston, etc., to name a few of the principal ones has never been so high.

Reaction to all this in England has been instantaneous, some of the titles having sold proportionately higher here than in America. Strangely, one of the year's greatest records and biggest sellers, Patti Page's "Tennessee Waltz," did not share in the general upsurge due to this particular version not being available to British buyers. This omission did, however, provide a golden opportunity, which was promptly seized by local a&r man Norman Newell, whose record of the tune, sung by Teddy Johnstone, secured sales comparing favorably with the bestselling U. S. artists. Significantly, local singers derived great benefit from this intensified public interest, records by new vocalist Jimmy Young of hit songs "Because of You," "Too Young," etc., having also hit top sales figures.

The Disk As New Talent Hypo

Looking back on all entertainment activity in 1951, the record has been the greatest single factor to create new star talent, or to add to the stature of up-and-coming artists. Names in the first category are such as Laine, Nat Cole and Dinah Shore, and among the up-and-comings, Les Paul and Mary Ford, Tennessee Ernie and Guy Mitchell being a cinch to bring crowds not only to London's Palladium, but to any other great provincial British vaudeville house where they might appear. Of course, this attraction is even more strongly emphasized in the case where a successful recording artist is also a film star, such as Doris Day, whose "Shanghai" record was smash hit. Either medium is effective in attracting attention, but the combination of both is irresistible.

It is hardly surprising, therefore, with the hypo this buoyant record phase is providing, unexpected song hits have developed, without apparent reason, more so perhaps in England than America, where the picture is less diffused due to the limited number of disk jockeys and record programs. Few though these are, one interesting aspect has emerged from the BBC's decision to invite personalities from other sections of the entertainment world to emcee record presentations. In every case where such personalities have continued these programs over a period, it has given a sudden but unmistakable spurt to their popularity—a further indication of the potency of the record's appeal.

In the field of accompaniment, backgrounds to vocal records, and purely light instrumental records, there have been always outstanding American arrangers whose names became bywords, and who, like Ray Noble, Sid Phillips and Stanley Black in England, graduated via their own individual arranging styles to become directors of their own orchestras. Morton Gould, Raymond Scott, Axel Stordahl, Hugo Winterhalter, David Rose, Percy Faith, Tutti Camarata and others equally gifted, have set a standard which continues to evoke universal admiration. On occasions in the past there have been good melodic compositions whose popularity and success were undeniably due to brilliant instrumental recordings, as for example "Pavane," "Intermezzo," "Holiday for Strings," "Third Man Theme," etc. But with the development of this branch of recording stimulated by the fresh ideas the past year has brought, examples are increasing of songs becoming hits from performances of instrumental records without benefit of vocal refrain. This happened in England with the "Petite Waltz," and more recently with "Charmaine" and "Love's Roundabout" ("La Ronde") due to English maestro Mantovani's arrangements and interpretations.

But whether it be Mantovani's strings, Mitch Miller's French horns and harpsichords, or Les Paul's beguiling guitar performances, we are now embarked upon a new phase, of experiments with intriguing fresh sounds, the impact of which on listeners brings instantaneous reaction—or none at all!

Old Time Song Pluggers

"The California Baritone," was manager and plugged songs with me in theatres. Our feature numbers were "I Wonder Who's Kissing Her Now" and "Love Me Just a Little Bit." The Grismer Sisters plugged with me in cafes and theatres. They went into vaude and I gave them the name of Courtney Sisters. (They wanted to use name of Walker Sisters). Florence Courtney married George Jessel later on, and I understand she had been married to one of the great American ragtime piano players, Mike Bernard. To my knowledge Courtney never married. Also at Harris were Harry De Costa, Steve Jones, Arthur Lange and Felix Arndt, who wrote "Nola."

Harry Von Tilzer was on 43d St. in 1909. I worked there a year, and plugged "Cubanola Glide" and "Yiddisha Rag." Max Winslow, who became Berlin's partner later, was prof. manager — the greatest plugger I ever worked with. We'd plug in theatres from 7 to 10 p.m., and then to cafes until 4 a.m. In cafes like Maxim's, the Abbey and Pre-Catalan, no singer was allowed to give out standing up. They had quartets sitting at tables, pretending they were guests. Winslow was the only performer allowed to sing, standing on the floor. I played piano for him.

Most music publishers in those days (before the Music Publishers Protective Assn. theoretically curbed it) paid performers to use their songs, also loaned piano players to acts. Von Tilzer sent me in 1910 to play for Sophie Tucker when she broke in her first vaude act in Stamford, Conn. She had been singing at the German Village on 40th St. "Cubanola Glide," "Yiddisha Rag" and "Lovey Joe" were her feature songs. She learned "Some of These Days" later.

Belle Baker's Start

The team of Leslie & Baker were playing at a William Morris theatre in Newark. Von Tilzer sent me to see them and try to land "Funny Face" in their act as a double. Lew Leslie was doing an imitation of Harry Lauder. Belle Baker only sang double songs with him. Made appointment for next day to teach them the song at her home on Delancey St. Leslie didn't show up so Belle asked me to play some comedy songs she had; she sang them so great I came back to the office raving over her. Arranged an audition and an agent booked her in a single act. She was a big hit—and still is.

Many stars owe most of their success to songpluggers. We taught them songs, coached them and played for them when they broke in their new acts. The Mystic Theatre on 3d Ave. and 51st St., in Brooklyn, was a great break-in for them. Eli Sobel booked it for $3 an act, be it one person or 20. I played for dozens of acts there to help them break in new songs.

Some of the pluggers who worked with me at Harry Von Tilzer's were Al Doyle, Ben Bornstein, Harry Jones, Joe Geisler, Jimmy Monaco, Al Von Tilzer, Con Conrad, Ray Brown, Jules Von Tilzer, Ed Porrays. Ruth Propp was in charge of the floor.

Irving Berlin was a great songplugger. With George Whiting and Ted Snyder, he wrote "My Wife's Gone to The Country" in 1909. The New York Journal printed new verses to the song each day, and Berlin would try them out at Kennedy's cafe, 38th St. and Broadway, the night before.

Generous Tanguay

Maurice Shapiro, Inc., had offices in the Casino Theatre Bldg. in 1910. For him I plugged "Goodbye Rose" and "You Are the Ideal of My Dreams." One day I was playing some songs for Eva Tanguay. She told her then pressagent to look out the window at the Rolls-Royce she had just bought for $10,000. He said he'd give anything—for a car like it—and she made him a present of the machine. She died a few years ago, broke. Edgar Selden was prof. manager of Shapiro's and his son, Elliott Shapiro, was learning the busi . Tom Hughes was in charge of stock room, and still is. Some of the pianists there were Joe Cooper, Herbert Ingraham, Bob Kaiser (later Bob King, "Mary Earl" and other noms-de-Tin Pan Alley) and Gene Plarzman.

In 1911 I worked for Joseph W. Stern & Co., on 38th St., plugging "Mississippi Dippy Dip" and "I Wish I Had My Old Girl Back Again." Henry R. Stern, who wrote under name of S. R. Henry, worked there with me, as did Alfred Solman. Ballard MacDonald and Charles McCarron plugged songs with me in cafes and theatres.

William Fox, of the Fox Film Co., backed William Tracey in music pub biz in 1912, with headquarters on 42d St. I plugged "I'll Be Welcome In My Home Town" and "If We Could Always Live In Dreams." Tracey and I would demonstrate the songs all day long in the five-and-tens, sing with slides at picture theatres from 7 to 10 p.m., then to cafes until 4 a.m., and be back at 10 a.m. to the grind in the dime stores. Tracey never tired. Harry Jentes also played piano for Tracey.

Jerome H. Remick Co. was on 46th St. in 1912. For them I plugged "Good Night Nurse" and "Mary, You're a Little Bit Old-Fashioned." Some of the pluggers there were Tom Penfold, Al Gumble, George Botsford, Richard A. Whiting, J. Bodewalt Lampe, Vincent Youmans, George Gershwin, Egbert Van Alstyne, Ray Egan, Gus Kahn, Dick Jess, Henry Marshall, Sammy Collins, Ed Abeles, Milton Lee and Will McKenna. Mose Gumble was prof. manager, Joe Keit business manager, and Fred Belcher, general manager.

In 1914, I worked for Broadway Music Corp. at 145 W. 45th St. I plugged "Poor Pauline" and "When You're a Long, Long Way From Home." Working with me were Al Harriman, Jack McCoy, Harry Blair, Ed Mobous, Wynn Brookhouse, Al Von Tilzer, Sam Lewis, Joe Young, Jack Egan, Nat Vincent, Dick Howard, Jack Edwards (formerly editor of the N. Y. Clipper), Dave Ringle, Harry Tenney, Harold Normanton, Walter Douglas. Francis Carroll was in charge of the floor. ASCAP started that year. I was one of its first members.

The Broadway Music Corp. sent Will Hart and me to plug their songs at a nudist colony at Yaphank, L. I. Everyone was nude. They told us we would have to be nude to sing the songs. Hart sang nude but I refused to take my shoes off on account of the pedals of the piano. The song that made the biggest hit was "At The Hoboes' Ball" but we sang a parody on it, "At The Nudist Ball." Wonder if any other songplugger ever worked at a nudist camp?

P. J. Howley Co. were located on 45th St. in 1915. I plugged "They Can All Hit The Trail With Holliday" for them. Buddy Walker worked with me in cafes and picture houses. Jack Robbins also worked there, delivering orchestrations to hotels and cafes for $12 a week. One day a young man came in and asked for a job as pianist. I gave him copies of all the songs, told him to memorize them in every key. One week later he came back and was hired. His name was Ted Shapiro, now and for many years with Sophie Tucker. Ray Sherwood also worked there with me, and Bob Geraghty, now in Australia, played the piano.

Teaching 'Em How

Forster Music opened a New York office in 1917. Abe Olman was general manager, and Tom Payton, manager of the New York office. We plugged "Missouri Waltz" and "Oh Johnny Oh." First one to sing "Oh Johnny" was [illegible] ("Squidgilum") Lewis in a Broadway show.

Taps, now a theatrical booking agent, had "Songwriters Nights" at the Mt. Morris Theatre, 110th St. and 5th Ave., N. Y. It was a must for all pluggers. Tommy Gray, who wrote "Tommy's Tattles" for VARIETY sang there with me every week.

I went to France in 1918 for America's Over There Theatre League to entertain the troops. Had been rejected by all branches of the service. While in Paris, Francis Salabert had me distribute his song, "Toot Sweet" to American entertainers.

Back in New York in 1920, I went to work for Irving Berlin at 48th St. & Broadway, and also in the Chicago office in the Grand Opera House Bldg. Maurice Ritter was Chicago manager. Harry Pearl succeeded him. Flo Jacobson was the main singer there, and Mabel Pearl and Bernice Petkere were the pianists. I plugged "Tuck Me to Sleep In My Old 'Tucky Home" and "Say It With Music." In the New York office were Bob Geraghty, Jerry White, Jack McCoy, Ed Porray, Jack Stern, Jim Clark, Taps, Harry Akst, Ben Bard (who plugged songs with me at block parties and later went into pictures), Mornay Helm, Al Moquin, Max Rich, Sam Lewis, Sam Ward, and Ed Chirstie. Francis Kahn was in charge of the floor.

Erin Lends a Plug

In 1920 I plugged for Thomas & Walker, Inc. They published "There'll Never Be A League of Nations Without Ireland." I had Eamon De Valera autograph the title page. On St. Patrick's Day we hired a truck and got in the parade on 5th Ave. Four singers with megaphones were on the truck—Lou Allen, Margie Bishop, Charley Robles and Henry Marcus; I played piano.

A Doughty Corps

Some of the pluggers I worked with were Nat Osborne, Dave McFadden, Max Burkhardt, Ernest Breuer, Harry Hoch, Ben Edwards, Jack Glogau, Bert Kalmar, Earl Carroll, Duke Leonard, Jeff Branen, Amy Butler, Felix Bernard, Leon Flatow, Rubey Cowan, Phil Ponce, Benny Bloom, Maurice Abrahams, Lewis Muir, Jack Drislane, Sadie Helf, Leo Edwards, Harry Armstrong, Dick Gerard, Mal Franklin, Matt Silvey and Mack Stark, who had been a drummer in the orchestra of the Orpheum, Brooklyn, opened a music store next to the theatre, then went into music pub biz, and is now general manager for Mills Music.

Others were Frank Clarke, with whom I worked in Chicago; Mickey Curran, who is now a labor leader, also worked for Clarke; Tom Quigley, Rennie Cormack, Moe Kraus (M. K. Jerome), Al Raymond, Fred Fisher, Harry Tierney, George Fairman, George Friedman, Fred Rycroft, Solly Cohen, Max Silver (who was manager of F. A. Mills Co. in 1901), Joe Goodwin, Bernie Grossman, Lou Handman, Dolly Edwards, Murphy (the man who sang to beat the band), Jimmy Flynn, Arthur King, Benny Davis, Felix Feist, Abe Holtzman, Harry Cohn (who worked for Waterson, Berlin & Snyder in the Strand Theatre Bldg. in New York; he is now president of Columbia Pictures), Arthur Fields, Ed Weston, Charley Lang, Charles Bayha, Joe Cooper, Harry Puck, A. THE GREAT WIT WAY

By JOEY ADAMS

There are no people like show people. Their contribution to the world scene is what built this great civilization. Of course people like Thomas A. Edison, Alexander Graham Bell, Marconi, Washington and Lincoln got into the act, too! They didn't exactly retard us even though they couldn't sing, dance or tell jokes!

It's true that Alexander Graham Bell invented the telephone, but it took Don Ameche to make it popular. I wonder if Mr. Bell would have bothered with the whole bit if he ever tried to get his wife on the 'phone when she was talking to her Mother.

George Washington was the father of our country, but Crosby and Cantor helped a little!

Abraham Lincoln freed the slaves and has gone down in history as one of the greatest men in the world, but it took Raymond Massey to make him popular.

The people in Show Biz who make up the great Wit Way may never be recorded in the History Books, but they make all the Broadway columns.

Every nation has its own humor; every religion its own wit. Show biz is a world unto itself with its own dialect, expression and humor. We even have own bible—VARIETY.

Most comedians would rather get laughs than loot. Jack Benny has laughed CBS out of quite a few million! Bob Hope has convulsed Paramount into accepting a small percentage of his pix. Milton Berle "ad-lifted" NBC into a 30-year contract where he put them on a straight salary. Georgie Jessel has a great sense of humor and a bankroll to prove it.

A fellow-writer called Shakepeare once said, "The play's the thing," but Will didn't know the modern comics. If the Bard of Avon were bred on Broadway instead of Stratford, he might've said: "The Gag's the Thing."

This'll Kill You

American sense of humor has seen us through everything. Don't you feel like gagging when you pay your Income Tax? Don't you laugh when Harry sits down to play? Does the amusement tax amuse you? Even when a comedian doesn't get laughs, it's funny . especially to another comic.

A comic's life is no bed of roses but then who wants to sleep in a rosebush? An actor's life (if you call that living) is perfectly normal. The only trouble is everyone else is nuts. What's wrong with reading the morning papers the night before and scanning the evening papers at breakfast. I think that anybody who goes to sleep at 10 o'clock at night is mad. He's wasting the best part of the day. I became an actor because I like to sleep late.

Not so in Hollywood. But who wants to make pictures? . . . Me! I am an Academy Award loser. I made a picture that was so bad, it'll be the only new picture ever shown on television. The best acting in Hollywood is done by the stars congratulating the Academy Award Winners. A good friend of mine won top honors last year. He's not an actor or a director—he makes popcorn! He received an Oscar made out of halvah! If they put me in pictures, there is no finer industry in the world. If not—I may get even with those producers, I'll become an architect and build couchless offices!

All phases of Show Business need laughs. It is the most precious commodity a man can own in writing or in speaking. I have found after spending a lifetime in telling jokes that timing is everything. The way you wait for laughs . . . sometimes that takes real patience.

Laughter is a serious business to the professional laugh-maker. You'd know what I mean if you ever saw a story conference of gag-writers and comedians who are planning a TV or radio show. They look like they're laying out the plans for the next war.

Everybody thinks it's easy to be funny. I never finished a show that somebody didn't slap me on the back and say: "I got a joke for ya." Usually, they fall all over themselves with laughter as they tell you a bad joke that you probably discarded 20 years ago. Of course, if you never heard the joke before, it's new! If a gag fits the situation, it's funny! And if you tell it to a comic, it's sure-death because he's too busy thinking of the topper or the switch.

We need more laughs every place. In fact, a few laughs in the White House, the Capitol or in Congress wouldn't be amiss right now.

New Acts to Grind

The producer came home to his wife and gleefully announced, "I think I got a hit." "How do you know?" "I met three critics and each told me if I changed one of the acts I'll have a hit." "That's wonderful!" "Yeah, but each picked a different act!"

The male comic and the female comic got married and they lifted happily ever after, as they say in the joke books—until one day she caught him in the act with her jokes down—and to this day they are still fighting over the custody of the material.

Harry Truman is wearing all those loud sport shirts—"He would rather be reet than President."

I asked him why he looked so sad. He said, "I had a terrible argument with my wife—she told me she wouldn't talk to me for 30 days." "Well," I said, "Then you should be happy." "What happy?", he wailed, "This is the last day."

When I wrote "From Gags to Riches" I asked Earl Wilson to write the "forward." He wired back, "I'll be glad to, but who will write the precipice?

Bowery Theatre's Mildewed Memories

By HARRY G. SMITH

This space is reserved for a brief on the mother-theatre of them all—the old Bowery. Its memory has become mildewed, its lustre tarnished, and the vital rŏle it played in nurturing the early traditions of the theatre is given but perfunctory credit.

Because the final years saw it become drab and dingy, its eminence as the standard bearer of show business is brushed off. It is remembered now only by senile historians.

Historically and artistically, as well as in time, the old Bowery had the jump on the latter-day emporiums of entertainment. When Times Square was a wilderness crossroads on the trail to Harlem, and the 14th Street Rialto was fallow pasture good only for summer stock (on the hoof), Chatham Square and environs was the big show beat, encompassing all that the amusement world of that age could offer.

Here it was that the Bowery started its career (1826) and weathered 103 years before finally wilting in a holocaust. That was in 1929 and it was the sixth fire that had burned it down to the gunnels. But it always arose from the hot ashes, charred but undaunted, and resumed business. After several fires it was renamed the Thalia.

The Bowery had a career that ran the gamut of glory and endured the vagaries of time and circumstance with superb nonchalance. It had a crack at everything, from its opening melodrama, "The Road to Ruin," to the clamorous Chinese drama it housed when the final grand arson ended it. When crinoline and frockcoats were in vogue, it was here that Junius Brutus Booth stormed through "Richard III." Edwin Forrest took his bows there in "Hamlet" and "Othello." Charlotte Cushman made her debut there as Lady Macbeth.

Opera Introduced There

The opera was introduced here, and the noted English warbler, Mme. Malibran, was imported to give bon tone to the arias. The debut of the ballet was another first. Mme. Hutin, the Parisian danseuse, shocked the old town with her first piroutte. The tiny skirt, typical of the Victorian ballet dancers, brought the blush of shame to patrician brows and derby-wearers alike. Many walked out. The Bowery boys, tough sissies, were quite a bit abashed at this unprecedented exposure of the feminine limb.

The circus came to the door of the Bowery and was not turned

Loew's State Bigscreen TV

Loew's State, N. Y., has installed RCA big screen television system. Equipment is ready for use, but hasn't been tested as yet. It's the second Broadway house to get an RCA installation. Other theatre is the Strand.

For many years, the State was a vaudfilmer, but dropped stageshows several years ago.

An Agent

By LENNY COLYER

Chicago.

Between the innocence of dancing and the dignity of a Broadway show, we find a delightful creature called an agent. Agents come in assorted shapes and sizes, and all have same greed to sign you for life with options and never split a commission.

Agents are found most everywhere; in phonebooths, bedrooms, bookie joints, office buildings, hash and pash houses, underneath, on top of, climbing on or jumping, to desks, tables and bar stools.

Talented acts hate them, "no-talent" acts love them, chorus girls tolerate them and entertainment committee chairmen protect them. An agent is truth with its fingers crossed and the hope of show business with a racing form in its pocket.

When you want them they can't be found. When you don't want them, they find you. An agent likes steaks, chorus girls, night-club managers, rates, scotch'n'soda, the clubdate season and rebates.

Agents hate mothers who travel with their talented offspring, clean-up committees, temperamental prima donnas, freelancers, bar tabs, unions, phone bills and Senator Kefauver.

No one but an agent can cram into one pocket a VARIETY, unsigned and signed contracts, a leaky fountain pen, empty wallet, a brochure, a pair of dice, and a one-nighter hotel key.

An agent is a magical creature. You can lock him out of your home life, but you can't lock him out of show-biz. You can keep him out of your home, but he'll walk into, without knocking, a dressing room.

So, Acts, we might as well give up. He is your captor, your jailer, your boss and your master, He's a bundle of noise with the energy of a pint-sized atomic bomb. He can't write his own letters, but he can always rewrite your act. But when you enter his office with only the shattered pieces of your dream, he can mend them anew with six magic words:

"Hey, kid, you're booked next week!"

How They Used to Make A Star, In The Old Days

By SOPHIE TUCKER

Sophie Tucker

I get hundreds of letters from mothers, fathers, brothers, sisters; uncles and aunts stating their sons, daughters, brothers, sisters, nieces, nephews and all members of their families are talented. Another Bing Crosby — better than Tony Martin—can outsing Mario Lanza—better than Dinah Shore—much prettier than Judy Garland — more talented than Bette Davis—can outact Gregory Peck, etc., etc. Please give them a break, hear them sing, see them act, for you know all the ropes, you can help them.

Then you hear from youngsters who have had a little experience in the small nightclubs, at clubdates, the USO and hospital shows. Please give them a break, get them into the big nightclubs—you know all the bosses, etc. The majority ask to be given a break, some ask for gowns and clothes (to make a nice appearance), very few ask for money, but no one asks for material to frame an act, and no one asks where to go or whom to see in order to get this material. Few are interested about the act, what he or she can do or will do; few have in mind, the most important thing for success in show business, i.e. material, style of work to be employed and, above all, experience. All they know is, "Give me a break."

All right, so I answer all the letters with the following important message. We troupers, when we first started out, never asked anybody for help. We found the breaks ourselves; we went from booking offices to agents and to joints, even sang without pay. Wherever there was entertainment we went to get a job, for every job meant more experience.

Worked 5 Spots a Night

We went to each and every publisher for their songs. We would work four and five spots a night to earn $10-15 a day, and then there were many nights we couldn't get any kind of job. But we never wrote letters to anybody, we didn't have the nerve to write to strangers. Our school of training was: hustle for yourself, get it the hard way, easy come, easy go. There isn't one trouper who didn't go through hard knocks, heartaches and grief, but we never complained. Just as long as we made enough to eat and pay our rent, we went along trying all the harder to find the breaks. We knew what we wanted and we learned where to go and how to get it. There wasn't any of us who imitated any certain star's work. We learned to be individuals, whereas today nearly every singer of songs is trying to be either a Frank Sinatra, a Bing Crosby a Dinah Shore, or some other star, all sounding alike. The cafe owners' cry is "I can get them for a dime a dozen."

Of course, I love the youngster who writes, "You know as well as I do that a performer needs a lot of money to reach the top. Do you know anyone who would back me until I get a start?"

Where do the kids get these ideas. Not one of us, I can remember, had wealthy friends or a wealthy family to back them. In fact, we never told our families what we were doing until we had made a success.

Nearly all of us had families to support, and those of us who lived correctly and saved their earnings are the ones who are still on top, and will stay there, because we can't forget that it was not easily obtained. It takes a lot of guts to weather the storm of bad luck when it hits you, but we've all had it from the start.

The Film Business

The film industry lured many vaudevillians but there were very few who were successful in duplicating their former triumphs. I've seen many fledglings without stage experience working day and night, starting as extras, stand-ins, bit parts, even manual labor; girls working in drugstores, as waitresses, doing anything, to be able to maintain themselves while being coached at the studios—but overlooking the fact that the coaching does not prepare them for the footlights. Very rarely have they made a success in the theatre. Yet many of them who were smart enough not to believe everything the publicity department sent out about them, made it a business. They, too, like we troupers, will still be on top. That goes for radio and television, too. Basically, you must know two things: (1) What to give the public; (2) How much to bank each week.

Once you've made it a business then you gain respect from your public, and when you have that respect, you will find the work easier. A star is ageless, best confirmed by contemporaries like Ed Wynn, Jimmy Durante, Ted Lewis, Gracie Fields, Eddie Cantor and many others. A star is born, a star is made, only when that star has talent. Today, Judy Garland is the big example of our show business for the younger generation, and now is her time to gain the respect and love from the public. And, above all, to make show business a business.

New Act

AUDREY VANDERPOOL
Songs
10 Mins.
400 Casino, Albany.

Attractive, young Negro mezzo, has a fine voice enhanced by poise. Sings "Black Magic," "Because" and "Temptation" on one set; "September Song" and "Danny Boy" another. Claire Woods, white pianist and a standard hep accompanies Miss Vanderpool surely on the straight ballads. Frank (Two-Trumpet) Motley's band backgrounds her for the others.

Miss Vanderpool was indistinct in the first number when caught, either the support carrying too much volume the microphone failing to function properly. Then after she projected with clarity, tone and range.

"Because" and "September" are probably her best. "Danny Boy," while splendidly sung, does not seem an ideal choice. Sticking too close to the mike, she also needs to project more warmth. A stronger routine, special arrangements and proper management should put her in line for stronger dates. Jaco.

PRIVATE CAR

By JOE LAURIE, JR.

In the many years I've spent traveling in show-business, I've seen enough scenery and got enough laughs to store away in my heart and hang up on the walls of my memory to last me a life time!

Joe Laurie, Jr.

In the old days when vaudeville shows traveled to the Coast, we would make our jumps in a private car, or what the showfolks called a "Company Car." To get a baggage car to carry our trunks, scenery and props, we had to buy a block of 25 tickets or more (tickets by the way that were longer than the trip) and that would give us the privilege (?) of having a day-coach all for ourselves. These cars were our playground on travel days. They were old cars. If any fresh air would happen to get in, it would be committing suicide!

Making our jumps to the next town, gave us a chance to relax, if you can say that actors ever relax. Our thoughts would keep tempo with the 'clackety-clack' of the train wheels. We would tell each other of past triumphs and future ambitions. The acts would spread themselves all over the car. Some played cards, the younger and faster set usually would have a noisy dice game in the smoker; some of us would read and a few would nip on a bottle of nose-paint, exchanging "train sickness" for alcoholic headache. Some of the women folks would be knitting or sewing while exchanging theatrical dirt. A couple of acrobats would be having a "head-to-head" talk, and maybe some wife would be nagging her husband on to better things. The comedian would tell us some off-the-record jokes that made his listeners laugh until their sides were sore. The show-kids would be running up and down the aisles playing games that other children were playing at home. The kids got plenty to eat, especially after they learned where the candy-butcher kept his supplies.

Then there were always the tyros, youngsters just breaking in the business and making their first western trip. Some of them would be impressed with the scenery while others would have just as soon stayed in Brooklyn, with the one good tree. I remember remarking to a kid (who by the way is a big headliner now) when we passed some magnificent trees, "Those are very tall trees aren't they?" The youngster just gave them a quick glance and said, "They're only tall on top." And the time I said to one of a troupe of acrobats from Reading, Pa., that I thought California was a wonderful place to live in. And he shrugged his shoulders and said, "Yeh, especially if you're an orange!" It was the same guy who said to me, "California is a nice place, but it's too far west!"

The conversation in the smoker was always fun for me. There you could always find the fellow that knows all the statistics. He can name the capitals, states and rivers of the United States, and if you get an especially bright one he can also name the cities in Canada. Then there was the fellow who knew all about the different railroads, he can tell you the exact time the train will arrive at any town without looking at the time-table. He can also tell you the rate of speed the train is traveling, he counts the telgraph posts as we pass them and times them by his watch . . . . and there you are! Then there's the actor that reads all the newspapers, politics is his specialty, he is all befuddled, he argues one way, then argues against himself. Of course there is always the actor that asks you a question, answers it and then says you're wrong! I can always tell what town a man is from. Just ask him which town has the best fire department. There was funning all over the place and pet jealousies were forgotten . . . for the duration of the trip. On traveling days it was a case of everybody letting off esteem for each other!

Always 'On,' Even When Off

Although our day off, we were still play-acting, but without makeup and costumes. Every once in a while, curious passengers from the other cars would stroll through the showcar on some pretense to take a gander at the actors. Some of us would put on an act for these tourists. When we would see them coming some of us would walk up and down the aisles on our hands, a contortionist would go into a back-bend and stick his head between his legs. Others would make horrible faces which scared them half to death, while the comedian would engage them with double talk and bewilder them with goofy questions that would send them hurrying from the car, away from "them crazy actors." Anything for a laugh! The brakeman and conductor would always find an excuse to be in the showcar most of the trip. They liked to talk to actors, for they were sure of getting a lot of laughs and a drink from these children of Thespis! I never saw it to fail that the conductor or brakeman weren't a bit stagestruck . . . "you know I coulda gone on the stage once . . . .", or "a fellow played my town wanted to take me with him to sing, I have a pretty good voice and . . . ." These guys were duck-soup for the actors' kidding. Before the trip was over we had them singing and reciting pieces.

We would pass what we would call "Old Glory Towns" (flag stations) and the "Tired of Growing Burgs" which we called towns that just stood still after building a bank, general store, courthouse and a few shacks. The train would stop to trade off some people who were tired of traveling for some other people who were tired of staying at home. We would look at the towners dressed in their go-to-meetin' clothes, who would come down to the station to see the train come in, and we would wonder how anybody could be satisfied to spend the rest of their lives in a "one-course town." There isn't much to be seen in a small town, but I guess what you hear in them makes up for it. When we would get out to where the cows begin, our talk would switch to "farmer talk." I have never met an actor that didn't want a farm and live a quiet life of a farmer, while passing through farm country. But as soon as the train puffed into a city, the farm was forgotten. After all, farmers don't have any fun, they don't get laughs. And laughs was the business of this trainload of Merry Andrews!

Speaking of laughs, recalls many funny incidents that happened on these jumpdays on these private cars.

There was the time when Lester & Allen (who were the funniest and highest paid two-man act in the early '90s) found themselves with just enough to buy their tickets to the next stand. As they took their seats in the train, they stuck their tickets in the band of their hats (the custom those days) and settled down to read their newspapers. Unbeknownst to Allen, his partner removed his ticket from his hat and placed it with his own ticket in his own hatband. About 20 minutes later he casually said to Allen, "Here comes the conductor, you better get your ticket ready." Allen looked up from his paper, and putting his hand to his hat said, "I've got my ticket right here in my hat." By now he was feeling for his ticket, not finding it, he took his hat off, the ticket was gone. "I'm sure I stuck it in my hat." He got panicky, started searching his pockets, looked on the floor thinking he may have dropped it. "I can't find it Bill, what will I do?" "Quick," said Lester, "get under the seat and I'll hide you." Allen quickly got under the seat, while Lester calmly spread his newspaper over the crouching figure of Allen. A few minutes later the conductor came along and asked Lester for his ticket. Lester reached for his hat and handed the conductor two tickets, and kept on reading. The conductor seeing two tickets and only one person occupying the seat, asked, "Where is the other party?" Lester removed the newspaper over his lap and pointing to his partner doubled up under the seat, said, "Under here!" The conductor shook his head and mumbled, "Those crazy actors," as he walked away. I don't believe Allen spoke to Lester for the rest of the trip.

Working the Railroad

Years ago, there was terrific competion among the railroad companies. There were all kinds of bargain "excursion rides." On long trips you could buy a round-trip ticket for just a few dollars more than a one-way fare. Many people would buy these tickets and when they got to their destination would sell the return ticket to a scalper who in turn would re-sell it to someone who would pay a few more dollars than he paid for it. To offset this the railroad companies made you sign your name on the ticket at the time of purchase and also sign your name on ticket when making the return journey, in front of the conductor, to make sure it was the same person that bought the original ticket. Some passengers would sign a very short and ordinary name, which wouldn't cause any trouble to the scalper's customer, but some of them would write their own names and not worry about the future purchaser's troubles in trying to forge it. This all leads up to the time Bert Swor, the great minstrel man, bought a scalper's ticket at Chicago for his trip back to New York. Bert's green cabbage was very low. The name on the ticket was Dimitri Moselockovitch, and to make it harder, it was written "fancy." Bert stayed up all night trying to forge the signature, so he would be O.K. when writing it for the conductor on the train, but he couldn't get anywhere near it. He finally got an idea. (You get ideas when you are spending case money). When he got on the train he looked like a man that's been on a binge for weeks. He had sprinkled whiskey on his clothes—and of course took a few nips for his breath. He started to annoy the passengers. When the conductor asked for his ticket he insisted he had already given it to him. The conductor being used to dealing with all kinds of people, told him gently to look for it and he would be back to get it. Again Bert annoyed the passengers telling them he is trying to make him pay two fares, etc. The conductor returned and smilingly said, "Did you find it?" "No," said Bert. "Look through your pockets." "Okay, but I'm sure I gave it to you."

Bert started emptying his pockets, lurching against the conductor, stepping on his corns, etc., emptied his pockets, dropped pencils, papers, handkerchiefs, bottle, etc., while the conductor was picking them up and handing them back to him. "Look in your grip." "Okay," sez Bert, and proceeds to throw out dirty laundry, shoes, socks, etc., with the conductor packing them up. Suddenly the conductor spied the ticket in the grip. "Ah, there it is. I told you you didn't give it to me." At this Bert put on a crying act, apologized, offered a drink to the conductor, begged for forgiveness from all the passengers, etc. "All right, here's a pen, sign your name," said the by now disgusted conductor. Bert took the pen, still crying, his hand shook, he spilled ink on the conductor's pants. By now the conductor lost all patience, grabbed the ticket and the pen and said, "Wait a minute," he yelled angrily, "sit down and behave yourself, I'LL SIGN IT MYSELF!" Thus Bert got to New York okay.

Lydia's La-de-da Lays an Omelet

Then there was the time Lydia Barry, the great singing comedienne, decided to sit in the Pullman instead of staying in the company car with the rest of the troupe. A very well dressed snooty sort of a fellow got into conversation with her. The talk got around to show-people, and the young man didn't seem to like them. Lydia never tipped her mitt that she was a vaudevillian, in fact she told him she didn't care for the theatre, etc. The young man invited her to have lunch. They sat in the dining Running a Good Restaurant Is Good Show Business .

By VICTOR GILBERT

Ridgefield, Conn.

Running a fine restaurant is showbusiness. It is production without greasepaint, stage flies and footlights, but it involves color, props, ingenuity and direction. If this weren't so, more of the chefs who tried their hand at owning a restaurant would still be in business. Given the same, the finest of raw materials with which to work, a location equal to the next, sufficient capital and a fairly large group of friends, one man will succeed where 10 others fail. Success lies in proper timing, common sense, but most of all a flair for the theatre. Personality is the term some use, but after all what is personality—it is the ability to greet as if you mean it, to serve adequately but obsequiously, to gain the respect of the guest to the extent that he feels beholden to you, to make that guest happy to be with you, to have him feel privileged to be within your walls, to make him feel part of the institution without having your responsibility for it. Success is not good food alone. Good food like truth is expected in a fine restaurant. It is the way it is served. Large portions are no more the answer than low prices. Many a guest is nauseated by having an overloaded plate set before him. Sensible portions, a little interest in how the food is being received, friendliness on the part of the whole staff, a little show of the host's "know-how"—these are the necessary components of successful operation.

Further, it is far easier to train the staff than it is the guests and yet they go hand in hand. The manager or owner of a hotel or restaurant who fails to gain the respect of the guest is lost. The institution is headed for defeat. The guest must feel that he is proud of the restaurant, that he may brag about his patronizing it, that he knows the boss, that he is accorded a real welcome, but that he is sufficiently impressed with the management to respect the house rules. Indeed, he is proud of the rules and would have it no other way!

Up here in the country we have a number of really high-priced inns and small hotels, not least of which is one known as Old Drover's Inn in Dovers Plains, N. Y. A scotch-and-soda is $1.50. Yet, down the road the same scotch (slightly less of it, but very slightly) is 65c. Olin Chester Potter's Old Drover's is crowded. The other place is empty, but the amount of theatre Potter has put into his inn would take pages to describe. And there are others such as the Bird and Bottle in Garrison, the Fox Hill in Ridgefield, Conn., and leave us face it, my own Stonehenge, where high prices, rather than scaring people away, bring them in. It is essentially the use of stage tactics and, we hope, good taste that lures the public.

Sawdust and Mrs. Vanderbilt

Some years ago, the writer was going through, as a sort of preview, a dinner club which was opening the next day with the late Maury H. B. Paul—the first "Cholly Knickerbocker"—and an overdecorated room was what we found, obviously expensive, with fine murals and thick carpeting. He shook his head and said to me, "Never try to out-Vanderbilt Mrs. Vanderbilt, because you can't; she can buy and sell you." This place was so overdone and so obviously expensive that it hit you. Paul went on to say, "Put sawdust on the floor, serve fine food, but most of all be warm when you greet the public and take them in on the proposition as if they were a part of it—you can't fail." This particular place lasted four weeks and was the costliest flop in the annals of dinner clubs.

I remember some years ago Dorothy Lamour sang for me at One Fifth Avenue in lower New York; we were making few changes decor. The owners wanted to close the room while alterations were taking place. I didn't agree with them. My thought was to work on the room while keeping it open. We did this and the public felt they were in on the deal and until the job was complete they came in droves to see what progress was being made from night to night. I did the same thing at Stonehenge. When we increased the bar-parlour (and it was a major operation), we worked each day with the masons and the carpenters but at night I threw floodlights on the progress, and the guests were intrigued. Years ago the Trinity Corp. used this psychology. They had the scrubwomen mop the floors of the public halls just at the time that the office workers were coming down the elevators. While the workers complained about the obstruction in the lobby, they still got it around that the Trinity Corp. ran the cleanest buildings in New York as evidenced by these scrubwomen who must, they thought, have been cleaning and scouring all day!

Common sense, a flair for the theatrics of the business, the watching of little things, cordiality, mutual respect, sensible portions, and the omission of cut prices are the essentials of successful food and hotel operations. Good food is to be expected as is honesty. If this is followed I can't see failure.

Bowery Theatre

away. "Buffalo Bill" Cody appeared with other dramatic and equestrienne divertissement. President Van Buren came from Washing purposely to witness "Mazeppa," first of the hoss operas. After a sustained and brilliant association with the best in English and American classics, the theatre suffered a period of abasement, and lost out in tophat favor. During the last decade of the '70s, gaudy spectacles, blood-and-thunder mellers and broad farces were presented for a clientele none too fastidious.

Then in 1879 William Kramer, Atlantic Gardens impresario, undertook to conduct it as a German theatre under the direction of that fine actress, Mathilde Cottrelly. Renamed the Thalia, it became the shrine of Teutonia. Gustav Amberg, later with the Shuberts, followed Cottrelly and, with Heinrich Conreid directing, Germanic drama flourished gutturally for almost a decade. By '87, however, the lustre of the house faded. The Irving Place theatre became the new home of Rhine art, and the German population trickled uptown.

The onrush of Jewish immigrants had been growing, and as the '90s began, the old theatre, with Jacob Adler the controlling lessee, had 10 exciting years of the best in Yiddish drama. It brought David Kessler, Lipzen, and Bertha Kalich, among others, to this country and revived the prestige of the house considerably.

Times Continue to Change

But times and the populace continued changing. The inexorable trend of show business was uptown, and the Bowery, or the Thalia, blowsier and more rundown at the heels, was jauntily tottering toward its road's end. Intervals of Italian stock and the smallest of smalltime variety concerts prolonged its tenure. At the beginning of its second century the old house, having exhausted Occidental repertoire, turned wearily to the Orient and the fantastic symbolism of the Chinese drama.

Maybe the ghosts of the long past were disturbed by the clanging of gongs and shrill flutes that punctuate the mandarin-dragon type of entertainment. Or maybe the Far East theatre, with its ancient dignity and lineage, had some kinship to the pomp and stateliness belonging to the Bowery theatre when it was pristine.

But this is patent: the long procession of theatres that have put on weight of dignity and an accumulation of fame all share i this heritage of theatrical tradition; and the plays and players celebrated for all time in our annals are all the heirs and assigns of the Old Lady of 46 Bowery.

THE 'QUEEN OF GRAUMAN'S'

By ASHTON STEVENS

(Paramount's soon-due biopic on the career of Blossom Seeley and her husband, Benny Fields, titled "Somebody Loves Me," as independently produced by (William) Perlberg-(George) Seaton Productions, recalls when the late Ashton Stevens caught "Little Blossom," then 17, at Grauman's, San Francisco. In later years the late great showman, Sid Grauman's Chinese and Egyptian Theatres, in Hollywood, were to become distinguished symbols of the cinematic exhibition field. Mrs. Kay Ashton-Stevens, the former Kathryn Krug (legit actress), now collating some of the dean of American drama critics' writings for book publication, identifies this July 26, 1903 interview as being from the San Francisco Examiner).

There was no keeping us apart. Fate willed that Little Blossom and I should meet. For no sooner had I found her name in my favorite column of the Sunday paper than the fever to see her and know her was upon me.

Her name was down near the middle of the advertisement, in type no larger than that which set forth the quality of the other performers at Grauman's; but I cried "Kismet!" the instant my eye mirrored the line—"Little Blossom, the Vivacious Comedienne." Grauman's, I learned from the same source, the home of "Polite Vaudeville;" address 7th & Market Streets. And one might have a good seat at any of the daily matinees for 10c. I told the conductor to let me off at Grauman's. Perhaps it was unnecessary. The car seemed to stop there of its own accord.

There were no ushers. I helped myself to a seat. Red electrics lighted the small auditorium darkly, but I could make out the audience—in fact, count it. Gallery and downstairs we were, all told, not counting the doorkeeper and a boy in crimson flannel, just 24 persons. But others were coming in slowly, in ones and twos, and the show was not yet ; indeed, the band had not blown its opening note. There was not a man in sight behind the orchestra rail. And the stillness was a positive shock to the auditory nerve. Nobody—not even those who came in twos—talked.

A woman in the gallery coughed, and 30 necks twisted and craned with amazement. She coughed only once, but it echoed spookily for some seconds and waked the boy in crimson flannel, who betook himself to the frames at either side of the proscenium arch, in which he placed large lettered cards announcing The Burroughs.

Zano's Petroleum Bang

The Burroughs passed away quietly while the crimson youth changed the cards for Zano—a prestidigitator, but he did not look as though he could pronounce it. Zano had a petroleum bang. He wore evening clothes and lured a glass of water from his coat tails without wetting them. He said that doubtless we had heard of Hermann the Great, and that he would expose one of His Greatness' tricks, which we could take home and tickle the children with. The exposure was merciless. Hermann dead and his widow depending for her livelihood on the tricks he left her—I shuddered that Zano had the heart!

And speaking of hearts, be still my own! for here come two new cards and Little Blossom after them. And the audience is alive, applauding before she has done more than carry her smile on the stage. This is the first "reception" of the afternoon. No need of asking who is queen of Grauman's.

She is more than I had expected, much more. The "Little" is doubtless only a term of endearment. For Blossom, while not tall, is of a wonderful roundness. From any point of the compass she would not have far to fall.

White, white lawn is her costume, and in her hair and at her throat and round her waist is pink ribbon. Her hair short, likewise her skirt, and no quantity of rouge and India ink can hide her youth. She gloriously young, and I wonder if it is to be "For I shall be Queen of the May, Mother."

I wonder, but not for long. The professor throws the beat ii copation and Little Blossom's smile parts to make room for a huge voice of watermelon lusciousness singing about "Ma-Rag-a-Time Joe." The building vibrates, the electric lights flicker, but the carpet holds its ground. You not only hear this song, you feel it. The piano is audible only when Blossom takes a breath, and not then when the breath is a hard one.

Gone is the gloom, gone the timidity. The audience—now full 50 strong—sounds the hot palm and the adulative whistle. We want more of Little Blossom, and here, and yet more; and we get the superlative when she sings her chicken song. (After all, what is ragtime without a chicken?) For the third time, and each time louder, she sings, rolling her large eyes and smacking her generous lips:

"C—that's the way to begin-
H—that's the next letter
I—that's the third-
C—that's to season the bird-
K—that's a fillin'
E—I'm near the en'-
C-H-I-C-K-E-N:
Th 's the way to spell chi-ic-ken."

Well, after three whirls of that, I would have crossed dead bodies to find her. But doing so then and there was no easy job. I was a stranger in a strange place. All the diplomatic formalities that usually precede these artless chats had been left undone. Before being admitted behind the scenes I must obtain the consent of Manager Grauman, whose office door I would find at the left of the auditorium.

Interview With Blossom

It was locked. I knocked three times and I think somebody pulled a string. Far away from the door was the head of Mr. Grauman when I entered. His hair was white as porcelain, Blossom's lawn gown, and fuzzy and thick and standing out all over. It looked like a big powder puff. Under it was a heavily featured, but shrewd, good-natured face.

I told him I wanted to see Miss Blossom — on business, newspaper business, I explained; whereupon he pushed a button and offered to produce her forthwith. But I plead to see her alone.

"Tell Blossom a reporter wants to see her, and tell her to keep on her stage clothes and makeup," ordered the manager; and while the message was being dispatched he talked to me about himself.

"If I had listened to other people I'd never have made a success of this business," said he. "Everybody told me that I'd never make a success of the place unless I permitted smoking and drinking and catered generally to the Bohemian element; but I have demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that there are more respectable people than Bohemians. I don't allow smoking or drinking in the house, or profanity or vulgarity on the stage, and I wouldn't be connected with any house that was not constructed on a highly moral plan; in lieu of which I have made a success, as the public well knows."

"No, sir," he boomed. "No alcoholic drink of any kind in any place that I have control of. And," warningly, "I never allow an intoxicated person in the house, in any of my houses."

He dug into his desk and brought forth an illustrated weekly containing the story of his life. He handed it me, wondering how the paper had secured the information, which he had never given, but which was, he said, truthful in every word.

I read to find that he had come to town without the price of a pair of shoes and could now command three millions of dollars. He said I might keep the paper.

It was in my hand when they led me to Blossom in the wineless, smokeless green room just off the stage; and she asked me if I wrote for it and seemed disappointed when I answered "no."

They left us alone with the door well open, and we sat at a big green card table in the center of the room and talked as though we had been friends for years.

"I'm glad you kept on your costume," said I.

"I suppose it does make me look more natural like," said she; adding, as she looked down at her short skirt, "I'm 17." You could see that she did not care to have her years underestimated on account of that skirt.

"Seventeen! That's pretty young to be the queen of Grauman's."

"The queen of Grauman's!" she laughed.

"Sure. That's why I'm here."

"Going to write me up the Queen of Grauman's? That's fine. This is my first season in vaudeville; I'm really a soubret, you know—a musical comedy soubret, and burlesque."

"When—?"

"Oh, I becai soubret when I was 15; and it wasn't with a children's company, either. At 15 I was soubret with Fred Irwin's Big Show, and later on with his Majestics—you know Fred Irwin's?"

I tried to look wise.

Modest Gal

"Ever get inside?"

"Certainly. We played at the Dewey and other New York houses, and Chicot, the vaudeville critic, gave me a fine notice in the 'Telegraph.' I've had fine notices everywhere this season. I was a big hit at Portland and Seattle. The newspapers treated me splendidly."

I asked her who in the bill beside herself was worth seeing, and she listed every one of them, from Hank Whitcomb, the imitator, of birds and animals and buzzsaws and champagne corks and tugboats, to Hathaway & Walton, the song and dance team.

"And they do wear the swell wardrobe," said she repturously, and meaning Hathaway & Walton.

"With so many clever people, how do you keep from being jealous?"

"I'd rather be a failure than be jealous," she said, indignantly. "I like these people; they are my friends; we travel over the circuit together; we'll all be out at the Chutes in a couple of weeks and —why, I'd be miserable if they didn't do well."

We turned for a footstep at the door. It was the orchestra.

"Ah, Blossom," said he. "What's doing? Getting a writeup?"

"I guess so," she returned. Then to me: "That's the leader—that is, the piano player. I'm used to a large orchestra; it's hard for me to work without a large orchestra; I have to hold back my voice all the time. You wouldn't believe it; but I do. But he's such a nice piano player that I don't mind. He's awfully nice, not only as a piano player, but as a gentleman. Everybody's pretty nice around here, and there isn't any smoking. Smoking's awfully bad for the voice."

"You don't mean to say that one so young—?"

"Of course not. I mean the audience's smoking—that's bad for the voi ; and they don't do it here. They have nice audiences here—only a few at a time, sometimes not more than 40 or 50 in the afternoon, but awfully attentive. They never take their eyes off you, and they seem to appreciate everything you do. I like to work for an appreciative udience. I don't care how small it is; I don't care if there are only 15 people out in front—I always dress and rk with the same care as when there's a hundred.

Another voice at the door:

"Say, Blossom, got a pin? Oh! 'scuse me for butting in."

"Don't mention it, Hank. I haven't got one; if I had you could have it, Hank. There's Hank, now; one of the nicest men you ever met. You fall in with awfully nice people in vaudeville, and compared to the burlesque business, vaudeville is a paradise. I like it, but it's too easy and doesn't advance you enough. My ambition is to go back to the old business and become a star. I like real parts to play, where I can talk and run about and dance as well as sing. I'm going back to it next season. By that time I'll have worked up new specialties to introduce."

Those New Specialities

I asked her about the process of working up new specialties.

"It's easy enough," she said, "if you have plenty of time. You see a lot of other people's turns and get ideas from them; and sometimes, once in a while, you get an idea of your own."

"But an original idea is rather dangerous, isn't it?"

"Oh, no; not if you try it out gradually and see how it takes."

"How do you manage to look so much like Fay Templeton?" I had been saying this from the stant she came on the stage.

"I didn't know I did," she answered.

"If you were littler you might be her little sister."

"Is that so? I've never seen her. But I've heard a lot about her; she's one of the big ones."

"Sh wasn't always so big. At one time she was quite thin. I've heard that her weight is her only sorrow."

"That's a sorrow that doesn't trouble me," she laughed. "I know i 's about time they took the 'Little' off my name. I'm not such an awfully little Blossom now. Fact, I' getting pretty stout. But it doesn't worry me. I like to be just as I am. You know, I think it improves the turn when girl looks strong and healthy. Don't you? I wish I'd seen Fay Templeton, then I could put her in my imitations. I do a new turn next week with imitations of Lottie Gilson and Anna Held."

"It's a shame to leave out Fay Templeton and May Irwi "

"The first coon song I ever sung was May Irwin's 'New Bully.' I used to do all her stuff; people called me the pocket edition of May Irwin. But I guess it wouldn't be a pocket edition now."

The white figured Little Blossom jellied with her laughter. For all the paint on her cheeks and crusted black on her lashes and moist vermillion on her lips, she was wholesome and ingenuous. And of all the round beauties of any stage, I doubt if there lives a happier one.

I told her that girls of her age frequently wrote letters to newspapers asking advice on the question of their going on the stage. "What would you say, Miss Blossom, if you had to do with the answering?" I said.

"I'd say 'Go,' to every girl that has the talent and the liking. Let her go to an agent's and sign a contract—if she's of age. Mother signs mi , but doesn't travel with me. A girl can attend to all the rest of the business for herself. I do. And on the stage a girl can be just as good as in a Sunday school. It all depends on the stuff that's in the girl. If a girl is naturally wrong, the only difference is that she will have less sneaking to do on the stage than off." She rose.

"Thank you, Miss Blossom.

"Don't mention it, Mr.

But that's only my first name. real name is Blossom Seeley.

"No relation to that dinner —?"

"Well, I should hope not," she exclaimed. "And be sure to get that right. A girl can't be too careful these days."

Another Hard-Luck Year For Vaude in '51

By JOE COHEN

Vaudeville will look back on 1951 as another hard-luck year. It seems that everything conspired to diminish playing time almost to the vanishing point.

Broadway lost two important showcases (Warner and Capitol), and many major cities are now minus a single house on a regular vaudeville schedule. The talent agencies are bemoaning this plight, and the vauder has been forced to turn to other fields in order to survive.

The rise of names through recordings, with these personalities heading theatre packages, helped somewhat, with such notable disk hits as Patti Page, Les Paul & Mary Ford and Billy Eckstine being in the van of such road units. However, the major development during the past year occurred at the Palace, New York, where two-a-day has been instituted successfully. The Judy Garland show indicates that there's still tremendous vitality and interest in this field. Never in history have there been such high vaude grosses (as distinguished from vaudfilm grosses) as there have been at the Palace.

Under the two-a-day policy, takes have gone as high as $51,000. The old days of this theatre never recorded such takes. Miss Garland is set to pass the old longevity mark of a Palace show as well. At this point, tickets are being sold until mid-February.

Need For Talent

The vaude vets feel that there's nothing wrong with the industry that talent and proper presentation can't cure. Many feel that they themselves are the cause of the factors that lead to the diminution of vaude time in 1951. Some showmen feel that they have allowed pix to dominate to the detriment of stageshows. They haven't developed enough names that would permit payees to leave video sets for an evening at a theatre, and as is common with other show biz media, there's an immediate evaporation of talent when adverse economics sets in. These factors started to change the course of the variety fields some years back. Once having set i it was difficult to stem the path.

However, there are some signs of recovery and it's up to showmen to make the most of thei The Judy Garland instance is sufficient proof to many that the field hasn't been lost. A major note of optimism is struck by the fact that in teevee areas especially theatres are hitting sizable increases in patronage. Television, even for free, isn't the lure it was against superior product. Again, film companies have improved their product considerably, and there is a perceptible movement back to going out.

Vaude's Prestige

If nothing else, variety can turn into a prestige field. It's long since attained that stature in the British Empire, where a stand at the Palladium, London, is much desired for an actor. The prestige of a Palace engagement is already reestablished.

Probably the most favorable indication that there will be stageshows of one kind or another is the feeling by exhibitors that there's nothing sacred about straight picture policy. That type of presentation can be abandoned at will. Proof is seen by the fact that the Warner, N. Y., which jettisoned stageshows, will install a ballet company for two weeks. RKO Theatre, White Plains, devotes one night weekly to concert attractions under auspices other than that of RKO. The Court Square, Springfield, Mass., is now on a legit fling during the week and has vaude on Sundays. The Brandt circuit has found that vaude can pay off in three situations. Other chains are on the lookout for attractions.

These are indications, not only of considerable life in the personal appearance field but in the fact that the run-of-the-mill shows are passe. Showmen feel that that's what killed off many vaude houses. There was no longer much entertainment left in a lot of undistinguished repeaters. Theatremen failed to provide good new items in sufficient number.

There's little likelihood that enough names can be made, but there can be improved presentation and an influx of new ideas. It's an era in which there has to be some powerful stimuli to go to theatres now that showmen have to compete with free shows.

Britain's TV Vogue, Unlike U. S., Rough on Music Biz

By JOHN FIRMAN

(Managing Director, B. Feldman & Co., Ltd.)

London.

The year 1951 is behind the music publishing biz and few will regret its passing. It was a year of rising costs and reduced sales—and, in my opi , the worst the trade had experienced in a decade or more.

We believe we know the reasons for this slump, but that gives us little solation. The family budget is not elastic. True, there have been wage increases throughout most industries, but the cost of living continues to go up.

To aggravate the situation, the music publishing industry, like so many others, has been compelled to its own prices. Retail charges for sheet music have doubled in some cases, and although trade and public reaction to this change was at first cautious, there has been a general improvement more recently.

The overall decline in sheet music sales can be well illustrated by the experience of my company, which has its own summer demonstrations at the Isle of Man. During the past season, we were plugging all the current numbers from the hit parade, but sales were down by at least 50%.

TV Hits Sales

Another important factor which I reckon has also influenced the drop in sheet music sales has been the spread of television in Britain. The recent opening of the third transmitting station in the north of England has already had its effect on the local market. Sheet sales took a noticeable dive in this area, which had previously been regarded as one of the most lucrative in the country.

This, too, I suppose, understandable. TV sets are quite expensive at the best of times, but with sales tax of 66⅔%, they are almost a luxury. Yet the public seem to buy them more and more on the weekly installment plan. As a result, many other forms of entertainment suffer in the process, not least among them being sheet music.

There is also a hefty demand throughout the country for new radio sets, and although this may mean more listeners to hear our plugged songs, it also means there is less of the ready cash with which to buy the copies.

Oddly enough, there is one bright aspect of the situation, and whether by coincidence or not, this follows the American trend. Disk sales have been going up steadily, and the improvement, which is quite a healthy one, appears to be general throughout the country. Particularly interesting is the fact that the increased platter sales are not restricted to the two major groups, but quite a few smaller independents who have recently come into the scene are also reporting this upward sales trend.

I must resist the temptation to overdo the gloomy side. There are still strong hopes that the latest governmental austerity measures will soon lead to a new economic prosperity. And when that comes, the music publishing industry will be fully geared to take every advantage of the new situation.

Some time back I commentated on the way in which the disk jockey has now become an accepted fact in British radio. Admittedly, its operation here is on a comparatively minor scale, but nevertheless, the jockeys have carved a very powerful niche for themselves.

Jockey Influence

Some of the ace jocks, like Richard Attenborough, Sam Coste, Jack Jackson and Wilfred Thomas, have regular peak listening dates, and each, at one time or another, has been responsible for creating hit songs.

Then there is the popular "Housewives Choice" program, which is aired daily and has become one of the most sought-after spots by all the publishers. Its program is mainly of a nostalgic character, but now and then a couple of current pops are allowed to creep in. And those get a very substantial plug.

Finally, a comment on the hit songs of the year. With one exception, "Too Young" (which I regard as one of the outstanding successes of the year), they have nearly all been of the novelty hillbilly type. Look back at the hit parade lists and you will see numbers like "Mocki ' Bird Hill," "The Thing," "Puddy Tat," "Rudolph, the Red-Nosed Reindeer," "My Truly, Truly Fair," "My Heart Cries for You" and "Old Smoky." As always, there have been quite a flock of revivals during the year, and among the more successful I would pick "Lullaby of Broadway," "I Apologize" and "Shanty." British tunes have also made their mark, particularly such numbers as "Ferry Boat Inn," "Tulips and Heather," "If," "Unless" and "Good Luck, Good Health, God Bless You." And once again, as seasonal attraction, "Teddy Bears' Picnic" has built.

House Review

Oriental, Chi

Chicago, Dec. 26.

Miss Loni, Mildred & Jimmy Mulcay, Elsa & Waldo, Ames Bros. (4), Brian Farnon Orch.; "Callaway Went Thataway" (MG).

Ames Bros. are getting to be an annual Yuletide custom here, with the lads carrying off the star honors as usual. However, the rest of the show is very strong supporting fare. House orch also gets in the holiday mood with a holiday medley with leader Brian Farnon carolling two tunes.

Miss Loni does some fancy foot pedalling lying on a stool. Petit brunet runs the gamut of giant balls, tubes, barbells, and other paraphernalia. Does a six-day bike sprint with an extra large block to strong reception.

Jimmy & Mildred Mulcay haven't been around here for a few years, but act has been enhanced with electronic equipment. Pair gets off a fine early morning waker-upper with "Hold That Tiger" and then hook up their electric harmonicas for full sounding "Peg o' My Heart." They work in front on scrim, with duo doing some artful shadow stuff plus some fancy fluting. Coral Record artists do a fastie, "Caravan," before going into sure-fire, super-patriotic finale, impression of small town band on July 4. They march off to hefty hand.

Elsa & Waldo get giggles with their outlandish dance costumes and grimacing. Yocks get heavy with their takeoff on ballroom terpery. True capabilities creep out with some difficult backbends and toe taps. Courtship routine, with femme cackling, is punchy with team ending in a jivey note for brisk pounding.

Ames Bros. make their fourth return in about two years, riding atop their latest hit, "Undecided." While vocal work is high-drawer, it's the antics of tenor Vic, whose comedy rides herd on the rest of the group, which receives best response. Real frantic buffoonery has been toned down a bit, but it's still pretty pungent.

Quartet start off with a special takeoff of "Lonesome Road," a bit tasteless, and then swing into "I'll Still Love You," their latest platter, which could be dropped for better effect. "Who Built the Ark" is another spiritual paraphrase, marked by heavy comedy, followed by "Clancy Lowered the Boom." Straight singing of "Because" seems slightly out of place here but gets a sharp mitt anyway. Group have a new routine of etchings of other singers, some very accurate impressions, but little overlong. They end with a medley of their past hits and present "Undecided" for sock closer. Zabe.

Private Car

car ready to order, when an acrobat from the troupe, who had just finished eating, passed them, and seeing Lydia, said, "Hey, Lydia, lay off the soup, it's lousy!" I believe Lydia went back to the company car for the rest of the trip.

And will I ever forget that terrifically hot day when we were traveling across the desert. We were playing cards and asked the porter to get us a pitcher of ice water. We tipped him a half dollar (from the kitty, of course). A little later we asked him to bring us another pitcher of ice water. Again he brought it and again we tipped him. This happened about four times. When we asked for the fifth pitcher, he said, "Sorry boss, but if I takes any mo' ice from that box in the baggage car, the corpse won't keep!" The game broke up.

Do you remember those "tourist cars"—third class accommodations, instead of plush seats you got cane seats. There was a stove in the car you could cook , and you can just imagine the smell in the car when the dog trainer cooked the meals for his dogs! But it was cheap traveling so who cared? And those Prohibition days when we would come from Canada. Loaded in and out. The women would have bottles sewed on their girdles and when they walked they would "clang." We would ask the porter to hide our stuff until we got over the border. He would put it in the cooler, or in the airvents and under the cushions. It was funny how the customs men would walk right over to the "bunk" . . . and find and confiscate all the stuff. We didn't know then that the porter was in with them and got his cut on all the stuff.

And sometimes we would travel with a burlesque show. They would travel with us to make the next town. Vaude people would kinda feel a bit superior to burley people . . . but not on those trips. In about an hour after the train started the boys from vaude would be airing the chorus girls' dogs on the platform at every stop. Burley people were great company.

Then there was the time when the late and great J. C. Nugent was leaving on an Orpheum trip. He sat in the train looking very glum. Sim Collins, of that terrific team of Collins & Hart, came over to him and asked him why he was looking glum. "Well, I'm leaving on this tour, and I won't see my wife and children for a year." To which Sim said, "So what? I have four lots in Freeport that I haven't seen in five years!"

Cohan's Crack

And the time George M. Cohan had an argument with his family, he walked out of the company car and sat away up in the smoker. The conductor came along and asked for his ticket. He looked up and said, "Company" (meaning he was with the show troupe and manager had the ticket). "What company?" asked the conductor. "The goddamest company I ever was with!", said Cohan.

And the time Willie Collier met Al Wilson at the depot. Latter was walking on the platform. "Where's your company, Al?" "Over there, I don't speak to them, I'm the star you know." To which Collier said, "I saw your show, I don't blame them."

And the time Frank Tinney and W. C. Fields were sitting in a train. Frank didn't like fresh air and Bill did. When Bill put up the window Tinney would put it down. This happened a half a dozen times. Suddenly Bill Fields took his cane and broke the window saying, "Now it's neither open nor closed!"

These "special trains" have long since been limboed. Now they're streamlined and airconditioned. When they found they couldn't open the windows, they airconditioned the trains! Which reminds me of the story that . . . Oh, you'll have to excuse me, THIS IS WHERE I GET OFF! So long, be seeing you in Television!

Reaching Back Into the Files For Those Real Old R&H Tunes

By ROBERT BARAL

Mention Rodgers & Hart and one immediately goes on a humming spree of "My Heart Stood Still," "10c a Dance," "I've Got $5" or "The Blue Room." One song segues into another until most of the R. & H. catalog is run through.

Now with the publication of the "Rodgers & Hart Songbook" (Simon & Schuster), replete with handsome Doris Lee artwork—plus an informative foreword and introduction by Oscar Hammerstein II and Richard Rodgers, respectively—the work of this duo is rightfully telescoped into the American musical comedy section of the Hall of Fame.

But there's one squawk coming from the sidelines. What about their early songs? Their real early ones, that is. The only ones used in the songbook are "Any Old Place With You" (1919), and the extended intro number from the first "Garrick Gaieties" (1925). The embryo material stops there. And there's quite a story to those budding amateur years.

Recently Charles Gaynor ("Lend an Ear") put it to Rodgers this way: "I've always followed your songs from the start with keen interest—especially those early ones."

"Which ones do you mean?—'A Tree In the Park,' 'Yours Sincerely'?" Rodgers queried back.

"No," Gaynor continued. "I'm thinking of 'Peek In Pekin,' 'Othello,' 'Why Can't'?"

With that, Mrs. Rodgers joined in. "Well, what's this one, then?"—and the composer's wife started humming a tune, thinking she'd trip Gaynor on the song's identity. "That's 'Twinkling Eyes' from 'Up Stage & Down' (1919), Gaynor answered. The Rodgerses both gasped at this split-second revival before them.

This particular incident shows how high experts rate the early R. & H. output. Non-pros also join in on this sentimental demand.

Long before they actually joined talents, Rodgers & Hart were busy working on their own. They teamed with classmates and outsiders for collaboration purposes. Hart, the older of the two, was translating German plays for the Shuberts. He also turned out vaude skits on the side, "Girl from Lucille's" (1918) was one. This was originally labeled "Very Bad Eddie" as a poke at Jerome Kern's then-flourishing hit, "Very Good Eddie."

Rodgers' Amateur Shows

Rodgers, very much in his teens, was concentrating on amateur shows. The Akron Club, a social organization, which staged annual shows, was one of the most prominent amateur groups which used Rodgers' initial music. "One Minute Please" (1917) was one of the first. According to the souvenir program of the Akron Club, Rodgers was 15 years old at the time.

In 1918, Rodgers and Hart were introduced by mutual friends and decided to merge their work. "Up Stage & Down" (1919), another amateur show, was put on with most of the score by Rodgers. The songs: "Twinkling Eyes," "Asiatic Angles," "Love Me By Parcel Post" (his brother Mortimer Rodgers was in on this one); "Butterfly Love" and "Love Is Not In Vain" were the standouts.

Also in 1919, the first Rodgers & Hart song reached Broadway. It was "Any Old Place With You," which was added to the score of "A Lonely Romeo." The two were working closely now and building up a reservoir of songs to play on request.

The next year had them going at a clip. They wrote the Columbia U. varsity show; had five songs in "Poor Little Ritz Girl," and tossed off another amateur show, "You'd Be Surprised," for the good old Akron club. Dorothy Fields was in the cast of this latter amateur offering.

Rodgers was in Columbia at this time (Hart had gone there a few years back). The two submitted "Fly With Me" to the campus committee (Oscar Hammerstein 2d was member of this body), and it was accepted. "Fly With Me" songs include "Gone Are the Days," "A Penny For Your Thoughts," "Another Melody in F," "Working for the Government," "Inspiration," "Don't Love Me Like Othello," "Peek in Pekin," "Dreaming True," "A College on Broadway," "Moonlight and You," "Room For One More" (Hammerstein wrote this with Rodgers), "If You Were You" and "Gunga Din."

"Poor Little Ritz Girl" was having music trouble, and extra songs were needed. R. & H. supplied "Lady Raffles Behave," "You Can't Fool Your Dreams," "Love Will Call," "Love's Intense in Tents" and "Mary, Queen of Scots" (which came out of an Akron Club show with Herbert Fields on the lyrics).

Standouts of "You'd Be Surprised" were "Princess of the Willow Tree" and "When We Are Married." These were not strictly R. & H. songs, as they juggled lyricists. R. C. Englesman, a non-pro, and Milton Bender, who was staging the show, helped out on these chores.

Their 2d Columbia U. Show

In 1921, Rodgers & Hart were strictly solo on their second Columbia show, "You'll Never Know." This score includes "Virtue Wins the Day," "I'm Broke," "When I Go On the Stage," "Will You Forgive Me?", "Just a Little Lie," "You'll Never Know," "Let Me Drink in Your Eyes," "Watch Yourself," "Chorus Girls Blues" and "Jumping Jack."

Also 1921, "Say Mama" (Akron's annual) gave full scope to the combined talents of Rodgers, Hart and Herbert Fields, the threesome which was later to fuse into Broadway legit attention. The trio was paid $750 for "Say Mama."

Now with two Columbia shows behind them, and an introduction to Broadway, the duo, plus Fields, really got serious on fullscale shows. In 1924, they turned out two songs for Lew Fields in "The Jazz King." They were "Moonlight Mama" and "I'd Like To Poison Ivy." Instead of using their full names for credit, Rodgers, Hart and Fields only used their first monickers—Herbert Richard Lorenz—for cover listing. This trick label isn't generally known, and they're scarce to come across (for a collector).

Looms 1925-26 and the Theatre Guild acquired R. & H. for the "Garrick Gaieties." They wrote two editions, as the songbook reveals in detail. Also in 1926 they worked for Billy Rose on his "Fifth Avenue Follies" (which the songbook does not reveal), providing "Maybe It's Me" and "Where's That Little Girl With the Little Green Hat?"

From here on the Broadway beat quickens: "Peggy Ann," "Present Arms," "Spring Is Here," "The Girl Friend," etc. But they had their flops, too. Ziegfeld's "Betsy" and "Chee Chee" were two. From the latter show, "I Must Love You" was later turned into "Send For Me," and "Singing A Love Song" became "I Still Believe You." Both were inserted into Ziegfeld's "Simple Simon."

A London stint filtered through these years, with C. B. Cochran using R. & H. songs in the revue, "One Damn Thing After Another." For this show, "I Need Some Cooling Off," "My Luck Star" and the classic, "My Heart Stood Still" were written. "Evergreen," with "Dancing On The Ceiling" (salvaged from "Simple Simon" on this side), was another Cochran production, which starred Jessie Matthews. "Lido Lady" (with "A Little Flat Near Soho") was also of the 1926 vintage. "I'm Crazy About the Charleston" was used in another Cochran revue.

By this time, the spotlight was on full-blast on "Thou Swell," "You Took Advantage of Me," "With A Song In My Heart," etc. However, these smash numbers overshadowed many R. & H. songs of lesser light which merit a second look, such as: "A Kiss For Cinderella," "Hello," "Country Mouse," etc. Later , the standout hits of "On Your Toes," "I Married An Angel" and "Pal Joey" also nosed out other significant R. & H. songs with strong individual personality. "I'll Tell the Man On the Street," "How To Win Friends and Influence People," "Den Of Iniquity" are among these. Oscar Hammerstein 2d did point out "Wait Till You See Her," from "By Jupiter," in the songbook as something extra to appreciate, but the specialized appraisal ends there.

Who's the Forgotten But The Only Real Star Of Edwards' 'School Days'?

By GEORGIE PRICE

Cantor, Jessel, Winchell, Hildegarde, myself and many more of the Gus Edwards' proteges are constantly being referred to as a "star of Gus Edwards' School Days." The truth is that not one of us appeared in this particular act. I'm not trying to make myself any younger, but when I joined Gus I was seven years old, and "School Days" was just finishing its run. It was a legitimate musical comedy that played at the Circle Theatre, N. Y. Edwards ran into a little "money trouble" and had to sell his interest to Stair & Haviland, who trouped "School Days" for a while. Edwards later put on several "school acts" and since he could not use the "School Days" title, he called them "Gus Edwards' School Boys & Girls."

Watta Cast

Although I never appeared in any of them, I know that Walter Winchell did, along with Dave Seed, Lew Brice, Jack Weiner, Frank Albert, Sassy Little, Lillian Gonne, Roy Mack and Rita Green. Harry (MGM) Rapf was the manager. The real "School Days" had only one star and he was Herman Timberg who played the part of the "Jewish Kid." The story of the show was the life of an immigrant kid coming to America. The first scene took place on the boat, with Herman playing the fiddle from steerage while the rich first-class passengers listened and threw money. Timberg, the central character, was all through the show, playing, singing, dancing, gagging.

The schoolroom scene was only one of the many scenes in the production. Some others in the cast were the Courtney Sisters, Lillian Lorraine, Joe Keno & Rosie Green (parents of Mitzi Green), Helen Menken, and Willie Solar . When things got tough Gus Edwards played the part of an Italian kid himself.

I did a tribute to Gus Edwards recently on a TV show. All the names of the proteges who are currently popular were mentioned as "Stars of Gus Edwards' "School Days." I noticed that Herman Timberg's name was missing. I asked the young director if I might include it. "Who the hell is he?" he asked. "Herman Timberg is the only one," I said, "entitled to use the term of 'star' of 'Gus Edwards' School Days'."

"I never heard of him," he replied. Well, television is a nervous business and it takes a long time to explain. Maybe the young man will read about it here.

Reno Still Sockeroo Divorce Mill, Separating 'Em From Coin Via Stars

By MARK CURTIS

Reno.

The longest and strongest parade of talent filed through Reno's nightclubs in 1951 than in any previous year. And though only three spots book big names, the procession was endless. The resulting crowds produced enormous takes at the gaming tables.

Peak business is during summer, but it appears this winter will see almost as many star attractions i the major spots. The holiday season has Olsen & Johnson at the Riverside, Willie Shore in the Skyroom of Hotel Mapes, and Smiley Burnett and Jack Hilliard at the Golden Hotel.

One gambling club, the Cal Neva, has closed until May, however, because of the usual season slack and not because of any unusual dip i trade. This club had no entertai ment. It looked for awhile that some other clubs would follow suit, but the panic has died away. Top bookings continue.

During the big run of talent this year, the Riverside had such nai as Dennis Day and Frank Sinatra (both of whom drew $25,000 for their fortnights), the Andrews Sisters, and Ted Lewis. The Mapes showcased such toppers as Liberace, Toni Arden, Carl Ravazza, Connee Boswell, Ames Bros., and the Sportsmen. The Golden showed off April Stevens, Les Paul & Mary Ford, Tennessee Ernie, Mark Stevens, and Guy Mitchell.

Prim Reno, Gaudy Vegas

There is still speculation on whether Reno can support a fourth or fifth hotel and nitery. Reno, which considers Las Vegas a little gaudy (and Las Vegas thinks Reno prim), has not the same proximity to "fun money" as Las Vegas. Reno caters to San Francisco, more sedate and moderate than Los Angeles and Hollywood, of which L.V. is practically a suberb.

Difference in chamber of commerce philosophy is also sharp between these two Nevada cities: with Las Vegas, any publicity is good publicity—in Reno there's an effort to stabilize the economy with business and manufacturing, which is being more and more encouraged. The promotion is for the area as a ski resort and winter sports area, with entertainment and gambling almost secondary. Even in summer, the climate and surrounding country (Lake Tahoe, Virginia City, et al.) are promoted most.

There's an obvious effort on the part of the city and prominent citizens to keep the gambling localized within a few city blocks. This point came to a head recently when a building permit for Ernest J. Primm was turned down after much wrangling. He wanted to build a hotel and casino across the street from Harold's Club, the fabulous gamery boosting itself as the world's biggest.

At the end of 1951, Mert Wertheimer's Riverside Theatre Casino Restaurant stood as the newest entertainment abode, a year and half old.

Coming of Age

The Mapes celebrated its fourth birthday December 17, with over 2,700 guests attending. This is an annual event now in Reno and heralds the beginning of the holiday season. The Golden's theatre restaurant is now three years old.

One other spot, the Town House, has recently come up some after several years of ups and downs. This time it's partially on the upswing on the strength of singer-composer-pianist Matt Dennis. It's mostly an after-hours club.

The four big gambling casinos continue good business with Harold's Club still the place everyone heads first. Harrah's rates second in quality, and the Nevada Club probably rates second in take. The Palace Club and the Bank Club, two of the oldest, are doing very well. And the Cal Neva has shut

Sally Rand Wins $10,514 Judgment

Dallas.

Fan dancer Sally Rand won a $10,514 judgment in Federal Court here in a breach-of-contract suit for $18,000 against Al Wagner, operator of the "Cavalcade of Amusements." In court under her legal name, Mrs. Helen Gould Beck Finkelstein, she sued for full payment of $3,000 weekly due under a 1950 pact totaling $75,000.

During several weeks of '50, Miss Rand charged, she didn't collect the full amount—and had rejected Wagner's offer of a 50-50 split of the gross, after taxes.

AGVA 10G TVer Up in the Air

The television show of the American Guild of Variety Artists is up in the . Program's packager Vid-Pac, Inc., has failed to come up with a format that would satisfy Televisi Authority's requirements that all talent on commercial video programs be paid their customary salary.

Mort Harper and Henry Taylor, of Vid-Pic, are still looking for a formula, but it's unlikely that they'll be able to get around this requirement.

Show's proponents reported to have first proposed that artists who contribute their services to AGVA so that the union can get $10,000 for the welfare fund, be paid and then kick back the coin in the union. This suggestion was quickly talked down because of the fact that the artist would be accountable for these earnings come - come tax time.

TVA spokesmen have reported that as yet, Vid-Pac has not applied for a waiver from the "full-pay" resolution. At the same time, TVA turned down a request from the Federal Council of Churches of Christ for a waiver so that the Columbus Boys Choir could appear cuffo on the Don Ameche-Frances Langford program. TVA declared it would have no objection if the group worked free on a sustainer.

Meeting at which Taylor attempted to get an okay for the AGVA video package was a stormy session which had AGVA spokesmen fighting for the package. Finally, after several hours' argument, motion was made to table further discussion. AGVA prexy Georgie Price declared he seconded that motion so that the meeting could get on to other important business.

Les Compagnons de la Chanson (9), Pierre D'Angelo & Ana, Nat Brandwynne, Mischa Borr orchs; $1, $1.50 and $2, $2.50 covers.

Gallic artists have been conspicuously absent on the east side for the past few months, coinciding the Versailles' embrace of production policy. The imported Les Compagnons de la Chanson is the first of the French acts to hit the carriage trade set in some time. With Jean Sablon's upcoming stand at the other N. Y. Hilton hospice, the Plaza, it looks like the UN set will have a few roosting spots.

Les Compagnons are paired with Pierre D'Angelo & Ana and they provide an excellent bit of diversion. The former made their U. S. preem some years ago when the late Clifford C. Fischer brought them over to accompany Edith Piaf's debut at the Playhouse, N. Y. They made their imprint as one of the more versatile and expressive madrigal-mobs.

This nine-man affair is a well disciplined formation with solid knowledge of harmonics, a feeling for comedy and entertainment know-how. They reach their apex with songs of their native country. They give these an understanding impossible for them to impart in English. It was a mistake for them to concentrate so heavily on tunes in the latter language. Considerable flavor . lost. The saga of Jimmy Brown is the best in this grouping. Overall, the most solid offering is the multi-styled version of the French nursery rhyme "Clair de la Lune." This, their curtain piece, resulted in a vociferous salvo.

D'Angelo & Ana is another act familiar to east of 5th. This terp duo has fluidity and frequently give out an ethereal quality. Their numbers are sufficiently varied to maintain interest and their performance has a sophisticated quality befitting this room. Off to an appreciative palming.

Andy & Della Russell, Pierson Thal Orch (8); $1 cover, $1.50 Sat.

Holiday fare of Andy & Della Russell bowed in this swank spot Christmas Eve to a rousing reception from a near roomful of patrons. Singing duo, snowbound from Detroit, missed a Saturday (22) opening. Chanteuse Margaret Phelan did a fill-in stint for them.

Handsome pair get payees on their side from the start, with his lusty soloing of "With a Song in My Heart" and a softer "You Are Too Beautiful." Male half rates a big mitting with Latune reprisals of Capitol recordings, trio of "Besame Mucho," "Amor, Amor, Amor" and "Magic is the Moonlight" in Spanish. Distaff side solos "I Think You're Wonderful" ahead of a boff duetting of "Thou Swell."

Clever banter between the former orchester and the beauteous, TV-gowned blonde spices up and ties in the intros to a pair of top novelties—"Don't Say Hello" and "Live It Up, Laugh It Up"—both offerings scoring heavily. Some throwaway lines lead into nice pairing on "Harvest Moon" and "What a Difference a Day Made" before duo dons oldie costumes to revive "Charlie, My Boy," "I'm Just Wild About Harry" and "Jealous." Femme half asserts herself in a big bit, soloing "Honeymoon Is Over." Russell's capable miming of Tony Martin, Billy Eckstine, Mario Lanza, Jimmy Stewart and Clark Gable adds a fillip to a slick show.

Pianist Pierson Thal and his orch do a capable backing stint. At his own concert grand, the maestro offers toe-tempting tunes and, for holiday payees, a novelty medley in Latempo of "Jingle Bells," "Deep in the Heart of Texas" and "Stars and Stripes Forever."

Keeping the Theatre Free

Stage Remains Last Frontier of an Untrammeled Art, Not as Restricted as the Wider, 'Popular' Spheres Such as Films and Broadcasting

By EUGENE BURR

Americans fill up with pride and oratory at mention of the Four Freedoms; but most of us fail to realize that right here at home at least one item in that sacred quartet is largely absent—Freedom of Speech and Expression. In one of the greatest mediums of public expression, the entertainment field, there's little freedom, except in the thin borderline area of the legitimate theatre. And even there it's under constant attack.

Eugene Burr

The two major divisions of the entertainment industry, radio-TV and films, are not especially free. Films, with their self-established censorship, their complicated "codes" and frantic fears of offending pressure groups are bound hand and foot. Ditto radio-TV.

Such things are nothing new; they've occurred since the dawn of the English-speaking stage, and they scored their first great success when all theatres were closed during the dictatorship of that pre-Marxian commissar, Oliver Cromwell. Freedom of the stage returned with the Restoration. It's odd, but the theatre has usually been more nearly free under royalty than under the politicians.

On the political side, the British stage retained reasonable freedom until a politician rather than a monarch arbitrarily ended it. Fielding's satires on the Walpole ministry precipitated England's so-called Licensing Act, which provided that all plays before they could be acted must be read and licensed by the Lord Chamberlain. The act is still in effect.

As for New York, attempted censorship arrived here before the theatre did. When in 1767 the brave little troupe of players that had been brought to America by Lewis Hallam in 1752 announced that it would open at New York's new John Street Theatre on Dec. 7, the local press was immediately filled with the wails of the righteously indignant.

Most of the letters have a familiar ring even today—but there was one important difference. The self-appointed censors of 1767 wrote anonymously, using fancy Greek and Latin pseudonyms. Almost all of today's reformers are hungry for personal publicity.

In the 19th century there wasn't much censorship—chiefly because it wasn't needed. Being the mass entertainment of that day, the theatre displayed the same fawning lip-service to surface morality that hangs like a grave-glow over films and radio-TV today. This was an essentially commercial condition, just as it is now. Bound in the web of hypocritical morality, decent citizens couldn't afford to be seen entering a questionable area. Theatres with naughty plays were public; it was far more "moral," therefore, to stay away from them and spend your free time at other questionable houses—which, of course, weren't public at all.

Olga Nethersole and 'Sappho'

There were occasional flashes of revolt as the 19th century ended—as when Olga Nethersole, starring "Sappho," a play that was suspect anyhow since it stemmed from France, allowed herself to be carried by her leading man up a long flight of stairs that led with dreadful definiteness to the bawdy delights of a bedroom.

As for political censorship, it was practically non-existent. No one dared suggest it in the days before we got used to being hogtied by all sorts of dictatorial government controls.

Came the first World War, and the Victorian fog was finally dispersed. The pendulum swung in the other direction. Bars were closed up by Prohibition, but almost all bars were let down in the theatres. With mass audiences of the Mrs. Grundy type already drained off by the growing film industry, the theatre went on a freedom jag that ended, as such jags do, in pandemonium. Everything was blown up a bit larger than life, from sentimentality to sex.

The razzle-dazzle naturally brought a reaction. The reformers began to march, led by a number of publicity-minded hatchetmen who instigated police radio raids on various offending shows, under the authority of what was known as the Wales Padlock Law. The trouble was, as always, that the reformers saw smut in everything that chafed their own highly developed sense of sex; to them, a serious treatment of a serious theme, like "Maya," was as filthy as "Pleasure Man."

The Wales Law made the intellectual eye of the police department the ultimate test of theatrical dirt. And it provided penalities for practically everyone connected with the production, no matter how guiltless he might individually be. It took many years for the enlightened lawmakers of New York to realize that the actor doesn't really create the lines he has to say, and that the owner of a theatre has only secondary control over what happens withi it, once he has rented it to a producing manager.

A number of well-known and respected actors and actresses found themselves hauled into night court because they had had the audacity to appear in plays dealing with adult themes. A number of young ladies who allowed the public to see them clad in their native modesty, and not much else, were also rounded up by red-faced patrolman. So was Mae West.

By the time the stock market did its fancy dive, the freedom of the mid-'20s had begun to subside. Intelligent members of the legislature, who crept in among the usually equipped solons, had begun a campaign to end the more pernicious evils of the Wales Law. The eventual result, in the 1930s, was the Post Amendment. This did away with the ride of the actors to the hoosegow (except in cases wherein so-called actresses could be legitimately charged with "indecent" exposure) and freed the theatreowner from fear of the padlock.

From 'Lysistrata' To Mushy

This, however, was only in New York. Throughout the rest of the country the Black Marias still shuttled merrily between the stage-door and the cellblock. The round of idiocy was climaxed when that citadel of straitlaced morality, Los Angeles, pinched Nance O'Neil, one of America's greatest actresses, for daring to appear in a "lecherous, disgusting slab of smut" named "Lysistrata." The horse-laughs that emanated from all corners of the country at this splendid defense of the basic moralities by Hollywood's lily-pure burghers had some effect in decreasing the incidence of similar cases, at least for a while.

With the depression came a new sort of smut—a grubbier sort that masqueraded as realistic drama or hard-hitting comedy—plays like "Washington Square" on the one hand and "The Great Magoo" on the other. The public stayed away in droves; but the reformers marched once more. This time the threat was really serious. Backed by various church organizations, they made a determined effort to impose official and permanent censorship on the New York stage. The theatre, waiting as it always does until some time after the 11th hour, eventually met the attack. In order to avoid the approaching sterility of official censorship, it established censoring machinery of its own.

This was set up in conjunction with the American Arbitration Assn. and provided that, on the receipt of any complaint concerning the morality of a show, the opus in question would be visited by a jury selected from the AAA's panel of intelligent and fair-minded general citizens. It was obviously a workable plan—but it never worked because it was never called upon to do so. The reformers, refusing to trust their prurient judgments to the verification of a jury of impartial citizens, never set the machinery in operation.

At about the same time another and perhaps even more dangerous type of censorship reared its head. In the early spring of 1932, at the tiny Provincetown Theatre in Greenwich Village, a play called "Merry-Go-Round" was presented. It turned out to be an exciting and excellent melodrama that was also a stirring attack on political skullduggery. So successful did it prove that a few weeks later its producers decided to move it to a Broadway house—but at the last moment the theatreowner (an independent no longer in the business, but well-known as a friend of various city officials) announced that, despite an overwhelming lack of patronage, a flop then playing at the house would be held over for an extra week. The producers then booked "Merry-Go-Round" for the Avon—but just a week before the opening the city License Department announced that the license of the Avon had expired, and that it would not be renewed until various changes had been made in the theatre. When pressed, the License Department said the major change was the tearing out of about 50 seats to enlarge the orchestra pit. Broadway, which couldn't understand how an enlarged orchestra pit would reduce fire hazards, drew its own conclusions.

The producers drew the same conclusions, and their wails of accusation were echoed by press and public. It was heart-warming to see how Americans of all castes of political opinion rallied in 1932 when they saw one of their precious Freedoms thereatened.

Jimmy Walker In the Middle

The press interviewed the late James J. Walker, then mayor, and the irrepressible Jimmy said merely that he thought "Merry-Go-Round" a bad play. When pressed, he said if there'd been a play immediately preceding it at the Avon, there would have been no need for a Fire Department investigation. The usually witty James J. thus made a faux pas; there'd been a play in the house the week before "Merry-Go-Round" was supposed to open.

The mayor's statement redoubled the howls. The License Department suddenly decided that there was no need for an investigation after all; and "Merry-Go-Round" opened just a week after schedule.

Six years later came another attempt to impose censorship through the License Department, which was at that time headed by Commissioner Paul Moss. Moss, realizing that legal censorship was impossible, announced that henceforward he would refuse to renew the license of any theatre that had, in his personal opinion, housed an objectionable show.

Opposition was so strong that the self-appointed Jehovah amended his dictum; now he said he would refuse to renew the license of any playhouse in which burlesque was presented. This was getting in the easy way; there was little that anyone could say in defense of burlesque. Those versed in the ways in which liberties are lost viewed the situation with alarm; but anyone who raised a voice against the noble crusade was immediately dismissed as a lecher. Moss carried out his threat and refused to renew the licenses of the burlesque houses.

But the back door had been opened; once burlesque was safely banished, Moss advanced on the theatre itself. Chief object of his thunderbolts was an unembarrassed tidbit, "Star and Garter," which starred Gypsy Rose Lee. It also included Carrie Finnell, a not-quite-so-young lady who possessed the unusual and fascinating ability to cause large tassels to revolve merrily, through the exercise of muscles not ordinarily used for public display.

The License Commissioner, professing himself shocked, threatened that unless changes were made he would revoke the license of the theatre. The house in question was the Music Box; and the resultant outcry was loud and widespread—but neither quite so loud nor quite so widespread as the outcry over "Merry-Go-Round" six years before. Americans were becoming used to government by decree.

Since then the reformers and incipient dictators have concentrated on the larger fields of radio, cinema and TV.

Any real political freedom on the air is, of course, non-existent; radio's own basic rules and regulations see to that. And there are other restrictions, tabus and hurdles. In films the situation is ditto.

In the theatre sporadic efforts to impose so-called "moral" censorship have been made in recent years. A few seasons ago the production of "Trio" was used as the basis for a new attempt to allow the license commissioner to censor all plays; but the theatre quickly threw up united defenses, and (since the echoes of the enunciation of the Four Freedoms had not yet quite died away) public opinion helped to beat down the attack.

But the question arose again in the spring of 1948, following a successful attempt by the police department to censor the stage on its own hook, when the management of "Mr. Roberts" quietly changed several lines in the play at the direct (and entirely extra-legal) suggestion of the gendarmes. The new attempt to turn the license commissioner into a licensed censor came in the form of a bill introduced by City Councilman Edward Cunningham, who was spurred by the production of Jean-Paul Sartre's "The Respectful Prostitute." The bill (which in effect would have allowed the license commissioner on his own authority to censor anything, even a play's advertising) was opposed by the License Department itself, the commissioner at that time being Benjamin Fielding, not Paul Moss. Fielding thought the bill endangered freedom of expression, and said publicly that he was against it.

In view of Fielding's attitude, it was thought that the Cunningham Bill would be allowed to die in committee. But such optimism reckoned without the dubious methods of would-be censors. At a committee meeting at which only six of the 10 members were present, four of those six voted to report the bill to the council. It is usual in matters of this sort for the committee to hold open hearings. None was held.

When the bill left the committee, Equity called a meeting of all theatrical organizations, and contacted the Central Trades & Labor Council, which has some 750,000 members. The council did yeoman service in helping to arouse public opposition to the bill.

Still no hearings were held. Representatives of the theatre were promised that when the bill came up it would be referred back to

Stiff Upper Lip (Thru 3½ Wars)

By RICHARD JOSEPH

The theatre is thriving in provincial England, I am happy to report after an unforgettable evening in a legitimate house in New York. You know, I'm darned if I can remember the name of the play I saw that night, but it was an English drawing-room comedy, and I can tell you what it was all about.

Its theme, I gathered, was that men are all dopes and the biggest of us would be just that much dopier if it weren't for the women in our lives. To prove it, the playwright took an English family and followed their struggles along for a while. The play opened around the time of the Boer War, when a member of the cast called Dada was down in Africa.

Mummy was telling Daughter, about to be married, about the facts of life, which consisted of the bald statement that Dada never knew what day it was, in or out of Africa, and would never have gotten to be Colonel of the Royal Buckinghamshire Fusiliers if Mummy hadn't buttered up the General's wife. All men needed looking after, said Mummy, and Daughter pressed her hand and smiled understandingly. Curtain.

Act II carried on the theme. It was 1916. World War I. "Roses Are Blooming In Picardy." Daughter had become Mummy, Mummy had become *Grand*m'ma, and Dada had disappeared from the Dramatis Personae, done in by a Boer's poisoned arrow. (Come to think of it, I never did see Dada.)

There was a new girl called Daughter, and she was a driver for the General, old pal of Dada's. Only this was a different Dada. He was the young man Mummy had wanted to marry back in Act I when she had been Daughter. Well this Dada, now powdered at the temples, was serving in France, on duty with his unit, an outfit called the Aldershot Tattoo.

Daughter wanted to marry her young man, but had to move fast because he was on leave and had to return pretty soon to a village in France called The Hell of Ypres. Mummy was against the marriage because the young man's father was In Trade, in the wool trade, to be exact, in Yorkshire. (Hiss! Boo!)

Daughter's young man was a very dashing young man. He kept dashing on and off the set, dressed in a trench coat, flailing his arms around and saying, look heah, Daughter had jolly well better make up her mind because he jolly well had to get back to The Hell of Ypres. Daughter couldn't withstand this sort of approach, so she gives in, and the happy couple takes off for a quick honeymoon at a seaside resort called Blighty, which, I understand, is someplace up near Blackpool. Mummy and *Grand*m'ma are left alone, sobbing softly. Act II Curtain.

World War II

Act III. It is 1940, during the Blitz. "Bluebirds Over The White Cliffs of Dover." Daughter has become Mummy, Mummy has become *Grand*m'ma, and *Grand*m'ma has become *Great*grandmummy, an old crock of 104 who does nothing but sit by the fire, mumble to herself, and ask when's tea.

There's another Daughter, this time a Wren, and she does something real important down at the Admiralty. Same old story, she wants to get married; this time it's a Flight Leftenant, and he hasn't got much time, either, because he keeps getting planes shot out from under him, and how long can that sort of thing go on?

Well, Mummy's against it again, only you'll remember that she was the Daughter in Act II who didn't want the Yorkshire lad to go back to The Hell of Ypres without having a bit of bliss in Blighty. That's why she's against the marriage, it seems. Her young man had never come back from France to be a Dada, even temporarily, but had left her nothing but memories and Daughter on the way. And she didn't want Daughter to have nothing from the Flight Leftenant but another Daughter. (Which would have made Daughter a Mummy, Mummy a *Grand*m'ma, and so on down the line.)

With that, *Great*grandmummy—who has done nothing all act but mutter to herself, ask for a nice cup of tea, and curse the Transvaal and the Kaiser—suddenly has a lucid moment. She says that men are the ones who mess up the world and bring on the wars, that the men in that family especially never had enough sense to know how to pull up their sox, and that she, Grandm'ma and Mummy all had been better off after Dadas Nos. 1, 2, and 3 had been removed from the scene, so Daughter might as well enjoy the Flight Leftenant while he was still around. Daughter then hugs everybody and goes off to Euston Station to catch the first Blighty train.

*Great*grandmummy, still amazingly lucid, suddenly remembers a bottle of Napoleon Brandy the original Dada had forgotten in his haste to have a go at old General Smuts. She tells Mummy where to find the bottle, sage remarks are exchanged to the effect that someday the men will kill themselves off in their senseless wars, until only a few are left for necessary biological purposes, and then there will be a rational world. *Great*grandmummy; *Grand*m'ma and Mummy then crack the bottle and drink toast to Queen Victoria. Curtain.

Come to think of it, I saw the same darned play once, in a barn theatre in Westport, Conn., only Dada No. 1 was called Pop and was one of Teddy Roosevelt's Rough Riders, what they had against the middle guy was that he was a Democrat, instead of from Yorkshire, and the last Daughter's young man was an atomic scientist, keen blowing up the world.

'Ballet-High' Is New Show Biz Slogan (With Apologies to R&H)

By ARTHUR BRONSON

Ballet in America has come of age. That artful blend of the best in dance, story and music—which had its modern-day inception in the U. S. when impresario Sol Hurok imported the original Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo from Europe in 1934—has now reached its ultimate in maturity and popularity.

What was originally something exotic and strange, something "chichi and highbrow," has been taken over by the commoner, and is now on almost every theatregoer's schedule. What was an experiment 17 years ago, and still a novelty 10 or five years back, is today an established branch of show business. Ballet has definitely arrived.

The classical toe art is not only found now in the concert hall or auditorium, but also in legit, films, nightclubs and ice shows. Ringling Bros.-Barnum & Bailey circus has even staged a ballet. It's become as staple a part of the American scene as baked beans or apple pie.

Ballet has also become big business. Last season, for the first time, there were no less than six major ballet troupes cavorting through the countryside, while another half-dozen smaller groups also made extensive tours. Audiences poured out about $5,000,000 to view an assorted display of longhair terpsichore, half of this sum going to view one company, the Sadler's Wells Ballet of London.

This season the count of major dance troupes is still six, although two aren't so much in the classical department as in specialized dance—in Uday Shankar and his Hindu Ballet, and Jose Greco and his Spanish Ballet. But Hindu or Spanish dance, they cling to the "ballet" tag, because the word is now magic.

Major Troupes in Action

America's three major ballet troupes—the N.Y. City Ballet Co., Ballet Theatre and Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo—are very much in action this season, while London has sent a sister company of Sadler's Wells, called the Sadler's Wells Theatre Ballet to distinguish it from the other, to make a U. S.-Canadian tour. There are also several smaller dance groups, such as Marina Svetlova and her company, Mia Slavenska and her Ballet Variante, and Ana Maria's Spanish Ballet, to make sure that America doesn't want for dancing.

The N. Y. City Ballet Co., rapidly attaining critical rating as America's No. 1 dance troupe after only four years of playing, scheduled three "seasons" of appearances in N.Y. for 1951-52, dancing three weeks in September, five weeks in November-December, and listing a four-week season for February-March.

Then the troupe heads for its first continental European tour, a prestige-laden visit to all the big music festivals and to the main cultural centers, on a five-month trek. The lush 20-week, $225,000 junket, the most ambitious foreign trip ever taken by an American company, will start in Barcelona, take in the Maggio Music Festival in Florence; Paris Music Festival; Amsterdam, Lausanne and Edinburgh Festivals; include a six-week period at Covent Garden, London, and possibly a visit to Scandinavia.

Ballet Theatre, having started its season with a three-week engagement in the fall in New York, is currently on a cross-country gallop which will carry it through March. Then it, too, expects to go to Europe for an extensive tour.

Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo is out on its annual countrywide trek, during which the troupe will dance for 29 consecutive weeks or more, not even laying off for the traditionally-slow pre-Xmas and pre-Easter weeks. Last year this company gave 199 performances in 203 days, with only 22 nights off during that period.

Sadler's Wells Theatre Ballet, in its debut around the country, is stirring up almost as much fuss as its elder sister did the last two sea- . The troupe is doing a 24-week season's tour of the U.S. and Canada. Unheralded, unknown in the U.S., and comprised of young kids most of whom are in their early 20' , the troupe has been cashing in on its sister-troupe's reputation, while standing up on its own by virtue of the sock notices it's been getting everywhere.

At its tour's half-way mark, Xmas week, the troupe had taken in almost $750,000, a fantastic total for an unknown young outfit. Some of the early season takes—in face of an off-season generally and concert biz slumps everywhere—have been phenomenal. Grosses some weeks exceeded the boff takes of the touring hit legit musical, "Guys and Dolls."

In a split week of seven performances on the Coast, Sadler's took in a huge $75,800 the first week in December. Week before, it garnered a big $57,600 for eight shows in Vancouver. A week divided between Seattle and Portland netted $74,700. A Toronto eight-performance stay racked up $45,400; six more shows in Montreal took in $46,000. And so on.

The country is getting ballet not only in its original form, but in theatre and film transformations as well. The film, "Red Shoes," built around a ballet troupe, ran for two years in N. Y. and is still being exhibited around. "Tales of Hoffmann," film based on the Offenbach opera, with a major part of it devoted to the dance, is this season's ballet pic feature.

Samuel Goldwyn currently filming a dance picture based on the Hans Christian Andersen stories, with Sadler's ballerina Moira Shearer playing opposite Danny Kaye in the lead. Alexander Korda is prepping "Sleeping Beauty" ballet film in Europe, while indie producer Victor Pahlen is mapping a classic ballet pic, "The Nutcracker," in Mexico.

The current Metro musical, "An American In Paris," has as its highlight a dance sequence for a finale, in a ballet which runs 17 minutes. Such a work in a Hollywood pic 10 years ago would have been unthinkable. Films devoted solely to ballet, like "Red Shoes," would have been equally unthinkable, certainly not boxoffice, a decade back. Spurred by the success of "An American in Paris," Gene Kelly is prepping for Metro a pic, "Invitation to the Dance," which will contain no story as such, but instead will focus exclusively on the terpsichorean art form.

Legit on Broadway borrows ballet's choreographers, like Agnes de Mille, Jerome Robbins, George Balanchine and Michael Kidd, and its dancers, like Colette Marchand, Kathryn Lee, Muriel Bentley, Vera Zorina and Irina Baronova. Broadway's two current hits, "The King And I" and "Call Me Madam," have Robbins' choreography; "the sock "Guys and Dolls" has Kidd's dancestyles. In many a recent show ("Oklahoma," "Brigadoon," "On The Town" and others), the dancing—along classical ballet lines—has been the most spectacular if not the most important part of the show. Ballet has raised the standard of dancing in Broadway musicals, up and away from the one-two-three-and-kick routines. "Ballet-high" is the new show biz slogan.

Unique Is the Word For B'way in '51

By JACOB A. WEISER

When a Broadway legit season produces several "firsts" which, in themselves, make theatrical history, then that season may be regarded as indeed unique. To illustrate:

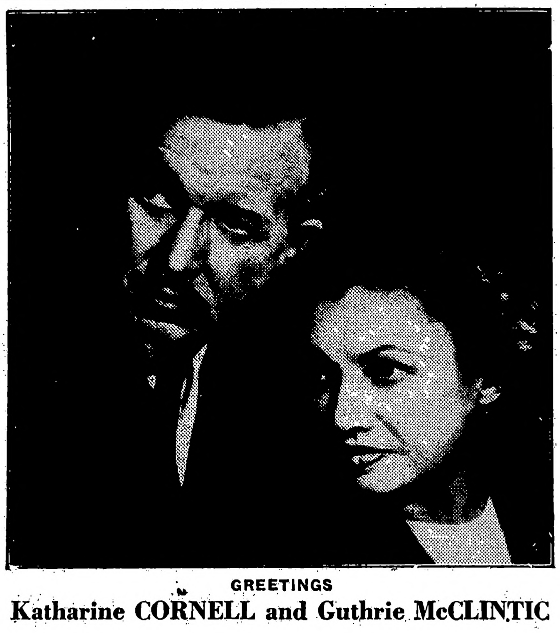
(1) For the first time in the history of the theatre in America, a new professional play with professional actors was presented in a church at rates comparable to plays on Broadway. The play was Christopher Fry's "A Sleep of Prisoners." The presentation of plays in churches was common practice way back in England in the 14th and 15th centuries, but the practice fell into disuse with the banishment of plays during the Puritan period from 1642 to 1660, when Oliver Cromwell became the head of the Commonwealth in England.

(2) For the first time in America, professional play with professional actors was given, for commercial consideration, at first in a concert hall and later in a theatre, in which the actors merely read their parts from manuscripts which were placed on stands before them. The play is George Bernard Shaw's "Don Juan in Hell." And the illustrious cast is made up of Charles Laughton, Charles Boyer, Sir Cedric Hardwicke and Agnes Moorehead.

(3 For the first time in America a two-character play is such a resounding smash hit that it paid off its investment within six weeks after its opening, which in itself is a stupendous achievement. The play is Jan de Hartog's "The Fourposter." Moreover, it is only the fourth two-character play that has been presented professionally on Broadway over a span of almost 30 years. The others were "The First 50 Years," by Henry Myers; "Jealousy," by Eugene Walter, and "Close Quarters," by Gilbert Lennox.

(4) For the first time within the memory of the modern theatregoer two outstanding stars are presenting, in repertory, on Broadway, two plays that treat with the same central character. The plays are Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra" and Shaw's "Caesar and Cleopatra." The stellar performers are Vivien Leigh and Laurence Olivier.

(5) And finally, though it is a carryover from the spring of 1951, there is a play on Broadway without a woman in its cast. The play is "Stalag 17" by Donald Bevan and Edmund Trzcinski. Not since 1925, when R. C. Sherriff's "Journey's End" captivated America, was there a play on Broadway which did not boast a single distaffer. However, there was another all-male piece of far lesser persuasion—"The First Legion"—season '34-'35.



GREETINGS
Katharine CORNELL and Guthrie McCLINTIC

A Memory of C. B. Cochran

By HANNEN SWAFFER

London.

Charlie Cochran was a Barnum and a Ziegfeld in one. Banging the drum and staging scenes of distinction and beauty gave him equal joy. A Pirandello play, "The Miracle," a prizefight, a circus or a Fat Girl in a sideshow—outside all these he shouted "Walk up" until his lungs gave way.

He was not only the greatest showman Britain ever possessed. His brazenness proclaimed, but did not destroy, an exquisite taste possessed by few business men in the world of the theatre.

Sometimes he banged the drum until he broke it. Sometimes he was so extravagant that he nearly broke his backers. But always he staged a comeback.

I would rank him, as a conversationalist, when he was in his best mood, beside Will Rogers and not far behind Churchill and Lloyd George, both of whom I have heard in the intimacy of their homes, at their family dinner table and in the House of Commons lobby. I admired his brain, his nerve, his discernment, his enterprise.

We often quarreled—yes, for years at a time. We were both imperious, I suppose, and will clashed with will. Besides, Cocky was intolerant of criticism. If I pointed out that one of his swans was only a goose, there was a row which neither of us sought to end.

When, once, Morris Gest tried his best to make us friendly, he succeeded—but only for a week or so.

"Do me a favor, Swaffie," said Morris, leaving the Savoy Grill table he was sharing with the Cochrans, to walk to mine. "Come and shake hands with Charlie."

"But he wouldn't shake hands with me," I protested.

"Think of Christmas bells and Father Christmas," went on Gest. "Come over and be friends."

Three times, returning to my table, he tried. At last, chancing it, I went over and shook Cochran's hand. In a moment we were friends again. We spoke as though we had never rowed.

Later, when Cocky and Gest went upstairs to Al Woods' room, Gest shouted: "Al, isn't it wonderful! Christmas bells. Father Christmas! Swiffie and Charlie have shaken hands."

While Al, who naturally didn't care a damn, was pretending he had never heard of the row, Gest saw an American pal of Woods' enter the room.

"Get out, you rat," he shouted. "Get out."

"Christmas bells," jeered Al. "Try some of the Father Christmas stuff yourself."

"That doesn't apply to that swine," yelled Gest. "He robbed me of $500 years ago—and I've never seen him since."

Next day, when Cochran drove me to the hotel where Mickey Walker was training for a fight C. B. was promoting with Tex Rickard, he talked all the way of how it seemed as though we had never quarreled, of the years of friendship we had lost, and how we could never row again.

But—the fight, a few days later, was a fiasco. Because I was the only reporter who said so, and in big headlines, Cochran and I were again at war. I think for five years that time.

'Blackbirds' Blues

Our first trouble was over his first staging of a "Blackbirds" company including Florence Mills. Albert de Courville was bringing a rival all-black show and I protested—perhaps wrongly—against the importation of colored foreign artists at a time when work for British acts was scarce.

So, on the first night, Cochran threw me out of his theatre. "There's no room for you in any show of mine," he said. As I was barred from a dozen theatres soon after, that was only one.

When he staged an "Ann Christie" season with Arthur Hopkins—and I, who had bought a seat, gave Pauline Lord her wildest rave. Cochran couldn't understand: "I thought that Swaffer was an enemy of mine," he said.

It took him a long time to forgive my attack on the rodeo he brought to Wembley, with the present King and Queen sitting all through the first performance. I thought it cruelty—and so did the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which prosecuted Cochran and Tex Austin, the promoters. They were acquitted—but only by seven magisterial votes to five.

That ended rodeo in Britain—and it was followed by a bankruptcy in which Cochran owed £94,000 more than his assets. So popular was he, though, that although small theatrical traders suffered, he was pitied and even acclaimed. "Good old Charlie," was shouted. Cochran found fresh backers and fought his way back to a prosperity his daring deserved.

Our other rows were numerous. I would not stand for his ballyhoo. As I do not myself write lies, I object to the overstatements of showmen.

Mind you, though, there was a sincerity of purpose behind Cochran's exaggerations. He really loved the theatre and, when we were on speaking terms, I loved him for it. When he was knighted and the Guards played music from his "Bless the Bride" show while he was being told by the King to "Arise Sir Charles," he had deserved the title for his great services to the theatre.

He brought to London, from America and the continent, many artists of brilliant talents and innumerable shows of outstanding merit.

And his shrewdness is illustrated in the story of how, when he had an unsuccessful revue running, he asked big-hearted Will Rogers to act in it for a month and then sent him a blank check—knowing he wouldn't fill it in! The only one who complained was the agent. He didn't get any commission!

Cochran's achievements, for they exceed those of any other six London managers, all combined, were always "news." Charlie was always a "personality." Being his friend was a privilege. Quarreling with him barred one from the delight of his company.

It is extraordinary to realize that he and I, friends, enemies, intimates, foes, were actually born in the same village. This we did not know—for my mother only happened to by staying there at the time with her sister—until, during the first world war, Cocky showed me, what was hard to get then, a passport stamped with an American visa.

"Born in Lindfield, Sussex?" I said. "Why so was I!"

"Nonsense," he replied.

When I proved it to be true, Cochran soon discovered a mythical birthplace for me and used to point it out to visitors.

L&Y LEAD ATTACK ON OLD 3-SHEET AS PASSE

Minneapolis.

Russell Lewis and Howard Young, producers of the touring "Cocktail Party," have anticipated other legit managements in deciding that three-sheets, 24's and window cards are no longer effective ad-promotion gimmicks for legit. On instructions from the producers, Anthony Buttitta, the show's advance man, is using no paper at all.

Instead of billboards plastered in alleys, etc., the T. S. Eliot play uses three-sheets only for front of the house billing. In some cases, where the policy of the theatre is to print its own three-sheet signs, L&Y use none at all. They also use no window cards and, it's claimed, some local managers who swear by them but usually leave them stacked around the cloak room, are yelling about it.

Instead of billboards, Buttitta is placing cards trolleys and busses, usually on the outside of the bus and generally 21x44-inch size, printed in luminous paint. These cost more than window cards, about the same as three-sheets, and considerably more to post, as it involves renting the space on cars and busses. But the system, it's claimed, gets results, which L&Y believe is more than can be said for billboarding.

THEY SHALL NOT PASS!

Evolution and Revolution of the 'Skulls'; Yclept 'Courtesies,' 'Annie Oakleys'

By BERNARD SOBEL

Though all sorts of books have been written about the history of the theatre from its ancient origin in Egypt to the current infringement of television, no one, it seems, has ever turned out even a single chapter on free tickets of admission. Yet such a chapter could be fascinating, filled with hopes and disappointments, humor, pathos and skullduggery. It would reflect, also, the changing professional attitude toward a free list.

In the '90s, for instance, free tickets were called "courtesies" and complimentaries," gracious terms that were flattering to the recipients. Eventually, however, these euphemistic expressions gave way to realistic words like "passes," "ducats," "two-on-the-arm," "two-on-the-cuff," "deadheads" and "Annie Oakleys," a linguistic association with the famous lady sharpshooter that has never been satisfactorily explained. Some sources aver it derives from the holes she shot into objects thrown airward during her act; cuffo tix are usually punched, "Oakleys."

Just when people began getting into shows for nothing is the first of a number of tantalizing questions that presents itself to the theatrical antiquarian. Did, for instance, certain suave Greeks barge their way, gratis, into the dramas of Aeschylus, Euripides, Aristophanes and Sophocles? Did certain smooth Elizabethans slide into crowded inn yards, without paying, to see the Mystery, Morality and Miracle plays? Did a select group of favored persons see shows for nothing during the Restoration?

The answer to that last question is "Yes, indeed." Footmen, employed by rich or titled employers, enjoyed this privilege in a reserved section of the playhouse called the "Footmen's Gallery."

Here they assembled at every performance before the curtain rose, to watch the play, not for their own enjoyment, but, oddly enough, to oblige their employers. For if the opening scenes proved interesting, the footmen would leave the theatre hastily, rush home and recommend the piece to their masters and mistresses who would then ride to the theatre to see the remainder of the performance.

This practice grew to such proportions that the footmen acquired a publicity value as mouth-to-mouth boosters of the show. Eventually, as a result, they began to feel and emphasize their own importance. They actually believed that the theatre couldn't do without them until one night, an astute manager came along and ordered them out.

"I can use that free space," he said, "for paying patrons and increase my receipts accordingly."

But, incredible as it may seem, the footmen stood on their imagined rights and forced their way into the theatre. Openly belligerent, they marched down from the gallery onto the stage, and started a fight in the midst of the performance, defying manager, audience and actors. There followed a few moments of suspense and excitement after which the combat dwindled soon into a futile fracas. The footmen were ejected from the theatre and their special gallery was closed to them forever.

But the pass-hound still lives on and also free admisions. Today, however, the privilege of entering free is largely confined to a signed list which the management sends over to the boxoffice about 8 o'clock in the evening and which gives the name and professional connection of the guest. Sometimes the letters "N. T." appear after the name, an abbreviation for "No Tax," a dispensation limited by the Government to newspapermen and magazine writers or, generally, the "working press."

"Do you recognize the profession?" was the polite question that unemployed actors used to ask the managers up to about 25 years ago; and the managers, impressed by the divinity of the thespian, would hand out a couple of free seats. Nowadays, such a request would be met with a curt negative. Seats for good shows are too valuable to give away and unless the applicant is on the accredited free list, he can't possibly get in without paying. And even when a manager is willing to let someone through the door, without a ticket, he is liable to get into trouble for seeming evasion of the federal admission tax.

Gate-Crashers

At various times, little rackets have flourished whereby passhounds have outwitted both manager and ticket taker.

For a number of years, when magazines and articles about the stage were more numerous than they are today, phony writers used to stage fake interviews for free admissions. Pretending that they had to study the play before doing the article, they managed to see the show without ever writing a line about it. Sometimes, too, the star, flattered by an interviewer's attention, would say, "I'll have a couple of seats put aside for you, any night you care to go."

Bolder grafters get into shows even now by going up to the boxoffice and demanding tickets which were left supposedly by the press agent. The treasurer, always eager to treat the press courteously, sometimes falls for this procedure. They look down the list and even though the name is missing, they hand out a location, for fear of offending someone with influence.

The late "Tammany" Young and "One-Eyed" Connelly were famous for ability to crash opening nights, but the tribe is fast dying out. Occasionally, though, a woman in evening dress with jewels and orchids will walk up to the doorman at a premiere and say, "May I please stand inside until my husband arrives with the tickets?"

But once this permission is granted, the lady grafter won't budge until she sees the entire show for free.

The opposite of this situation is found in the man who willingly pays for tickets and then begs the boxoffice treasurer to punch holes in them.

"I want my friends to think they're passes," he explains because he knows that the fascination of the theatre is so great in New York that anyone close enough to it to get passes, has an influence that may prove advantageous. The tickets, no matter how much he pays for them, add to his prestige value.

An amusing result of this procedure is related in "Show Biz" which describes the plight of a man who bought tickets, had them punched and then, when the performance was cancelled because of the star's illness, couldn't exchange them for another night or recover his money because the holes in his tickets indicated that he hadn't paid for them.

In one instance, the distribution of theatre passes had an extraordinary influence on New York stage history. About 20 years ago, every theatre employed what was called an advertising agent whose job was to place posters and window cards in butcher shops, candy stores and saloons throughout the city. Competition for these preferred locations was keen, and often an agent would offer the shop owner more than the customary number of passes in order to secure important display space. (An old term for these was "window privilege," or lithograph pass.)

'Went Over With a Leblang'

One day, in 1897, these passes took on unexpected monetary value. Joe Leblang, who owned a little cigar store near Times Square, got the idea of buying the free tickets back from small store owners at 50 cents apiece and then selling them at cutrate prices to friends who were fond of the theatre, but couldn't afford to pay boxoffice prices.

The store owners snapped up Leblang's idea so quickly that he decided to buy as many more tickets as he could get.

Soon Leblang's business grew so large that he saw the possibility of linking it up with the professional theatre. So he offered to buy a certain number of seats for shows which were failing.

At first the managers, conservative and suspicious, received his proposal with contempt. After a time, however, Joe Weber (& Fields) became a producing manager; and when his show started tottering he voluntarily offered Leblang a block of tickets.

Weber's example was soon followed by the other managers, with the result that the Leblang cutrate agency soon outgrew the cigar store and became, in new and larger quarters, the mecca for thousands of customers anxious to see shows at reduced rates. Eventually, Leblang made a fortune, nursing along limp plays like "Able's Irish Rose" into financial hits.

About five or six years ago the custom of giving away passes was renewed on a scale never before contemplated. Before opening on Broadway, producers tested their plays out-of-town. The custom was expensive because of transportation, advertising and hotel costs; and it gradually grew meaningless because of the marked difference in the reactions of out-of-town audiences and New York audiences. (Some producers, of course, still prefer the out-of-town tryout.)

The out-of-town audience is comparatively "easy" and receptive, easily pleased, while the New York audience is sophisticated, hard, and even combative. "Trying it on the dog," as a result, has practically died out in favor of the metropolitan preview.

Now, as a result, producers present sometimes as many as five or six of these previews, giving out hundreds of seats to hospitals and department stores, in their efforts to test public response. They make a desperate effort, also, to keep Broadwayites from attending, for fear that their comments may reach the ears of critics and ticket speculators and thereby hurt reviews and business. Sometimes, too, special agents sell these previews for benefits, thereby paying off some of the initial production costs.

In certain cases, these seats are numbered, but in other cases when the slogan is "First come, first served," the theatre becomes a madhouse with everyone rushing for an aisle seat, no matter who is trampled under foot.

Once Florenz Ziegfeld, Jr., broke theatrical precedents by giving away all the seats in the Ziegfeld Theatre for a regular, scheduled performance during the highly successful run of "Rio Rita." The occasion was Lindbergh's takeoff when he expressed the hope that on his return he might see the musical. This request Ziegfeld remembered, and when the flyer returned, he put on the celebration. And not content with providing free seats, the Glorifier served refreshments between the acts.

Soon after the market crash, a new racket developed on Broadway. People received oral or printed invitations to see certain shows for nothing. But when they arrived at the theatre, they discovered to their surprise, that they had to pay 50 or 75 cents "Government" tax. Some of this money the producer pocketed, allegedly, to keep the show running. ("Service" charges on passes have been quite a windfall for managements.)

Keeping shows running i this manner is seldom possible now for the simple reason that newspaper criticism is so destructive that poor shows usually close after one or two performances.

During World War II Broadway was generous in giving free tickets to service men and women. The Stage Door Canteen distributed these largely through a central office, where the long line of uniformed applicants, eager for a sight of the footlights, made a colorful and touching picture.

Strictly From Cartier

The most elaborate tickets ever given out for a first night were the gift of A. L. Erlanger in honor of the opening of the theatre which once bore his name. They were gold-plated and mailed together with pasteboard duplicates in small flannel envelopes like those used for silverware.

When "Life with Father" attained its fifth anniversary, the producer, Oscar Serli and the authors, Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse, gave away not only free tickets for the last performance, but threw in, also, a free champagne supper for the entire audience.

Memorable also was the opening of "South Pacific." The guests received free copies of the morning papers and while they dined and drank at the expense of the producers, they learned, simultaneously, what the critics thought of the entertainment.

Among the many legends dealing with the boxoffice there is one that concerns the Messrs. Shubert and the old Studebaker Theatre in Chicago. When the Shuberts boughts this historic playhouse they discovered, to their horror, the following sign over the marquee:

ALL PASSES
ONLY ART ENDURES

But the sign did not remain there long. It was obliterated the morning after the purchase.

In summing up the pass nuisance, Marcus Heiman, veteran theatrical man, remarks: "Show business is the only business that gives away what it sells."

This Is the Day of Another Vanishing American—the Producer-Manager

By RALPH T. KETTERING

Chicago.

Once upon a time there were a round dozen daring, resourceful, understanding showmen sometimes referred to "producing managers." Each maintained an office, generally in a theatre he owned or leased and which he operated as a mandarin-king.

Ralph Kettering

It is not difficult to remember the names of these producing managers. There were Charles Frohman, his brother Daniel, Abe Erlanger, Flo Ziegfeld, George White, Earl Carroll, Sam H. Harris, A. H. Woods, Winthrop Ames, Charles B. Dillingham, Lee Shubert and George Tyler. For good measure toss in Henry B. Harris, Wagenshal & Kemper and a few actor-managers like James K. Hackett, Robert B. Mantell, Fritz Leiber, Otis Skinner and Walker Whiteside. Then, there were Amelia Bingham, Mrs. Fiske and Blanche Walsh on the distaff side. One might permit memorabilia to bring "on stage" many more. But I believe I have made my point.

Each operated or owned theatres and produced plays. In their general office they employed a large staff, including a general manager who looked after business details. A booking manager did nothing but work on routes, seeing that consecutive time was had to reduce costs in touring. A general press representative wrote and distributed the needed puffs and always issued a weekly or monthly press sheet to every drama critic in the land. A play-reader was constantly browsing through every manuscript sent in and, after discarding those that were impossible for production, recommended some for " ight-reading" by the producing manager.

Producer Made Final Decision

It was the producing manager who made the final decision and, when made, it was he who invested his own money. Sometimes he invited a friend to invest or let "K & E" or the Shuberts take a piece. But, even in such cases, it was he who had the most to lose. He was the pivot around which the business spun. His was the sole responsibility for success or failure.

Generally he was an astute businessman as well artiste, and so he was most careful. Besides, it was his money. He had a reputation to uphold, and when he sent forth a production his name was at the masthead and he presented his best effort. It had to succeed. That is why the names I have listed herein were important and meant so much to show biz.

But I am fearful that I have pointed out a "vanishing American." No longer are there the dozens of great theatrical offices, staffed by employees working for the one producer exclusively and for no one else. No longer are theatres owned, leased or operated by producing managers.

Let's look at what has happened.

An author writes a play. He takes it to a lawyer friend. The lawyer telephones a few clients. Together they get the needed bankroll. Then, they hire a general manager who may be working for two, three or even more other fellows in the same capacity. This general manager, with a bit of advice from the author which is not asked for or wanted, orders a production built and painted, and hires actors. He goes over to see Elias or Gus and pencils in a proposed route. Most likely it will start in New Haven, include a week in Philadelphia and, if this pre-Broadway booking holds promise but not security, the show may jump to Detroit, Toronto, Omaha or even Kansas City. Where it will go from there is anyone's guess. Consecutive time to reduce costs of touring is not considered. What's the difference? If it flops—well, that's that. If it hits costs mean nothing in getting into a mainstem theatre.

P.A. May Work for Several

The press agent may work for three or four different shows at one and the same time. He hires some assistants to help and they all concentrate on Broadway. The hinterland drama editors must subscribe to at least two New York dailies to find out what goes. Those days when he could look over a dozen or more press sheets from a general press representative and clip items are gone forever.

Out my way, in Chicago, we only hear of a few producing managers. We know there are The Theatre Guild, Rodgers & Hammerstein and some others, because they send shows our way and we read their names in the drama columns. But we know little about what they intend to send us in the future. Plays that are smashes on Broadway find mention in road city columns. The others, booked in on a fortnight's notice, are only listed when the advance agent arrives in town. What is true of Chicago is true of every road city.

Operating theatres is now a real estate matter. Producing shows is a gambling game. Costs are higher, which discourages new producers and new authors. Most of the musicals come from one or two sets of collaborators. Likewise the non-musicals. Strawhats offer the only basis for learning how to act or write. Unless, of course, you think TV the better medium for your talent.

Tix Hassle, Old Tale With New Twists, Still Showing No Sign of B'way Solution

By HOBE MORRISON

In the theatre, at least, the expression should be, "As certain as death, taxes and the ticket problem." No matter what else may happen, agitation over tickets is, like the poor, always with us. It's the one exception to the truism that there's nothing wrong with the theatre that a hit won't cure. In the case of a hit, the ticket problem really comes into its own.

Probably there's been a ticket problem as long as there's been a theatre—and "theatre" in this instance includes the Roman chariot races and gladiatorial contests. Recently some research-minded observer unearthed the fact that during the last century, when Charles Dickens was to give one of his readings, there was a public outcry because scalpers had cornered the ticket supply—doubless by distribution of whatever they called "ice" in those days. ("Ice" is the extra-legal money paid by brokers for tickets).

The clamor about tickets is usually loudest when a hit is involved, as witness the furore (including the probe by the then N. Y. License Commissioner John M. Murtagh, and the consequent revocation of broker licenses) nearly three years ago over "South Pacific." But the problem is both more commonplace and painful for the management of a non-hit show—when the reverse difficulty is how to dispose of too many tickets. The solution of how to get an unlimited supply of tickets to a show everyone wants to see continues to stump even the self-appointed experts outside the trade.

Rubber Walls

Until someone makes good the old gag about a theatre with rubber walls, the problem of insufficient tickets for smash hits just won't fade away. The same people who squawk the loudest about inability to get tickets for the smashes are the ones who insist upon going during the first weeks of a run, and thereby create the demand.

There are several courses open to this impatient public. It can get tickets in advance by mail order, taking a chance that the show will be a hit. It can buy through clubs or benefit party organizations and take the flops with the hits. It can play safe, wait for the reviews of the show and then wait to get tickets. Or it can wait for the reviews and, by paying the black-market price, patronize a scalper and satisfy the craving to be among the early birds who brag to their friends. Or, if in that still-fairly-select strata of menaces with an "in," the eager legiters can impose on their strategically-placed acquaintances to get "house seats."

'House Seat' Bogey

A few words about "house seats." To those called upon to obtain these tickets, it's a puzzle how brokers manage to stay in business any more, since apparently everyone seems to have an " " for house seats and only a "square" patronizes an agency nowadays. It's curious, too, that practically nobody seems to go to the theatre in couples these days—people who ask for house seats always need four. And, as has become a stale jest in the trade, everyone who wants tickets for a hit is celebrating an anniversary or his wife's birthday, which through some curious circumstance he knew about only three days in advance.

Clubs, which a couple of seasons ago seemed likely to improve at least a few aspects of the ticket problem, have not borne out that hope, and have apparently become snarled in special difficulties of their own—in the case of Show-of-the-Month Club this has taken the form of inability to get allotments to shows playing Shubert houses. But a more basic problem for the clubs is that in order to get seats for the hits (which, if they are to exist, they must give their members), they must buy in advance, which involves heavy financial risk.

Although no one thinks benefit theatre parties are ideal, least of all the party agents, this form of group distribution continues to grow, so it presumably meets a need. Frequently-mentioned faults of the party setup are that audiences tend to be unresponsive, that heavy party bookings tend to shut out the regular public and the broker trade for the early part of a run, and that patrons are overcharged. Lately, the party agents themselves have been given more than the usual headaches from the system by the postponement of opening dates and the necessity of rearranging bookings, and by the growing number of house seats withheld by managements.

Advance Orders

A relatively new development in the ticket situation is the accent on advance mail orders. In the last few seasons, with the knowledge that seats for hits will be scarce and high-priced for months after the opening, legit fans have tended more and more to order in advance by mail. This trend has become so marked that extra-space display ads in the Sunday drama pages, specifically designed to evoke mail orders, have become commonplace. In the case of the current "King and I," such ads were inserted nearly six weeks before the opening, and in the case of the forthcoming "Venus Observed" they first appeared more than 10 weeks ahead.

Producer Leland Hayward, by ingenious use of orders for previous shows, has built up a valuable mailing list through which he solicits advance buying from former patrons. By these and other devices, plus the fact that theatre treasurers have generally been far-seeing enough to send desirable locations to advance mail order patrons, this form of advance "insurance" has grown enormously in recent years. It has not, despite enthusiastic pressagentry, reached the $1,000,000 level for any show, but in some instances as much as $300,000 or $400,000 has been sold by advance mail order.

The idea of a central ticket office, urged by various trade figures a couple of seasons ago, hasn't been heard much lately. Such a setup apparently involves too many difficulties to be feasible, at least until the plight of the theatre in general becomes more critical. Admittedly, no form of such a system could create more tickets for hits, but might increase business for the intermediate draws and perhaps even for the flops. However, no one in the theatre is interested much in improving the lot of the borderline shows—everyone thinks in terms of hits.

While other issues wax and wane as topics of discussion in the endless babble about theatre tickets, the brokers continue to be the top subject of controversy. The Murtagh probe, which brought the agencies into Page One prominence for a while, seems to have had little other effect. Within the last year the brokers have obtained an increase from 75c to $1 (exclusive of tax) in the legal per-ticket fee, but it's generally assumed in the trade that a major part of agency revenue comes from over-the-limit sales.

Similarly, it's commonly believed in the trade that most boxoffice personnel get "ice," but while virtually everyone piously condemns the practice, certain cynical observers claim that a large percentage of house managers, company managers, general managers and even some of the fairly eminent producers share in the proceeds. Also, there has been no move to pay boxoffice men more than the union scale of $115 for treasurers and $95 for assistants, which is approximate starvation level considering that these employees are paid only when the theatre is lighted.

Own Competition

Some brokers argue that the theatre is practically the only business which operates in competition with its sales organization. By this they mean that producers and theatre owners allow no commission on agency sales and thus undersell them at the boxoffice. For the $1 fee, brokers are expected to carry charge accounts, deliver tickets, push lesser draws in preference to the hits, keep almost impossibly complicated accounts, "eat" unsold seats to hits (on penalty of having their allotments cut), support a fund to police themselves and, under the new setup, make speculative advance "buys" of incoming shows.

Whether the broker problem would be much improved by giving the agencies a per-ticket commission or fee and setting ticket prices the same at both the boxoffice and the brokers, is a question nobody has tried to put to the test. Also, suggestions that much of the speculative aspect of the ticket situation would be eliminated if lower-floor seats were scaled, have not been tried. Several producers and theatre owners advocate such a policy, but most people in the trade dismiss the idea as "impractical" or even "impossible." That it might drastically reduce house seat requests for the devils who have unwillingly become virtual "brokers" in the field is an intriguing prospect.

There is almost constant agitation, particularly from letters-to-the-editor writers, about allegedly high ticket prices. Yet the price of theatre tickets has, for the most part, risen only 33% in the last 20 years, while the general price level (including the theatre production and operating costs) has multiplied several times in the same period. In the case of musicals, the price of tickets today is, in many cases, actually below that of 20-odd years ago.

It is this dilemma of ever-rising costs and static revenue that worries and discourages those in the trade. A manufacturer or merchant, affected by rising costs, can increase circulation and/or raise prices. But the producer or theatre owner can do neither. He cannot expand the walls of the theatre (although in a few cases more seats have been crowded into the same space); he cannot increase the number of performances, and he's already being bombarded with claims that ticket prices are too high, so he faces violent protest and perhaps even a decrease in actual revenue if he raises the admission scale.

However, despite agitation (some of it seemingly on the assumption that some sort of moral or ethical principle is involved), minor price boosts are being made. For example, the scale for musicals, which was generally $4.80 (including tax) about 10 years ago and has more recently been $6 and in many cases, is now $6.60 or $7.20. For non-musicals, the old $3.60 rate was changed some seasons ago to $4.80, and is now creeping up to $5.40 and $6 for weekend nights.

There has been, inevitably, considerable clamor over this trend. But there has been no clearly defined resistance. The traditional boxoffice man's observation, "They'll pay anything for a hit, but they won't take a flop as gift," grows truer each season. Thus, "King and I," with a $7.20 top, has been consistently the most-in-demand ticket for many months, while numerous $6 musicals, and a few pop-priced ones, have quickly withered and disappeared in the face of public indifference. Same is true of the shows with a $6 top weekends. And, of course, there's the Laurence Olivier-Vivien Leigh dual-revival of "Caesar and Cleopatra" and "Antony and Cleopatra," which was about 80% sold out in advance, despite the $7.20 top and the fact that most orders included both shows, which doubles the total outlay.

In connection with the ticket price situation, the case is recalled of a top straight play smash of several seasons ago. Having in mind the agitation of letters-to-the-editor writers who wail about the obligation of producers to allow for impecunious drama-lovers, the management set aside one row of top-balcony seats at $1.20. For several weeks those locations were invariably the last to be sold and frequently brought demands for refunds because of bad sight lines or inaudibility. So the price for those seats was increased to $2.40, the same as the other locations in that section. Whereupon there was no longer as much trouble in selling them and practically no complaints about sight lines or inaudibility.

A B'way Pooch Passes

By JOHN BYRAM

When he died his obituary did not appear in the N. Y. Times, nor did VARIETY note his passing. Broadway continued on its restless, turbulent way, with only a few realizing that a character who had been identified with it for many years was no longer making his daily and nightly rounds of the Fifties.

Whiskey was a theatre dog, one of a chosen and, presumably, fortunate breed. He was not a star like the talented performer in "Top Banana," but, without ever having appeared in public, his whole life was linked with the stage and its people. In early puppy days, this Sealyham, who always had trouble keeping his whiteness unsullied by the Broadway grime, was introduced to the easy going life of the theatre. Jean Muir bought him in England and took him to California with her. When she went back to London and was faced with a problem of putting him in quarantine for six months, she gave Whiskey to my wife.

At that time, Whiskey, just emerging from puppyhood, had been a Hollywood dog, but he soon learned Times Square ways. He began his career in New York by growling at noted playwright, snapping at a film executive, leaping after a sailor on the Bremen, obviously a Nazi, and picking a quarrel with a waiter in a theatrical restaurant. In these days Whiskey was as cocky as George M. Cohan was in his youth, and he was always ready for an argument or to do the expected unexpectedly. "All dogs love me," said Gertrude Lawrence, reaching out for a pat. "Grrr," replied Whiskey, possibly not realizing that he was trying to take the hand off of one of the most valuable properties in show business.

As he grew older, it developed that he was not bad tempered, but temperamental, as stage folk are expected to be. His critical abilities improved but he was no less forceful expressing them. Always of an independent turn of mind, he once disagreed with the famous dramatic critic, to the drastic disarrangement of the critic's pants. At first he loved to tear pages out of or muss up any playscript that happened to be lying around, but later he grew quite selective. In time only the really bad ones suffered from the depredations of his teeth and paws. However, around the theatre a slightly sooty Whiskey, tail wagging and his whiskers parted a la Charles Evans Hughes, was nothing less than angelic. He never interfered with a rehearsal, no matter how long or how tiresome, and he never tried to stop an actor in the performance of his duty. The necessity for discipline backstage seemed to impress him as much as it did the others.

Whiskey easily adapted himself to the irregular hours of the stage. Firmly leashed to my wife, he would walk around town at all hours of the day or night. He was as willing to stroll at the unreasonable hour of 8 a.m., if necessity required it, as at the more normal hour of 2 a.m. Though he spent 15 years in the theatrical district, with 55th Street as his headquarters, he was not an untravelled dog. He had been to England, California, Florida, and on several tours with plays through the east and middle west. Solely through his efforts all dogs were barred by the Ambassador East in Chicago. Among tryout towns he liked Boston best, but he did not care much for Pittsburgh. He was built too low to the ground for comfort there.

Theatre dogs are, I suppose, a very special type even among city canines. They are pampered and spoiled, but they also develop uniqueness of personality. The whole neighborhood knew Whiskey, and he regarded it as his special domain. A hit at the Ziegfeld brought him joy—too bad he couldn't have lived to see the citement caused by the Oliviers—and he was always glad to see the opera doing well at City Center though it created traffic problems for him. En route to the park he would usually pause to observe the billing at the Century. His influence on the American drama was a small and, perhaps, negative one, but it did manage to make itself felt, sometimes rather emphatically. Those who knew Whiskey and miss him feel that in his own tiny way he contributed to the general picture of the theatrical business in New York and that something has gone out of it with his passing.

Autres Temps, Autres Chants

By SIR CHARLES COCHRAN*

A dedication on a fly-leaf recalled to the great showman a springtime in Paris when he was 40 years younger but just as much in love with the theatre.

On the fly-leaf was an inscription:

"This posthumous book dedicated in the spirit of its author and in her remembrance to Charles B. Cochran, Paris, July, 1947, Sympathetically, Dr. M. Schiller."

Some early memories, some youthful impressions, are ineffaceable; they retain their vividness and color through the years, fresh and unimpaired, while more recent periences become faint and blurred.

So it is that the excitement and interest of my first brief visit to the Paris I was later to know so well remain unfaded, and I can recall without an effort the sights and scenes which stirred me when I first discovered the capital city in my enthusiastic youth in the year 1891.

In a sense, I was lucky in my period, for great figures were about, and great reputations were in the making in the world of that theatre that I love.

Not long ago there came to me from Paris a recently published book entitled "Autres Temps-Autres Chants."

The author was the late Yvette Guilbert and the sender of the book her husband, Dr. M. Schiller, with whom I began corresponding as long ago as the early '90s, when I was secretary to Richard Mansfield in America.

What memories have been evoked by this book! Le Chat Noir, founded and directed by Rodolphe Salis, which I had the rare privilege of visiting, upon my first visit to Paris, with a young English painter who was studying at the famous Academie Julian—it was here that I saw the mbres chinoises; it was here that Maurice Donnay held Paris under his spell with his witty text to the silhouettes cut by Caran d'Ache and shown on a small screen.

A Previous Experience

To be reminded by Typsa, Bruant, Leandre, Steinlen, Willette and Lautrec gives me feeling of having joyed a previous existence. I cannot recognize, in the old showman I am, any connection with the enthusiastic youngster who discovered Montmartre as a world apart from anything he had known until then or is likely to know again. Notwithstanding the chaotic upheaval of life generally in every form and in every place, I cannot imagine any quartier so shabbily treated by Time as Montmartre. Although many of the landmarks remain in 1951, as they were in 1892, the spirit of spontaneous gaiety is no more.

Although I did not meet Yvette Guilbert until about 1910, I had the good fortune to see her and the good judgment to be so impressed by her performance on the second night of my very first visit to Paris to mark well her name and to watch her career. It was at the Moulin Rouge, which all English visitors made for in the early 1890s. I was attracted by the gay posters of Cheret, carried by sandwich-board men and exhibited on the kiosks of the boulevards. The great attraction of the Moulin was the Bal, with the chahut danced by La Goulue, La Mome Fromage, Rayon d'Or and Jan Avril. La Goulue was generally partnered by a cadaverous-looking man in a tall hat, tight jacket and tight trousers, called Valentin le Desosse.. Valentin always kept his hat on and it was a current joke that La Goulue was the only person in Paris who had ever seen Valentin with his head uncovered.

A British Lampoon

To amuse early-comers, there was a cafe-concert from 8-9. Fortunately, my friend and I arrived in time for this, and there I saw Yvette Guilbert for the first time. She was dressed as an English nurse, with false projecting teeth—the characteristic indication of an Englishwoman on the French comic stage of the period. It was cruel satire, but that it was the perfection of caricature and the work of an exceptional artist was obvious even to the inexperienced but stage-struck youth of 20 that I was at the time.

At the same time, Yvette was appearing at Le Divan Japonois, a little place in the Rue des Martyrs. A few nights later I saw her there, where she wore the plai dress, long black gloves, long bare neck and red chignon as shown in the famous poster by Toulouse-Lautrec. Yvette must have been about 26 at this time and she has told in her book that, with the two engagements, she was earning the sum of about 1,200 francs ($144) a month.

She had started her professional career, some six or seven years before I saw her at the Moulin Rouge, as an actress at the Theatre des Bouffes-du-Nord. She passed from one theatre to another, until she arrived at the Varietes where she began to make some mark with the public. The small fry of the theatre were poorly paid and out of their meagre salaries had to buy their own dresses, generally by installments. So "poor but honest" actresses were constantly in debt. Yvette's salary was 250 francs ($30) a month in the theatre, even when she began to be given good parts to play. Her diction was admirable, and she knew many songs which her companions of the theatre delighted to hear her sing when the company went on tour. There was in the company an actor named Barol, who asked her one day why she didn't try the cafe-concert. "Your voice isn't good enough for operetta," he said, but he assured her that she could start with four times her theatre salary at L'Eldorado, often styled "La Comedie Francaise de la Chason," where later Mistinguette became and remained the darling of the establishment for several years. And so, at the finish of the tour, Yvette gave an audition to the directress of L'Eldorado, Mme. Allemand. Finally, after a long discussion, the coveted engagement was secured at 600 francs ($72) a month.

It was September, and she was to make her debut in November. Looking for songs at a publisher's, she encountered the manager of the Casino in Lyons who needed an artist for 10 days. "She must be pretty," said the director to the publisher.

With her heart beating fast, Yvette plucked up courage to butt into the conversation. "I'm not pretty," she said, "but I come from the Varietes, the ultra-chic theatre of the boulevards, and here is my contract for L'Eldorado next season."

The manager from Lyons, seeing the salary in the contract and being at his wits' end, engaged Yvette at a salary of 40 francs ($5) a day and return fares, Paris to Lyons.

On the first night, waiting in the wings for her first appearance, she heard the tremendous applause for a very gross comedienne, the last word in banal vulgarity, who was at the moment on the stage. At the end of the turn, the more the applause gained strength, the more Yvette's courage failed her. There was a male singer before her, and then Yvette took the stage, to be greeted with yells of: "Oh! Oh! She's skinny—she looks as if she'd left her ——s in her trunk!"

The uproar was so bad that she had to quit the stage without getting through one song. The director was kind but endeavored to impress upon her that his casino was not the Comedie Francaise. "My stage isn't a drawing-room," he said, "and you can't sing in a music-hall standing still without moving your arms and legs." The next night was another horrible ordeal as the fiasco had been discussed in the cafes and in the press. For five insufferable nights she was ridiculed immediately she stepped upon the stage.

The director paid Yvette for the full 10 days, although she only appeared for five, and begged her not to insist on working out her contract. Despite her chagrin, Yvette had a long and confidential talk with M. Verdellet, the director of the Casino. "Your cafe-concert is demode, ugly, common and stupid," she told him, "but remember my name, and you will see that I will raise the quality of the French cafe-concert and, before a year, I will return here at 1,200 francs ($144) a night instead of 1,200 francs a month!" The director thought she was crazy, and begged her to give up all idea of the cafe-concert as career, and to return to the Varietes, or some other good theatre.

The night before she left Lyons, unable to sleep, she wrote the words of a song which became the foundation of her career—it was called "La Pocharde." Eleven months after the debacle at Lyons, Yvette gained her 1,200 francs ($144) a performance, but there was a hard road to travel first. At L'Eldorado, Yvette was greeted with silence—after two songs she left the stage without a single hand. She overheard the famous Jeanne Bloch, billed as La Chanteuse Colosse, cry out: "She's as skinny as two Englishwomen—and she wants to be funny!" I saw this great Bloch many times in Paris; Sickert, Ibels, and several other artists have immortalized her.

At first Yvette was given the 10 o'clock place on the program, but very soon she was made to start the show, before anybody was in the hall. At the end of the month she left L'Eldorado, with the same parting shot to Mme. Allemand that she had fired at M. Verdellet at Lyons.

Prophecy

"You will come to me," said Yvette, "to offer me per night what you have paid me for a month." And so it was! In 1892, when Yvette had saved the Concert Parisien from bankruptcy, Mme. Allemand, who at that time (as Mme. March did later) ran La Scala as well as L'Eldorado, offered her 500 francs ($60) per performance; Yvette reminded the directress of what she had told her on leaving L'Eldorado, that her price to sing for her would be 600 francs a night. The contract was signed at that figure. From 1892 to 1895 Yvette sang at La Scala at 600 francs ($72) per performance. At the conclusion a new contract was made with Marchand (Mme. Allemand's son-in-law) for another three years at 800 francs ($96) a performance.

During these years Yvette had certain months free from La Scala for engagements in the big towns of France or abroad. It was during the engagement at La Scala that she sang at a party given by Mrs. Ogden Goelet at Cannes to entertain the Prince of Wales (later Edward VII), for a fee of 15,000 francs ($1,800). For nine years she sang during the summer at Les Ambassadeurs—then a most charming garden restaurant theatre—two months each year for 50,000 francs ($6,000).

The history of Yvette Guilbert in the music-hall (cafe-concert) is unique. She invaded a territory where grossness and vulgarity were rampant, with songs of Xanroff, Richepin, Aristide Bruant, Jeann Lorrai, Maurice Donnay, and other men of letters, and she certainly made no concessions to her audiences.

Yvette has called this period of her life a martyrdom. Her success with the public left her cold. When illness enabled her to cancel her music-hall contracts she determined to realize a long held ambition; and then began, after much study and research, those unforgettable renderings by a supreme artist which put, at last, la chanson de France on its proper pedestal.

WHY EQUITY?

By BERT LYTELL

So often the young people of our theatre ask me, "Why is it necessary to have Equity? Why do actors need union? We cannot be standardized like bricklayers or stone masons." And I always answer them with this little story which I now direct to all junior Equity members, and those who are not in this category might just as well get out of show business.

At the ripe old age of 17 I was the call boy, the assistant stage manager and the jack-of-all-trades in the Columbia Theatre Stock Co., Newark. My duties included holding the prompt book, going out with the property man to gather in all movable props, furniture, etc., make an inventory with the carpenter of all expenditures for canvas, paint or lumber, and on Saturday night, after the show, to go out with the two billposters who carried a set of skeleton keys and opened up any vacant store so they could place their lithographs in said store window. If we infringed on the territory of an opposition theatre, we frequently ended up in a fist fight, and all this labor meant seven days a week, 16 daily hours work, for which I received $12!

In those days actors received no salary for any holiday matinee; the week before Christmas and Holy Week they all worked for half salary, irrespective of how good the business might be. And in addition, in stock, you hired your own costumes and your wigs whenever a costume play was done.

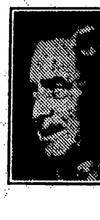
This story entails the time we played "Madame Sans Gene." I played four parts, had two wigs. Each costume was rented for $2.50, and the wigs cost $1 each, so at the end of the week I had no salary at all coming to me. I went into the manager's office, told him my plight and he thoughtfully looked at the ceiling and said, "Well, how much do you pay for room and board at Brady's Boarding House?" I said, "$7 a week." He said, "Here you are, son, here's your $7." I went out of that office thinking that he was the most generous man in show business.

I think there is a comical side to this yarn, but it also shrould be a pretty good answer as to why you have an Actors Equity.

Let's Hear The Words

By PHIL DUNNING

The old codgers in the theatre might as well get it through their noggins that there's a lot of changes in our world today, and in contemplating those changes it's interesting to note that one of the biggest hits of the season is swinging merrily along sans scenery, sans stagehands, sans costumes and makeup—sans everything except some good words woven into a fine play and a cast of talented artists to read those words.



There's food for thought in the idea that before a Broadway producer goes headlong into a costly production with a new legit play, it would save him and everyone else connected with the venture a lot of time, money and heartaches if he and the playwright heard a first-class cast read the script first. Let them listen to it read a dozen times with a packed house and get the reaction of the audience. Let's hear the words.

Back in the days when it only cost a mere $10,000-12,000 to ring up on a new play, a producer could afford to indulge in the luxury of an occasional failure without serious damage to his professional standing. But when it takes in the neighborhood of $70,000, as it often does today, that's pennies out of a different piggy bank, and the producer of a flop is likely to find that his backers have switched off their hearing-aid batteries next time he approaches them with a new script. With the tight production budget that most plays operate under today, there is no margin for error, and once a play goes into rehearsal and scenery, props, costume and theatre are contracted for, then the play must open as per schedule.

Usually a play is in rehearsal for three or four days before the playwright and the producer discover its weaknesses. They realize that it should be closed for doctoring and recasting, but that ole debbil budget doesn't permit of postponements or delays. There's no turning back. And so the play is brought into town before it's half ready, with new lines being rehearsed right up to curtain time opening night. It opens, it's panned, it closes. Hopes, dreams and a sizeable fortune go right down the old drainpipe. Chances are, everyone connected with it will recover, lick their wounds and go through the same routine with the next play. It's the same old story of hit or miss, season after season in the legitimate theatre.

An Uncertain Biz

Show business is such an uncertain business for the playwright, the actor and the producer. You wonder why anyone in his right mind ever picked such a dizzy business. There are so many things that can go wrong in the production of a new play. There are so many ways for it to fail. The playwright makes a terrific gamble. He may spend anywhere from six months to two years on a play that will never earn him a plugged nickel.

The actor takes a sizeable gamble, too. When he signs his contract he's gambling his professional reputation on the judgment of the playwright, the producer or the director. He's vulnerable to an unmerciful panning from critics for speaking lines for which he's in no way responsible. As for the producer—well, it's only somebody else's money—and his heart's blood that's at stake. Certainly some new method must be found to minimize this gamble. And it would be an enormous help to the playwright, the actor and the producer if they had an opportunity to hear the play read by a top cast to get an audience reaction before it's rushed into production.

The enormous success of Shaw's "Don Juan in Hell," without scenery, without production—just a good cast seated on stools on a bare stage reading their scripts from lecterns is the method that could be used as a model for future play producing. Every playwright doesn't have to be a George Bernard Shaw, every actor doesn't have to be a Charles Laughton to make the scheme practical. There are a great many playwrights with unproduced plays worthy of a hearing. There are a great many fine actors who deserve to be on the speaking stage. And there are a great many keen producers who deserve hits. There are plenty of legit theatres that could be had for readings at odd hours. The playwright's advance, the reading salary for the first class cast and the thaatre charges wouldn't total more than a thousand or two for a week of readings. Surely it would be worth that much to hear some constructive criticism at a time when it would really do some good.

Yes, let's hear the words first. The line forms on the right—no crowding, please!

Teutonic Hangover

Peter Davis, of the Theatre Guild, while in Berlin recently, ordered a "very dry martini," in a German restaurant one afternoon. The waiter looked at him sharply and in a quizzical tone said, "Drei?" (pronounced dry). Davis said, "Not so dry, but dry." So he got "drei" martinis—three of them. It took a little time to put two and two together and discover that drei, pronounced dry, is three in German.

'Square Deal' Grady And The Ingrate Barytone

By BILLY GRADY

Hollywood.

And then there was the time I had dinner with Caruso at the Knickerbocker Hotel, N. Y. I had dinner—there were about 200 other people there. I had been a beer and pretzel man up to this time, but, on this occasion, I took a slug of the grape, and the grape took a slug at me. I had to have air, and made a very dignified exit. Dignified—I tipped a glass of water into Lillian Russell's lap, and stepped on a pet bunion of Richard Carle's. He let out a yelp you could hear down to Union Square.

I lived at the Green Room Club on 47th street. Lived? I shared a dormitory with Jimmy Hussey, Frank Westphal, Otto Kruger and Sid Wilmer's pet parrot. The first up in the morning wore the best suit and shirt.

Upon leaving the Knickerbocker Hotel, I got bolloxed up and went downtown instead of uptown. Arriving in front of the Casino, I found the audience just going back for the second act. I joined them more to get out of the cold than anything else. As I entered the rear orchestra, the maestro poised his arm for the downbeat, but a male voice in the chorus let out with a premature note. It was a beaut, as clear and resonant as I have ever heard. Grady, the agent, was now going to work. I went backstage, waited and met my man. He was a goodlooking lug, sang in the choir over in Weehawken, and was chorusing to finish singing lessons. I invited him to my office next day. My office—I shared it with George Choos, two writers, a dance director and a musician. Last one out turned out the lights.

My man singer came in. I took him to Ziegfeld. From $35 at the Casino, he is now $750 for Ziegfeld. Voom, the dames, voom a new car, voom a cutey from the dancing chorus. Raus went the guy's wife.

Had a pretty habit of writing letters in poetry to the dancing cutie. Very sexy poetry. Very sexy gal.

Finishing the season with Ziegfeld, I sold my chirper to Dillingham, now getting $1,350. Voom a new car, voom big apartment, voom a lawyer to keep him out of trouble.

Came a Hollywood star gal to a matinee. She sought an intro. Voom, they are that way. The dancing cutey with the poetry catches them, runs to a newspaper syndicate with the letters of my now star singer. She asks $10,000. The head of the syndicate, a friend of mine, read them, pushed three buttons off his vest and offered $7,500. Cutey took it and left the billet-doux.

Mr. Newspaperman calls me. "If I publish these, it will make a monkey out of your barytone. You better buy them and get 'em out of circulation."

Me buy 'em. If I had $7,500, I would have made a play for Lillian Russell, and that was playing.

Costly Love Words

Well, I went to my baritone, told him of the status quo. Must have $7,500 for the Omar Khayams. My man didn't have a dime. He went to Dillingham and C. B. loaned him $5,000 against his salary. My man is now $2,500 short, and he looked at me with his one good eye. Well, altar-boy-like, I went into the highways and byways on the dig for $2,500.

I had a rich uncle, a midget. He was as rich as the phony dice he threw in his last crap game. He loaned me the money. For a long time people asked me where my two gold teeth were.

I gave the $2,500 to the singer and with his $5,000, we had a helluva time at a burning party. Burning his love poetry to the dancing cute.

For my $2,500 I had a 90-day note. The 90 days went into 120, from 120 to 160. I am now mad. The midget uncle is yelping in a high-pitched voice for his money and I ain't got.

I now resort to the law. I sue the singer and go with a process-server to the theatre to serve my man. I sent my name up, and down comes his valet. It was dark in the alley and the process-server heard the valet talk and said, "Never heard of it before, a lady valet." I struck a match and he apologized for his mistake.

The valet told me the baritone couldn't see me, but inasmuch as it was just before Christmas, he had remembered me with a Christmas present, and forthwith handed me a solid gold cigaret case suitably inscribed, "To Square Deal Grady from His Favorite Star," and no signature.

I turned to the law and told him I was an ungrateful stinker. Here I was suing a guy who thought enough of me to give me an expensive present. My baritone was a wonderful, thoughtful and generous guy. I took the summons, gave the law a sawbuck and bade him a very merry Christmas.

One week later my wonderful, thoughtful and generous star sailed for Europe. He was only on the high seas three days when I got a bill from Hemendinger, the jeweler, for $165—yep—the beautifully inscribed cigaret case.

Opening Nights In New Haven

By HAROLD M. BONE

New Haven.

There was a time when even the U. S. Government felt that an opening night in New Haven was a pretty important thing. That was during World War I, when the campaign to save fuel forced all public places to close down at 11 p. m.

The morale value of good entertainment was so vital that an exception was made in the case of a new show's premiere. Which explained why more than one musical tryout managed to hold the boards at the Shubert Theatre here until the wee small hours as they launched their initial performances.

One of the interesting aspects of first-nights is the backstage reaction of the cast when the final curtain is down. These reactions range from the distinctly audible sigh of relief uttered by the members of "Point of No Return," with a unison that seemed as though it might have been rehearsed, to the hysterical nervous reaction that caused a feminine musical lead to be carried to her dressing room after the final bows were disposed of.

On more than one occasion, with substantial applause still ringing in their ears, first-night troupers have suddenly been confronted onstage by directors who admonished the players "not to let this demonstration go to your heads—we still have plenty of work to do."

Cast elation at the birth of a hit is a heart-warming sight to witness, but being on hand when the curtain comes down on a flop and the players realize that their efforts of weeks have brought forth only an egg, well, that's something else again.

Backstage persiflage, incidentally, is somewhat of a barometer of a play's acceptance within the profession. If only a small contingent of the show biz personalities invariably on hand for a first-night make the backstage pilgrimage to extend stilted "congratulations," then the producers might well look to an early closing of their play. On the other hand, if there is a concerted rush of celebrities filling the atmosphere with gay chit-chat, it's almost a certainty that a hit has just been born.

Tell-Tale of 'South Pacific'

When "South Pacific" opened here, the surge of well-wishers taxed the dressing rooms to such an extent that visitors had to approach their favorites in relays. But when the colossal flop, "Let's Make an Opera," premiered, the backstage area gave the impression of a deserted village.

Of course, the smarter showfolk are not fooled by the little white lies that accompany the premiere of a weak sister. When the final curtain descended on "Miss Quis," a mediocre play which he had authored, Ward Morehouse stood in the Shubert lobby and accepted the verbal bouquets of a host of friends, many of whom had come in from New York for the opening. After the last one had echoed the some lie, Morehouse turned to a reviewer standing nearby and said, "Okay . . . now you tell me truthfully how really bad this play is!"

First-night good luck telegrams often are a source of good humor. When "Fifth Column," starring Franchot Tone, opened here in January, 1940, Billy Rose, who had previously done quite well with his Aquacade at the World's Fair, was one of the play's angels. On opening night, Rose received from Burgess Meredith a wire stating, "Don't worry. If the show goes dull, just flood the stage and put in a springboard."

Joseph Hyman and Bernard Hart were the producers of "Light Up the Sky." Just before the premiere, a telegram arrived for the company. It read, "Our money is on you . . Oiy! . . . is our money on you . Love Joe and Bernie."

Among the cluster of such wires appearing on the backstage bulletin board, occasionally an "outsider" creeps into the group, like the following warning to the preeming "Affairs of State" company regarding its next engagement . . . in Philadelphia: "To Whom It May Concern: The purgative effects of the tap water in Philadelphia may be beneficial, or even necessary, to the inhabitants; but they are usually rough on the visitors. Unless you like challenge in these matters,

Looney Day on Long Island

By CHARLOTTE GREENWOOD

The Mad Hatter's tea party was a sober affair compared to one that inadvertently took place at my Long Island home some years back. Blame it on the weatherman, the parrot, or my weakness for stray cats, but the fact remains that what started out as an innocent little garden party was transformed into hysterical havoc by a series of events that almost set the neighbors scurrying for the nearest straitjacket. But let me go back to the beginning.

"A quiet Sunday afternoon" had been promised my 10 invited guests. Perhaps they doubted this at the outset when they met the pet members of my household, consisting of 13 dogs, two canaries, a parrot named Hester and a nameless stray cat. Still, the scene at lunchtime would have lulled anyone into a false security. The tables near the tennis court were ladened with food. The dogs dozed in the tall grass nearby. The canaries' cage and Hester's iron perch swung from the tree branches overhead. The cat meticulously scrubbed herself in the sun.

And then it happened. One of those sudden Long Island rainstorms blew in from nowhere, heralded by great gusts of wind. Instantly the peace was shattered. Tables overturned and paper plates, napkins and food went flying in all directions. The dogs all began barking at once, and dashed madly among the guests. The perch chain broke under Hester's frantic lunges and she flew out of sight. The bottom dropped out of the canary cage and the two occupants fluttered down into the tall grass below. This latter fact presented the most immediate emergency, for the stray cat had doubtful eating habits. Following my example, all our guests—many of them well-known stage and screen personalities of the day—dropped down on their knees and began combing through the tall grass, emitting periodic "peep, peep" sounds in a scarcely accurate imitation of canary talk. Despite our lack of realism, we found the canaries before the cat did and restored them safely to their cage. Then the dogs were somehow herded into their kennels, the tables righted, and the food partially rescued and carted back to the house. All that remained was to retrieve Hester.

Paging Hester

Under even the most favorable circumstances, this would not have been simple. With the wind blowing and the rain pelting down, it seemed next to impossible. "Charlotte," one of my guests pleaded, "Isn't there some way of calling your parrot? What does she respond to?" I reflected momentarily and then volunteered, "Well, whenever I'm talking on the phone and happen to laugh at something, Hester mimics my laugh until she drowns out the entire conversation!" That did it. The high point of the party was reached immediately. "Pick out a tree, everybody, and pretend you're laughing," ordered a helpful guest.

The scene that followed defies description. Picture, if you can, 10 drenched guests marching from tree to tree, peering up into the branches and laughing hollowly in different keys! My sides still ache, just thinking of it. What the neighbors all thought of it, I can only conjecture—but the one in whose front yard Hester was finally located admitted afterwards that she nearly called the police. "I was certain that those people laughing up my tree in the rain had escaped from somewhere or other," she explained, "but then I recognized you and said to myself, 'Why, they aren't crazy. They're just friends of Charlotte's'!"

And so ended the famous looney day on Long Island—with my guests drying themselves in front of the fire and reliving between belated bites of food the events of the afternoon. And laughing loudest of all, of course, was Hester.

THEATRE TREASURE

By GEORGE FREEDLEY

(Curator, N. Y. Public Library Theatre Collection)

The past year brought its considerable accumulation of books, pictures, posters, programs and other theatrical memorabilia to the N. Y. Public Library's Theatre Collection. In the massive pile behind America's snootiest lions at Fifth Avenue and 42d Street is housed one of the great—and certainly the most widely used—theatre collections of the world.

Mrs. David Warfield contributed generously of material relating to one of America's greatest actors. Mr. Warfield's history from his featured comedian days at Weber & Fields' Music Hall to his great days as a Belasco star is recorded by her gift. No one will ever forget him in "The Music Master" or in "The Return of Peter Grimm" or in his celebrated portrayal of Shylock in which role he quit the stage. The present Belasco Theatre, then the Stuyvesant, was opened by Warfield in 1907 with "A Grand Army Man."

Vaudeville, stock and repertory companies were widely represented in the more than a thousand photographs given by Miss Rosebud Yellow Robe. There were 500 music sheets included as well as several playscripts, manuscripts, programs, clippings and posters.

Mrs. F. Ray Comstock donated programs, photographs, wash drawings and a scrapbook of clippings devoted to an inspection she and her producer-husband made of Japan in 1926. The Takarazuka Opera Co. and the annual Cherry Dance are amply covered.

Mildred H. Core of Washington gave an interesting group of photographs and souvenir albums devoted to Ted Shawn and his dance group. Lester Sweyd made several considerable gifts of typescripts, of produced plays, photographs and programs of non-New York and foreign productions. Thomas Quinn Curtiss presented programs of 1950 and 1951 in Paris, London, and Dublin.

Though a good deal of material had always been received from Julia Marlowe Sothern, trunks of material which had been in storage were turned over to the Library. Promptbooks, playscripts, hundreds of photographs and other memorabilia relating to the great Shakespearean careers of her and her husband, E. H. Sothern, represent a veritable gold mine for the student and historian of the stage alike.

The continued loyalty of local press agents brings contemporary records of the stage while summer playhouses, university and community theatres throughout the nation make this the top spot for theatrical research. Stars and students sit side by side in the reading room, each anonymous and content.

Alfred Lunt Scores Hit As Stager of New Metop Click, 'Cosi Fan Tutte'

The N. Y. Metropolitan Opera put on its third new production of the season last Friday night (28) in Mozart's "Cosi Fan Tutte," and the novelty, or star, of it wasn't even one of the singers—but Alfred Lunt, its director. In his first attempt at putting on an opera, Lunt scored the biggest hit of the evening, staging a production that had the longhair critics throwing kudos in abandon.

It was Page One Stuff for the N. Y. Herald Tribune, which ran three pictures on the opera—all three of them on Lunt. (Lunt appeared in servant's costume at the very start, to light the footlight candles, shush the audience, and usher in the play, before going off to change and to watch the proceedings). In praising production, performance

To the Poor Vanishing Road

By NED ARMSTRONG

(The author is a longtime theatrical publicist)

If everyone in show business could take a New Year's vow, and if he were to pick the one which might do him the most good, he would resolve once and for all to stop wishful-thinking about reviving the road.

The old road is gone. Moreover, the road which all oldtime managers think of as the great road across this continent trouped for years by successful legitimate attractions, has vanished because of changes so vast in the cultural and economic pattern of this country that even the thought of reviving a departed age is irrational.

The healthiest thing to do is to face the facts, and the New Year is as good a time as any for this.

Suppose we examine several traditional favorites:

1 That people can be promoted in some new way to buy theatre tickets.

2 That audiences have been "lost" and must in some manner be "rediscovered," "recreated."

3 That the road has declined for some one great cause, which, if corrected, would restore the theatre outside New York to a semblance of its former glory.

4 That any one of these several things can be accomplished by committee, convention, conference, luncheon, tea, or talk.

In short, some scheme, involving organization, publicity and promotion, has been the nub of traditional approaches to restoring the theatre of the road to a healthy condition in recent years.

And why won't this work?

Plan 1. The scheme to promote the sale of theatre tickets.

Every theatre manager worth his count-up sheet knows that you cannot "promote" the sale of theatre tickets. There is no general formula for selling theatre. You can promote an individual attraction so that the public is given every reasonable opportunity to go. But you cannot stimulate interest in the theatre as a general commodity.

There is no substitute for allure, and there is no device which can successfully compensate for the loss of natural attraction. There was a time when the allure of theatre in the hinterland was so great people attended in droves. Cities such as Pittsburgh, which now has as few as 14 shows in the theatres operating fulltime, and this less than 25 years ago!

What are some of the reasons for this loss of allure?

This country has grown like an overfed infant, and in 50 years has literally progressed intellectually and emotionally through epochs of thinking. By comparison with European cultures, and with previous centuries of human thought, the past 50 years have witnessed in America the stimulation of thought to incredible heights. In short, people throughout the nation have been deluged with dramatic substitutes, emotional stimuli, by popular novel, magazine, motion picture, radio, and now television. The dramatic art, which is that of stirring people emotionally, is no longer the exclusive franchise of the great touring attraction headed by the famous star. Radio hack writers know how to do it, and even the authors of comic books have mastered the trick.

Plan 2 Traditional thinking for reviving the road embraces the thought that something has happened to audiences. People need to be "reeducated," "trained" for theatregoing. "Lost audiences" must be "recaptured."

This is sheer folly. Some people will always go to even the dullest play, but the great theatregoing public will attend en masse only attractions which offer them thrill and excitement—no matter in what package this may be. The less exciting the dramatic fare the less they go, but offer them something they naturally want and your week's stand is sold to capacity.

The less good theatre there is the more audience exists for the few big hits that come along. The word "audience" describes people seated in a theatre: it is not a state of mind, nor a mental attitude. Audiences do not have to be trained, they exist, more of them than ever. But they do have to be given what they want.

Audiences exist throughout the nation, more of them, richer than ever. Smarter than ever, too. Millions read syndicated columns and listen to radio network broadcasts, and they have a sixth sense in picking the winners. Since the competition offered every touring attraction is multiple, since attending a dramatic show is no longer a rare treat, they simply buy what they want and reject the rest. The half-Broadway hit is known in Des Moines months before it arrives, and when it does, it dies. The substitute star, or leading lady, not as good as the original, is known in Kansas City before she arrives, and people stay home.

These are the sad and truthful facts. A great audience exists, eager and willing to buy the unique attraction, but unique means no other like it. Unfortunately, there are too few unique attractions around these days.

NBC Opera Theatre, Legit Menotti Bids Give Proof Of Medium's Mass Growth

By PETER HERMAN ADLER

(NBC Opera Theatre Director)

When 12 years ago, as a newcomer to this country, I asked the late Walter Damrosch about the future of opera in America, this pioneer of music in the U. S. said there wasn't any. But a few years of working and experimenting with opera productions in new fields have given me a considerably less discouraging picture. As a matter of fact, the tempo at which interest for opera in America has increased during the last 10 years, has amazed even the most optimistic observer.

Why does the future of opera today look so different from the way it looked a few years ago? The main reason seems to be that the word "Opera," as most people understand it, is changing its meaning. It used to mean a concert in costume, heavy, forbiddingly expensive, which only a few people could attend, and given in a language which fewer could understand. During the past few years, certain developments have proven a fact which up until now has been buried in the history books—that the word "opera" actually embraces a much larger segment of musical theatre.

For many years, opera in America was synonymous with the Metropolitan. This famous opera house, conceived and founded as a representative home of international grand opera given in the original language, with the greatest international roster of opera stars, by its nature has been restricted to a certain type of grand opera production. (It has always been for the "few"—if you think of America as a country of 150,000,000 inhabitants, where five times as many people attend the Radio City Music Hall in a year as attend all professional grand opera productions in the U. S. put together.)

On the other hand, the general public is beginning to react very favorably to a completely different kind of opera. The sensational successes of (a) Gian-Carlo Menotti's operas on Broadway; (b) the Howard Dietz-Garson Kanin "Fledermaus" at the Metropolitan; and (c) the NBC Television opera productions, all have one thing in common. They are produced according to modern theatrical standards, which means first of all in the language of the country.

Menotti's Broadway productions and our NBC Opera Theatre have another important aspect in common. They do not need the astronomical budget traditionally connected with the category of grand opera, nor do they feature international stars, but instead are cast from a group of young Americans, who are in turn being made stars by these very productions.

Digging in the history books we find that many operas in the standard repertoire were originally conceived as what we would now call "plays with music," produced in a house of moderate size (the average European opera house is about the size of the standard Broadway theatre), where every word could be understood and every gesture could be seen. This type of opera originally had the theatrical impact of a Broadway play. Beaumarchais's "Marriage of Figaro" was the most sensational comedy of its day. Mozart's musical version of this play was, therefore, a theatrical event comparable rather to a Broadway premiere of a Rodgers & Hammerstein production than to the opening night at the Metropolitan. If the American musical theatre succeeds in following this realistic pattern rather than competing with and imitating the Metropolitan (which has a unique place of its own in the cultural life of this country), then the future of opera in America seems bright indeed.

The nationwide response to the NBC Opera Theatre television productions has been so encouraging that NBC's general music director, Samuel Chotzinoff, has seen fit to enlarge our plans considerably.

High on the list is the presentation of new operas. Our first new work, presented on Christmas Eve, was Gian-Carlo Menotti's "Amahl and the Night Visitors," which was specially commissioned by the NBC Opera Theatre.

Of even greater interest are plans to include, in addition to our regular television schedule, opera productions in other media, that is, radio, motion pictures, recordings, and finally live presentations through an opera repertory company which follows this new line.

Theatre Under Canvas, And How It Grew

By ST. JOHN TERRELL

(St. John Terrell, though still a young man, is the pioneer of the under-canvas divertissement known as a Music Circus.)

Lambertville, N. J.

Up until a ago, canvas was good enough for the carnivals, the circus, and the county fair, but anything presented in a tent had little status in polite theatrical circles. Today the billowing big-top no longer smacks of the renegade, and Actors Equity, with its traditionally aloof attitude toward "tent" and "rep" shows, has lately gone on record with an edict assuring "tent" shows the same privileges contained in their "legitimate" stock contracts.

Three years ago I first put a tent on the top of a New Jersey hill, in Lambertville. During the past summer alone 197,000 patrons from a 200-mile radius came here to see musical comedy and operetta presented in the classic arena style.

Billy Bryant, the philosophical showboat captain, once said: "people will go anywhere as long as you have seats," and John Chapman of the N. Y. Daily News admitted that summer stock was enhanced by the opportunity of "walking in the grass at intermission," but, however, or whatever, it must be admitted that the music circus is now an established—and big time—segment of show business.

Some folks say the music sounds better under the big top. Certainly centre staging has approached the ambition of every manager since the beginning of show business to make "every seat a front row seat," for there are only 14 rows around the oval stage of the Lambertville circus, which seats 1,500.

Of course, we do the best we can with our productions, from star, to chorus, to music. Pioneering in this semi-al fresco business has taught the lesson of bypassing the serious availabilities. We forego "The Consul" and "Street Scene," and some of the big musical hits written as "star" vehicles, to favor the strong story line, the basic situation, and the obvious first consideration—a clean, melodic score.

The old standbys like "The Merry Widow," "The Desert Song," "Naughty Marietta" and "Rose Marie" continue to spellbind, as do such carefully written, book-wise recent shows like "Annie Get Your Gun," "Brigadoon" and "Finian's Rainbow."

Sooner or later, with the number of tent shows on the increase, we are going to have to begin the development of shows written especially for central staging presentation. As a matter of fact, before the start of the next Lambertville season, my ambition is to present a few original offerings to include in the schedule.

I have already alerted music schools and colleges around the country, and told them of my problem. New writers and composers are being offered a $1,000 prize if they can create a show that will satisfy the judgment of the music world committee that has been set up to monitor the contest. Perhaps, if we discover a few new writers, we can repay Broadway for supplying us to date by returning a show or two that, via reverse treatment, may be converted to the confines of the traditional theatre.

Come summer, member associates of the music circus will be operating in seven situations from coast to coast, and my No. 1 project will be to launch the first mobile music circus than can play any section of the country with great agility.

People love tent shows, and they love music. I'm glad that the music circus has come along to prove that we can help keep the theatre alive whether in a hilltop wheat field or on West 44th St.

Production Cost 207G on 'Wagon'

"Paint Your Wagon," the Alan Jay Lerner-Frederick Loewe musical at the Shubert, N.Y., involved a production cost of $207,855. In addition, it has $18,780 tied up bonds and tryout losses were $15,309, so the total outlay (exclusive of pre-opening expenses) opening night on Broadway was $241,944.

Production items included $71,788 for sets, props and lighting; $35,198 for costumes, $23,332 for orchestration (subject to $11,300 refund), $5,775 for rental of equipment, $11,500 in advance fees ($5,000 to stager Daniel Mann, $5,000 to choreographer Agnes De Mille, $1,500 to dance music arranger Trude Rittman), $43,352 for rehearsal expenses, $3,805 for publicity and $13,104 for other expenses. Although the Cheryl Crawford production played to virtual capacity during its seven-week tryout in Philly and Boston, it lost money every week, chiefly due to the extensive revisions, which required added rehearsal and other expense.

According to the show's operating setup, star James Barton gets a guarantee of $1,500 a week against 5% of the gross as star, co-authors Lerner and Loewe share 8½%, and Mann and Miss De Mille get 1½% each. The venture was financed at $225,000, plus 10% overcall.

FINAL 'LEAR' LOSS RISES TO $78,000

"King Lear," the Louis Calhern revival produced last season by Robert L. Joseph and Alexander H. Cohen, involved a loss of $78,037, according to a final audit sent to the backers last week. Although the show was financed for $71,500 (including $6,500 overcall), the investors received a return of $1,500, the balance having been put up by the producers when the project ran over the budget.

According to last week's statement, the actual production cost for the revival was $76,038, and the additional deficit was from operation, closing expenses, etc. The offering played 48 performances on Broadway, but was to have toured this season with Calhern again in the title part. Meanwhile, the star had gone to Hollywood on a picture deal, however, and has remained there for additional assignments, so the tour fell through.

ALFRED LUNT and LYNN FONTANNE

Spotty Xmas Week NSG for B'way; Oliviers, 'Juan,' 'Guys,' Fonda SRO, Panned 'Duck' 30G, 'Legend' $14,000

Business on Broadway last week was generally far below expectations. Attendance was highly spotty as some shows bounced away above the previous week, while others slid back a bit further.

Because of the early deadline for this issue, the week's grosses are estimated. Although receipts were better Monday night (24) than anticipated for a Christmas Eve, business sagged Christmas night (Tues.) and was bad at most shows for the Wednesday matinee (26). There was general improvement that night and judging by advance sales and the normal late-week spurt, bullish trade was figured due the balance of the week.

Keys: C (Comedy), D (Drama), CD (Comedy-Drama), R (Revue), MC (Musical Comedy), MD (Musical Drama), O (Operetta).

*Other parenthetic designations refer, respectively, to top price, (indicates using two-for-ones), number of seats, capacity gross and stars. Price includes 20% amusement tax, but grosses are net: exclusive of tax.

"Affairs of State," Music Box (66th wk) (C-$4.80; 1,012; $26,874) (June Havoc). Expected to reach about $16,000 (previous week, under $10,000).

"Call Me Madam," Imperial (63d wk) (MC-$7.20; 1,400; $51,847) (Ethel Merman). Anticipated approximately $48,500 (previous week, was laying off).

"Cleopatras," Ziegfeld (2d wk) (D-$7.20; 1,628; $59,536) (Laurence Olivier, Vivien Leigh). First full week, went clean (standing is not sold) at over $59,500 (previous week, first four performances drew $28,300, plus $10,500 for two paid dress rehearsals).

"Constant Wife," National (4th wk) (C-$4.80-$6; 1,172; $31,000) (Katharine Cornell, Brian Aherne, Grace George). Figured about $25,500 likely (previous week, $26,600).

"Don Juan in Hell," Century (5th wk) (CD-$4.80; 1,645; $41,468) (Charles Boyer, Charles Laughton, Cedric Hardwicke, Agnes Moorehead). Over $41,500 thought probable (previous week, $41,400); was scheduled to close Monday night (31) after 40 performances, but returns March 30 for another limited engagement.

"Fourposter," Barrymore (10th wk) (C-$4.80; 1,060; $24,996) (Jessica Tandy, Hume Cronyn). Anticipated around $22,000 (previous week, $22,900).

"Gigi," Fulton (6th wk) (C-$4.80; 1,063; $23,228) (Audrey Hepburn). Figured around $21,600 due (previous week, $20,700).

"Glad Tidings," Lyceum (23d wk) (C-$4.80; 995; $22,845) (Melvyn Douglas, Signe Hasso). Estimated around $9,000 (previous week, was overquoted; actual figure was around $3,000).

"Guys and Dolls," 46th Street (58th wk) (MC-$6.60; 1,319; $43,904). As always, $44,400.

"I Am a Camera," Empire (5th wk) (CD-$4.80-$6; 1,082; $24,400) ($24,400). Looked for over $23,000 (previous week, $18,200).

"King and I," St. James (40th wk) (MD-$7.20; 1,571; $51,717) (Gertrude Lawrence). With the star still out and Yul Brynner in only part of the week, expected over $44,000 for the scheduled seven performances (previous week, with the two leads out for six performances, $49,700).

"Legend of Lovers," Plymouth (1st wk) (D-$4.80-$5.40; 1,063; $31,000) (Dorothy McGuire, Richard Burton). Opened Wednesday night (26) to unanimously unfavorable reviews; first six performances due for about $14,000 under Theatre Guild subscription.

"Lo and Behold," Booth (3d wk) (CD-$4.80-$6; 766; $23,000). First full week, around $14,000 anticipated on Theatre Guild subscription (previous week, $9,800).

"Moon is Blue," Miller (43d wk) (C-$4.80; 920; $21,586) (Barbara Bel Geddes, Donald Cook, Barry Nelson). About $20,500 figured likely (previous week, was laying off).

"Nina," Royale (4th wk) (C-$4.80-$6; 1,035; $29,000) (Gloria Swanson, David Niven, Alan Webb). Looked for about $19,000 (previous week, $21,700).

"Paint Your Wagon," Shubert (7th wk) (MC-$7.20; 1,361; $46,000) (James Barton). Looked for about $44,000 (previous week, $42,800).

"Point of No Return," Alvin (3d wk) (D-$4.80-$6; 1,331; $37,924) (Henry Fonda). Standees at all performances, with nearly $38,400 due (previous week, with the star out one performance, $36,500).

"Remains to Be Seen," Morosco (12th wk) (D-$4.80-$6; 912; $25,700). Expected about $20,800 (previous week, $17,700).

"Saint Joan," Cort (13th wk) (D-$4.80; 1,056; $27,000) (Uta Hagen). Looked for over $20,000 (previous week, $14,400); moves next week to the Century, at reduced scale.

"South Pacific," Majestic (141st wk) (MD-$6; 1,659; $50,186) (Roger Rico, Martha Wright). Anticipated around $49,000 (previous week, $35,500).

A good deal of fine talent is being wasted on a very dated play at N. Y.'s City Center. Out of the Henrik Ibsen archives, the N. Y. City Theatre Co. has dug up a minor work of the Norwegian dramatist, for the first of its three-play stock season, and the presentation makes for a dull or trying evening. Work was previously seen on Broadway for three performances in 1938. Present adaptation by Max Faber, whose version was staged two years ago in London, accents further how out-of-key with modern times the drama is.

What may have been radical or original ideas at time the play was written are fairly prosaic now, and the naivete or stilted quality of some of the dialog militates further against their attractiveness. Although human frailty, superstition, greed and vanity are still universal subjects, and authentic material for playwrights, they have to be dressed up differently now. In this

'Primitive' $7,000 For 5-Show Hartford Stand

Hartford.

"Modern Primitive," in a four-day, five-show breakin at the New Parsons here last week (26-29), reached an estimated $7,000 for the stand. Show folded here for revisions.

Adverse notices combined with the usual seasonal lull and bad weather to keep gross down.

Reincarnation of this 1940 Rodgers & Hart musical click has been accomplished successfully to alarge degree. It steps off with a sock first act that is not fully matched by the second stanza, but this last is a condition that should be remedied by Broadway opening time. If Gotham is looking for a tuneful book show with exceptional choreography, talented performers, shapely gams and an abundance of set and costume flash, this can well be it.

Sticking close to the original in its book about the bistro m.c. heel and the well-heeled matron of romantic inclinations, "Pal Joey" maintains an interesting story line, which falters mainly in its final stages. It is this portion that requires bolstering.

Score, vocally, is a replica of the earlier cleffing. For terping, a new set of dance arrangements has been devised and one complete new number, "A Night in Morocco," has been added. As evidence of the original sound construction of tunes, they are just as hummable today as they were a decade ago, when they first hit the popularity polls. Due for revived plugging are "You Mustn't Kick It Around," "I Could Write A Book," "What Is A Man," "In Our Little Den," "Take Him," and, of course, the favorite "Bewitched, Bothered and Bewildered." Another observation worthy of note is the fitness of the Lorenz Hart lyrics as of today.

Robert Alton has done a highly competent job in the staging of the dances and musical numbers. He has brought a number of fresh ideas to the fore and presented them at breakneck pace. He has acquired an excellent troupe of hoofers to put his ideas across, and that evaluation goes for the ensemble as well as principals.

Vivienne Segal, back at the old stand as Vera, a role she created in the original version, sings and talks her way pleasantly through the two stanzas, leaving a fine impression behind her. Playing the title role, Harold Lang utilizes his voice and especially his feet to sell himself solidly as a tailor-made candidate for the part. His work is standout.

Helen Gallagher stamps "versatility" across her whole performance with a display of singing-dancing pep that is aces. Pat Northrop makes an attractive ingenue who adds good vocal support. Elaine Stritch offers a vocal traffic-halter with her rendition of "Zip," the takeoff on the stripteaser. Lionel Stander is okay in the somewhat abbreviated role of the blackmailing agent, and Jack Waldron fits well as the owner of the honkytonk. Helen Wood has some sock moments in the terps department and same goes for Robert Fortier. Lending a good helping hand on vocals is Lewis Bolyard, and on dances George Martin and Buzz Miller.

Sumptuous is a good word to describe sets and costumes. In the former department, a reversible setting that operates on rollers, shifting in audience view, rates a nod for slick designing. Costumes hit every color of the rainbow and practically every stage of dress and undress. Max Meth's baton work gives the necessary skill in guiding vocalists and dancers capably through a range of 16 numbers.

Modern Primitive

Hartford.

Otto Preminger presentation of comedy in three acts (four scenes) by Herman Wouk. Staged by Preminger. Settings, Frederick Fox; costumes, Bonnie Cashin. At New Parsons, Hartford, Dec. 26, '51; $4.20 top.

Soon after the curtain went up on "Modern Primitive" in its New Parsons tryout here Wednesday night (26), it was apparent that the comedy was in trouble. Slow getaway of the first act indicated the trend to follow. This one needs plenty work.

Play deals with a middleaged painter who has forsaken New York for the inspirations and seclusion of a little Mexican hamlet. Till the very end, he hides the fact that he is a bank cashier on the lam, after embezzling several thousand dollars. Latter was done to give him funds with which to paint, and not starve and rot like many great artists in history. He would have remained a recluse painter for the remainder of his days, except that Time magazine discovered him as a new color painter. From then on, things are supposed to happen. They do, but very foggily.

Author Herman Wouk, graduate gag man and wellknown novelist, has placed the emphasis on morality and art, rather than on the creation of comic situations and meat for his play. Pedestrian writing is on a par with the direction. Even the acting lacks fire.

Reinhold Schunzel, in the role of the art critic, turns in the top thesp effort with his short bit in the third act. Murvyn Vye is not too convincing as the painter whose masterpieces turn out to be duds, but whose earlier work b.e. (before embezzlement) are sensational items.

Diana Douglas—his model, concubine, and common-law wife—takes two acts to warm to the role. Mike Kellin, a local product, lately of "Stalag 17," works hard at his comedy efforts, but isn't successful in the role of a gag writer graduated to front man of a Hollywood mobster cashing in on a Coast painting fad. Howard Smith, as the bonding company investigator, turns in a good job, as does Paula Laurence as a special writer for Time mag. Setting by Frederick Fox of a Mexican studio living room is okay.

It'll take more than a month of Sundays to fix this one up enough to pay off. The show, as it stands, despite the presence of Nancy Walker in the cast, is deficient in every department save sets and costumes.

Principal trouble with the show, however, is the book. Derived, more or less faithfully from Victor Wolfson's "Excursion," it is the ramblingly sentimental tale of a cruise to Coney Island on the good ship Happiness. Inspired by a whim, and the fact the ship is

Keeping Theatre Free

committee. It was not referred back. When it came up it was simply tabled for a week, which meant that it could be considered and passed at any time in the future.

But opposition from press and public grew so great that the next week Councilman Cunningham himself suggested that the bill be sent back to the committee—where it could be reported ut again at any time that public vigilance relaxed.

On the political front, the theatre so far has been comparatively free from the direct pressures and the witch-burnings that have harassed radio-TV and films. But a big push may come and if it does it will move in on both fronts—the political and the so-called "moral." The theatre must be prepared to defend itself desperately in both directions.

Incidentally, the Cunningham bill nicely illustrated the general intellectual level of the reformers and their hatchet-men. Councilman Cunningham said his bill was prompted by the production of "The Respectful Prostitute"—but he indicated that he had never even bothered to see the play. However, he pointed out that the title alone would have justified hi bill. And here he made the most grievous mistake of all.

He thought the title was "Th Respect*able* Prostitute."

One of two things is certain! Either Johnny Harris has come up with an "Ice Capades" more stunning than any of its 11 predecessors or Monahan needs a new pair of specs. The latter is unthinkable. They cost too much.

play, their representations lack force.

Story revolved around a vain, shiftless dreamer, married off to a woman socially beneath him, who only years later learns that the wife, while a rich man's housekeeper, had been the latter's mistress. The parentage of a 14-year-old daughter is, therefore, somewhat in doubt. Around this drama is woven an allegory about wild creatures unhappy in a domesticated habitat, that is neither novel nor inspiring.

An accomplished set of performers, in the main, do a creditable job on this work. Maurice Evans plays the pompous weakling who is a failure as father, husband and breadwinner, and conveys the man's spiritual emptiness with a good deal of conviction. Mildred Dunnock, as his patient, hard-working and adoring wife, is excellent contrast, for one of the most attractive portraits of the evening.

Diana Lynn, as human paraphrase of the wild duck caught in a domestic snare, is quite charming, soft and believable in a role that could easily be spoiled otherwise by archness. Kent Smith, always a fine actor, has a difficult part as a priggish zealot whose misguided attempts to tell the truth about the family's domestic relations result in tragedy. Appealing in the earlier portions, he finds the latter scenes a little too snug to be completely comfortable in. Philip Loeb is excellent as a foolish grandfather who has taken the rap for his business partner in a shady deal, and whose jail sentence has sapped his spiritual strength.

Of lesser roles, David Lewis is good as the cynical but helpful Dr. Relling; Nan McFarland is appealing as a hostess, and Robert Middleton a little cold as Evans' devious parent, Loeb's onetime partner.

Morton DaCosta's direction, though adequate, isn't inspired. Peter Larkin's sets, and Noel Taylor's costumes, catch the eye.

"Legend of Lovers," originally done in Paris under title of "Eurydice" (and subsequently in London as "Point of Departure") is another illustration of the Gallic phrase, "chacun a son gout." What may seem piquant to the French seems a little peurile here. Whatever the case, "Legend" lacks substantiality for Broadway.

The drama, adapted from the Jean Anouilh original by Kitty Black, is a modern paraphrase of the Orpheus-Eurydice legend of ill-starred lovers. Old legend had boy losing girl to Death, pursuing her to the underworld, and charming Death by music into giving the girl back, on condition the boy didn't gaze on her till his return to earth. Boy broke his promise and lost her again.

In this paraphrase, set in rural France, a young impoverished musician meets a girl from a travelling legit troupe, the two falling in love instantly. They go off together, but after one night and day, she runs away, afraid to face the boy when he learns of her past lovers. She is killed in a bus accidennt. Death gives the grief-stricken boy another chance to keep the girl, which the boy flubs through jealousy.

The Orpheus-Eurydice legend can meet the scrutiny of modern eye if it is poetically-enough rendered, but it fails here under Anouilh's somewhat long-winded dialog and obscure symbolical allusions. First part of the first act has wonderful mood, and balance of act has charm and appeal. Thereafter, play slips away fast, bogging down in the next two frames, with only intermittent bits of poetic fire or beauty. There are fine vignettes throughout, and some excellent performances, but not enough to pull the play through.

Dorothy McGuire, absent from Broadway since 1941's "Claudia," is beautiful always; very appealing in the earlier love scenes, but somewhat pallid in the latter ones. Britisher Richard Burton is fine as the badgered young lover, while Hugh Griffith is excellent as his burdensome parent. Griffith's bits, especially his last act philosophizing on life's meaning, are virtuoso stuff. Alexander Clark and Edith King, as a pathetic pair of middle-aged lovers; Noel Willman, as the Stranger (or Death); Bruce Gordon, as a touring company impresario; Eric Sinclair, as a rejected young lover, and Bryon Russell, as a lordly-mannered waiter, head a good supporting cast.

Peter Ashmore's direction, uneven at times, is satisfactory on the whole. Eldon Elder's sets, especially the station restaurant, are outstanding.

Plays Out of Town

about to be converted into a garbage scow, the captain persuades the passengers to turn about and head for a Caribbean paradise. They never get there, and neither does the book; the dialog is almost amazingly devoid of wit.

In the meantime there are songs and dances, the former being pleasant enough and the latter occasionally lively, though the liveliness is generally forced. Among the songs, which include a chanty-like ballad, a horn pipe and a few semi-patter songs, the best is the romantic "You Have To Have Love," but it doesn't appear to have too many hit possibilities. The music, however, would be good enough if the book and the lyrics pulled their weight.

Miss Walker appears a wishfully predatory companion to a Gimbel clerk, both on a day's holiday. The girl meets a boy on the ship, but turns him down because of his dim prospects. Meanwhile, Nancy, in company with a couple of preposterous zoot suiters (whose cross talk is incredibly pallid), gets a chance to do a couple of song specialties. One of these is "Get Married, Shirley," and it is the only thing in the show that arouses any interest at all. For the rest, having no comic lines to speak whatever, Miss Walker resorts to pantomime, which is amusing but not sufficiently so to save this one.

Gene Lockhart does his best as the sentimental captain, while Estelle Loring (who could put a song over if she had one that could be put) and Richard Kiley make an acceptable romantic pair.

The single set is a highly faithful representation of the ship's deck, and there's a neat effect when the ship pulls away from the dock. First-nighters, who seemed to be mostly a clacque from New York, applauded this, too. It may be added that the intentions of the authors were clearly to do something a little different, a little "sweeter" than usual, and in a more intimate vein. But these intentions are not fulfilled in this version. Cast includes two or more of all melting pot races, plus moppets, to point a neat interracial moral. The cast does well, too, but to no avail.

Elie.

Longhair TV Series

A series of half-hour programs, featuring a number of top longhair artists on TV, and titled "Meet the Masters," is being prepped for Lees carpets sponsorship in 35 cities.

Artists will include Artur Rubinstein, Jascha Heifetz, Gregor Piatigorsky, Andres Segovia, Marian Anderson, Jan Peerce and Nadine Conner.

D'Arcy advertising agency will handle selection of cities and stations.

Alfred Lunt

and especially Lunt's staging, th Trib's music critic, Virgil Thomson, said "The result makes history." The Times' Oli Downes was no less enthusiastic, also attributing the success of "this very exceptional" production to Lunt.

Opera, presented at the Met for the first time since 1928, and for the first time in English (in Ruth and Thomas Martin's translation, retitled "Women Are Like That"), is a highly stylized, satirical chamber opera deriding women's (and men's) foibles and fidelity. Lunt's staging carried this mood off admirably. There were resemblances to "Die Fledermaus" the libretto, and more particularly suggestions of Lunt's own "The Guardsman" in the production. Show was light, witty and gossamer throughout. Another legit recruit, Rolf Gerard, provided attractively stylized rococo sets and dazzling costumes.

Fortunately, general manager Rudolf Bing cast the opera with English - speaking singers (all American except Australian John Brownlee), and the amusing absurdities of the plot brought audience laughs, while the story was constantly and completely understood.

Singers, too, were exceptional. Eleanor Steber and Blanche Thebom played the unfaithful sisters, Patrice Munsel was the maid, Richard Tucker and Frank Guarrera the suitors, and Brownlee the cynical Don. Munsel had some excellent comedy bits as a pseudo-lawyer and doctor. Tucker's distinguished tenor was standout, although Miss Steber carried the show, with a fine job of a tremendously difficult singing part. Fritz Stiedry conducted spiritedly, and the new production looks like another Met hit, the "Fledermaus" of 1952.

WORLD'S GREATEST ICE SHOW!

PRODUCTION OFFICES—1800 W. Madison, Chicago 12, Ill.

Look Who's at the Metropolitan!
(And It's Not Loew's)

WHITE PLAINS, OCT. 23: "One cannot fail to mention Mr. Gilford's inimitable Frosch. He is a great comedian, and as such finds no need to over-act or merely clown. His conception of the role is rapidly becoming classic. His facial expressions, expressive gestures and ambling gait combine to produce the most wonderful results. His style will be and has been imitated, but can never be duplicated."

RICHMOND, OCT. 16: "It appears fitting that Fledermaus, with its unorthodox production, should derive its funniest scenes from the one non-singing member of the cast. He is Jack Gilford, a Broadway comedian who injects his own brand of tomfoolery into the role of the jailer and keeps the third act in howling merriment."

"Rarely does one see these days, such comedy as Jack Gilford contrived around the part of the jailer. It was fresh, original, clever and continually hilarious."

PROVIDENCE, OCT. 5: . . . Comedy of the purest sort filled the third act, the scene in the jail. Jack Gilford as the jailer must be seen to be appreciated."

BOSTON, OCT. 9: "The performer who found most favor with the customers is Jack Gilford, first Broadway comedian ever to have a role in a Metropolitan Opera production. He hasn't a note to sing throughout the performance, but his Frosch, the Jailer, has plenty to say about his work and the interesting people it permits him to meet. His conducting of symphony orchestra is a fine bit of pantomime. The jail scene has some genuinely funny business.

PITTSBURGH, OCT. 30: "Jack Gilford in the non-singing role of Frosch the jailer is a born comic. An artist of high calibre, he evoked laughter with his humorous antics."

. . . "The non-singing role of Frosch, the drunk jailer, was played to the hilt by Jack Gilford—and the hilt is pretty far up."

TORONTO, NOV. 12: voiceless opera comedian vigorous in Fledermaus . . . And the very excellent comedy work of Jack Gilford as Frosch was a wonderful vignette of its own. Mr. Gilford didn't talk very much. He didn't have to, his pantomime was exceptional."

BUFFALO, NOV. 29: "Jack Gilford gave a display of miming and mummery that was a masterpiece of deadpan comedy."

SYRACUSE, Dec. 1: "Jack Gilford was applauded before even he was visible to do his inimitable pantomime. Every move or word brought gales of laughter."

OTTAWA, Dec. 4: "Convulsed the audience with his antics."

AND ALFRED LUNT IN A LETTER TO GARSON KANIN: ". . . and that great artist who played the jailer—now listen; I've seen Grock and the Fratellins and Suvers and all the best, but none could touch him. How he manages to dissolve, vanish completely, while manacled to the tenor is—I think, the greatest feat of acting I ever saw."

UA Hectic Years

granted. He got the deal he demanded.

January, 1920: In a communication to Griffith, Miss Pickford complained that the losses on his "Romance" so depleted the UA treasury that the company could not pay off money due to her and Fairbanks. The corporation's and personal endorsements of Griffith's note exhausted Miss Pickford's and Fairbanks' own credit and they were having difficulty financing their then-current productions. Miss Pickford and Fairbanks decreed: "No more advances to Griffith."

March, 1920: McAdoo was in receipt of a letter from Miss Pickford, Chaplin and Fairbanks. They wondered why he should remain as counsel since his costly services were unrequired. Similarly questioned was Price's continuation as president at $18,000 per year plus a percentage. "One of us could be president," the stars suggested.

April, 1920: McAdoo severed connections with the outfit which, a year earlier, he formed. Price was out as prexy. Abrams got the job.

July, 1920: UA's exhibitor customers were heard from. Sid S. Cohen, president of the Motion Picture Theatre Owners of America, beefed to Griffith about Abrams' sales policies. Abrams, Cohen complained, was demanding that theatremen pay for the films when booked, 30 to 60 days in advance of playing them.

Griffith's 'Way Down East'

By the fall of 1920, Griffith had completed his great epic, "Way Down East," Lillian Gish starrer. VARIETY's appraiser hailed it as a "film poem" and "the work of the world's greatest picture producer."

The film-maker agreed to roadshow "East" on his own, rather than channel it through UA. Having fulfilled his three-a-year commitment, Griffith was free to follow the roadshow course for a single pic.

But with "East" looming as a big success, Fairbanks squawked that UA, short on product and money, should be licensed to handle the film. Griffith bounced back with the charge that his other films were drawing "absurdly low" coin through UA in relation to income for the Pickford-Fairbanks pix.

Griffith later wanted to part from UA entirely. He was in a "hopeless minority," he claimed. Miss Pickford, Chaplin and Fairbanks refused to release him from the contractual obligations.

The partnership continued and UA grew as a worldwide organization but often suffering from insufficient product and the inability to crack some segments of the market. In 1923, back from a tour of the south, Griffith informed his co-owners: "In Miami, even though over-run with tourists, our pictures fill up only about three weeks during the entire year. I think these small towns could do without using any of our combined pictures. Strong as we are, we are still very weak."

Need for product led to the deal shortly after with Joseph M. Schenck, giving him partial stock ownership upon delivery of his pix to UA. This was similar to the pacts with the original owners and was followed later by the same tie-in with Samuel Goldwyn, David O. Selznick and Alexander Korda.

Of the various owners, only Miss Pickford and Chaplin have kept their identity with UA. They now hold 4,000 shares each of the corporation's 16,000 outstanding common shares.

In addition to Price and Abrams, Krim's predecessors at the management helm have been Schenck, Al Lichtman, George Schaefer, Maurice Silverstone, Edward Raftery, Gradwell Sears and Frank McNamee. McNamee was brought in by Paul V. McNutt, who reigned as board chairman in 1950.

Opening Nights

I advise that you use only bottled spring water while there."

Among the many "firsts" of the first-nights that have unfolded here was "I Remember Mama," in September, 1944 . . . the first producing effort of the team of Rodgers and Hammerstein.

Canada Lee probably still remembers the December night back in 1943 when "South Pacific," in which he starred, had its opening here. (Yes, that's right, it was "South Pacific," a drama which was originally tagged "New Georgia.") As an American ship-sinking survivor on a Jap-held island, Lee was supposed to read a line about being fed "roast pig and chicken." The first time he tried it, it came out "roast chig and picken." The second attempt brought forth "roast pick and chiggen." When the third try rolled off his tonsils as "roast chick and piggen," Lee stared blankly for a second, mumbled, "Oh, well"—and went on to the next line.

Local first-nighters thought they had witnessed just about every style of preem until April 19, 1945, when "Common Ground" unfurled its banner here. Following the final curtain, author Edward Chodorov and producer Edward Choate appeared onstage and led with their chins by inviting audience comment on the play. The forum lasted about 15 minutes, with practically the entire audience in on it.

light of that, that the AM-TV package will produce the biggest turnout of voters in election history. To further that attempt, the sponsor will make the 13-week series, titled "Get Out the Vote," available in equal time to both parties, for which they will be invited to present their campaign issues to the public through their candidates and other leading figures. Series is slated to preem in August and continue until election week.

200 CBS Staffers Involved

Westinghouse, under the package deal, will be financing the activities of over 200 CBS staffers, who will cover the conventions for both AM and TV. Both meets will be held at Chicago's International Amphitheatre, with the Republicans teeing off July 7 and th Democrats July 21. It will be th first time both conventions, plus the election, will be televised fro coast-to-coast and it's expected that at least 60% of the nation's population will be tuned in. Coverage for the conventions will include at least 20 hours for each party on both radio and video.

Election coverage will start on the web at 9 p.m. Nov. 4 and continue until a definite trend is established to indicate the winning candidate. It's recalled that Republican Thomas E. Dewey did not concede to Harry S. Truman until early the following morning during the 1948 election.

For TV, CBS will cover the conventions via pickups from the amphitheatre floor, complete with analyses by the web's staff; commentary and interviews; pickups of special events via on-the-spot mobile crews at press conferences, candidates' headquarters, etc., plus human interest shows built around the candidates and their wives and families. Latter are to be grooved for the daytime housewife audience. Radio coverage will include the same type of pickups, with walkie-talkie units to be used for the on-the-spot events.

CBS staff will include Edward R. Murrow, Lowell Thomas, Robert Trout, Doug Edwards, Walter Cronkite, Charles Collingwood, Larry Leseuer, Don Hollenbeck, David Schoenbrun, Eric Sevareid, Bill Shadell, Lyman Bryson and others. In addition, George Allen, White House confidante, will serve as consultant to the web.

imposed on purchasers of stocks and bonds dealt in on the stock exchanges in so far as the capital gains relief areas of the law. Some of the lawful means for tax avoidance, as clearly distinguishable from tax evasion, provided for merchants who deal in sealing wax and ships, are still available to the creative group but seem to be of little, if any, concern to the group itself.

In many situations gifts of creative properties still may lawfully be used to advantage by writers, musicians and the like. Also spreadback under the statutes and spreadforward by contract provisions are available to the advantage of those who find great variations in their annual incomes. The need for averaging income for tax purposes peculiarly needed for creative people who so often find wide fluctuations in their incomes. Lawful benefits by the establishments of trusts, properly planned sales by estates, still are often available. But oil operators and oyster bed planters are permitted big allowances for so-called depletion. It is time that Congress were made to realize that the life of the creative producer also depreciates and that oil has no greater social value than "ideas"—the most precious commodity on earth.

It is high time that the creative people banded together and made clear to Congress that if there be preferential treatment among classes of people, or professions, or trades that contribute to our national well-being, that those who deal with ideas should be given a preference since the wealth of our nation depends on the development of the minds of our people.

VIDPIX WEED OUT SHOESTRINGERS

$26,000,000 for 'Gone' Remains Tops By 2½-1 Among All-Time Grossers

Musicals and straight dramatic pix have proved over the years to be the industry's most reliable moneymakers. That's indicated by VARIETY's list of All-Time Top-Grossers, published herewith. It includes all the pix in film history that have gotten or give promise of getting $4,000,000 or more in domestic (U.S. and Canada) film rentals.

"Gone With the Wind," produced by David O. Selznick for Metro release in 1939, continues to top the list by more than 2½ to 1. It has $26,000,000 in the till to date and gives promise of grabbing plenty more when M-G sends it into its fourth reissue some time next year.

Runnerup position is held by Samuel Goldwyn's "Best Years Of Our Lives" with $10,400,000, followed closely by Selznick's "Duel In the Sun" at $10,000,000. Possibly ahead of all of them is the industry's first super-duper, David Wark Griffith's "Birth of a Nation." Figures on it have never been accurately known because of its franchised distribution and the fact that the memories of most oldtimers are clouded by nostalgia regarding it. There seems no doubt, however, that the years of roadshowing it at tops of as high as $2.20 may well have produced

'Wife' Looms As Big Cornell Hit

On the basis of the first four weeks' run, Katharine Cornell has one of the biggest commercial hits of her career in her current revival of "Constant Wife." For the first three weeks the production earned an operating profit of $14,800 and netted an estimated $4,000 last week. At that rate, it will get into the black by the end of next week, or after only seven weeks' run on Broadway.

As of this week, 50% is being returned to the backers of the $40,000 investment. The Somerset Maugham revival cost about $28,000 to produce, including approximately $5,000 tryout profit, plus $10,000 in bonds. The actress-manager is co-starred with Brian Aherne and Grace George in the show, which is at the National, N.Y. Guthrie McClintic, Miss Cornell's husband, staged.

Diana Barrymore In 2d Aussie Walkout

Melbourne, Jan. 8.

Diana Barrymore walked out of the cast of Noel Coward's "Fallen Angels" at the Princess, Melbourne, under Carroll management, following a tiff with director Eric Reiman. Husband Robert Wilcox also quit, with local talent replacing. Miss Barrymore said she walked out because Reiman wanted to cut her lines. Reiman said the actress would not cooperate, hence the clash.

Miss Barrymore quit her first Aussie date several months ago at the Celebrity Night Club, Sydney, claiming laryngitis.

Theatre TV Has 200,000 Seats, But Few Events

Theatre television, which only a few months ago had too few theatres equipped to bid for the top events, has almost completely reversed its field. Today, the new medium has a total seating capasity of almost 200,000 but virtually no events available to which it can sew up exclusive rights. As a result, the houses presently equipped, numbering about 65, have had little opportunity to utilize their big-screen installations for the last month or so.

According to theatre TV execs,

Despite the fact that Celeste Holm will have the title role in Eugene O'Neill's "Anna Christie" opening tonight (Wed.) at the City Center, N. Celanese producers didn't want to approach Miss Holm to do the show, because she would virtually

VERY FEW FIRMS HAVE SOLID SETUP

By DAVE KAUFMAN

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Day of the will-o'-the-wisp promoter-producer in telepix has just about ended in Hollywood, with a gradual but definite stabilization of the infant offspring of television to the point where 80-odd vidfilm companies existing in these parts early in 1951 have boiled down to around 20 financially stable outfits. Adding to baby's growth was the entry into the telepix field of motion picture companies such as Republic, Universal-International and Monogram.

A noticeable trend which helped solidify the picture was the tendency of more and more sponsors to put their coin into vidfilm, apparently realizing that in a piece of negative they retained continued marketable merchandise. Another factor aiding the TV-film producer was the generally-conceded fact that better quality could be insured with film.

And as the few top telepix companies entrenched themselves in their positions, the inevitable result was that the weaker and in some instances incompetent producers began beating a hasty exit. As for the phony, it's becoming virtually impossible for him to exist.

Net result of all these growing pains is that vidpix production is

Styne Financing Frenzy Raising 'Pal Joey' Coin Is Newest B'way Saga

Click opening last week of the "Pal Joey" revival represents a kind of personal vindication and the prospect of a financial lifesaver for Jule Styne, principal producer of the show. Besides having pledged his future composer royalties from "Gentlemen Prefer Blondes" and "Two On the Aisle" as security for personal loans to finance the show, Styne made virtually a private crusade of getting the revival on the boards, despite negative advice from most of his friends and associates.

Since most potential investors shunned the venture, Styne had almost insurmountable difficulty lining up financing to revive the Richard Rodgers-Lorenz Hart-John O'Hara musical, which had failed to pay off on its original Broadway

Reveal 'Hollywood Nine' Settled Suits In Pact to Stay Away From Pic Industry

Barbershop-Longhair Tiein For Close-Shave Harmony

Washington, Jan. 8.

The music world gets introduced Saturday night (12) to something absolutely unique here—a combined concert by a full-size major symphony orchestra and a collection of harmonizing barbershop quartets.

The gimmick concert will bring together D.C.'s National Symphony Orchestra and the Washington Chapter of the Society for the Preservation of Barbershop Quartet Singing in America. Concert calls for two quartets and the full unit of 60 Barbershoppers to harmonize against the background of the 100-piece symphony orch.

Webs Brush Off Talmadge Beef On Negro Talent

Top network television execs indicated this week that they will take no notice of Georgia Gov. Herman Talmadge's squawks that several network programs violate the spirit of the south's segregation laws, despite a veiled threat by Talmadge that he might call for a mass boycott in the south of products sold by sponsors on such shows. Consensus among the network brass was they would continue to select talent without regard to their race, creed or color.

Cons Don't Mind B'cast Of Own Riot; They Just Want to Get Into Act

Salt Lake City, Jan. 8.

Last Wednesday's (2) broadcast of "The Big Story" was fed to all cells at the Utah State prison, scene of last August's riot that was dramatized on the show. Reactions among the cons were pretty unanimously favorable, with two outstanding squawks.

Major concession by the "Hollywood Nine" leading to settlement last week of their suits against the studios is understood to have been an agreement that they never again would seek or take jobs in the industry. Group of writers and directors, who were discharged in 1947 for alleged Communist affiliations, accepted $107,500 in settlement of damage suits totaling $62,000,000.

Coin was anted by four studios, while four others, who were likewise defendants in the various actions in California Federal and state courts, stood on their determination to fight the cases out. Latter, from the standpoint of both principle and economics, feel that their advantage lies in letting the suits go to a jury.

They believe that with the present tenor of public opinion on Communism, they have virtually a 100% chance of coming out of court with a "not guilty" decision. Some are charged with violations of contracts in discharging the employees and all with conspiracy in blacklisting them against further jobs.

While from the standpoint of "law" attorneys for some of the holdout companies privately admit they may have a dubious case, on the issue of "fact" they think they have a sure thing. One of them remarked that obviously the "Hollywood Nine" have the same idea, or they wouldn't have settled most of $62,000,000 in suits for $107,500.

Although the quartet of studios

Bing Crosby To Go TV Next Fall

Bing Crosby, one of the last of the top-name personalities to remain outside the television field, will make the plunge next fall via CBS-TV. While specific plans are still indefinite, web execs reported this week that it's almost a certainty that Crosby will be doing a TV show from the Coast next September or October.

It's expected that Crosby, at least at the start, will consent to do only five or six shows during the season, similar to the way Jack Bemy has been doing his TV. And it's believed that Chesterfield, which bankrolls Crosby's weekly CBS Radio shows, will also be in the sponsor's seat for TV.

Kramer Sues Coast Group for Million In Red Rap, Picketing of 'Salesman'

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Stanley Kramer filed a $1,000,000 libel suit against a group calling itself the Wage Earners Committee, which has been picketing his "Death of a Salesman. Producer warned he'll no longer tolerate "irresponsible, unjust and untrue slanders against my name."

Group distributed pamphlets, mailed to some exhibitors, characterizing Kramer as "notorious for his red-slanted, red-starred films."

Board of the Producers Assn. authorized the following statement: "There has come to our attention a pamphlet issued by the so-called wage earners committee in which it makes vicious, unfounded attacks against the motion picture industry. We are pleased to learn that Kramer has seen fit to bring this group into court so that its charges against him may be tested before a legal tribunal. His action in so doing has our complete support."

Kramer said the time has come when "obligations of citizenship and personal integrity demand action." Action is asking $500,000 damages, $500,000 punitive damages, and lists the committee of four officers, 100 John Does, John Doe Corp., Richard Roe and Jane Doe, promising to supply proper names later.

Kramer told a press conference that he can't speak for the industry but he believes pickets of the picture thus attack the entire industry.

He said any other industry so attacked would fight back in face of breaches of "fundamental American rights." Producer said he couldn't speak for Fredric March, star of the film, who was attacked on placards carried by the pickets, but he pointed out the actor had spent $36,000 to secure a retraction from counter attack of all charges but still WEC repeated the charges, ignoring the retraction.

U. S. Amus. Taxes Dived In Oct.; B'way 800G Off

Washington, Jan. 8.

Entertainment biz slid off sharply last October on the basis of November admissions tax collections reported by the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

The 20% bite on admissions brought $31,084,965 to Uncle Sam last November, far below the November, 1950, take of $34,370,182, and the October, 1951, tax return of $37,302,259. November tax receipts generally represent October payees at the boxoffice.

About 80% of the tax figures is estimated to come from admissions to motion picture theatres.

The 20% slice on nitery checks brought the Treasury $3,787,071, compared with $4,125,605 for the same month of 1950 and $4,624,295 for the preceding month of 1951.

New York's 3d Internal Revenue District, which takes in the Broadway sector, turned over $3,963,963 in admissions taxes, a decline of nearly $800,000 from the previous month. However, the $338,476 in nitery tab levies was an improvement over the previous month's $285,473.

Drop Townsend Charge

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Exec board of the Screen Writers Guild voted to drop the "Ghostwriting" charge against Leo Townsend, who had testified before the House Un-American Activities Committee that he permitted his name to be used on originals, "Honey Valley" and "Day She Left Town," which were submitted for sale in early 1950.

They were written by Lester Cole and Dalton Trumbo, two of the original "Hollywood 10" who went to jail for refusing to testify on their alleged Red activities.

House Group Slates Legit, Radio, TV Probe, Tied to H'wood Hearings

Washington, Jan. 8.

House Un-American Activities Committee is expected to launch its long-planned inquiry into alleged Communist sympathizers in Broadway legit, radio and television either at the end of this month or early in January. Committee has postponed until that time its scheduled windup of the probe into Hollywood Red sympathizers and now plans to tie the two groups of hearings together.

Which legit, radio and TV personalities will be subpoenaed as witnesses by the committee has not been divulged. Walter Winchell reported in his ABC broadcast Sunday night (6) that 15 names were already on the subpoena list, but committee spokesmen here declined comment on the report.

House committee had originally planned its looksee into New York show biz last year. At that time, however, a special security subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee was established and sent to N. Y., where it conducted private hearings on presumably the same points. House committee, averse to duplicating the Senate's work, called off its hearings then. When the Senate group subsequently bogged down, howevr, the House committee decided to reopen its investigation.

Cantor's 60th Birthday Spearheads Israel Drive

Eddie Cantor's 60th birthday celebration will be the fulcrum for the "Bonds of Israel" campaign dinner to be held Jan. 31 at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, N. Y. George Jessel will be toastmaster.

National co-chairmen and sponsors of the birthday celebration include Benjamin Abrams, president of Emerson Radio & Phonograph Company; Barney Balaban, president of Paramount Pictures; Jack Benny, Oscar Hammerstein II, Fannie Hurst, N. Y. Mayor Vincent R. Impellitteri, George Jessel, Abel Green, Jennie Grossinger, Senator Herbert H. Lehman, Henry Morgenthau, Jr., William Morris, Jr., Spyros P. Wanger's 'Not Guilty'

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Trial is set for Santa Monica Superior Court Feb. 26.

N.Y. Legits, Niteries Seen Affected by Gov. Dewey Plea for Teeth Vs. Bias

Albany, Jan. 8.

Legitimate theatres, hotels, restaurants and night clubs are among those possibly affected, it's believed here, if the recommendation which Governor Dewey makes in his annual message to the Legislature tomorrow (Wed.), that the State Commission Against Discrimination be given jurisdiction over places of public accommodation, resort and amusement, is adopted. Discrimination in such places has been banned for years under the civil rights law, but complaints must go through criminal proceeding channels, via local district attorneys. Students of the problem agree that, for a variety of reasons, enforcement has been sporadic and not too effective.

The Governor is scheduled to say in his message that the State Commission, with wider powers, could successfully combat bias through a program of education, cooperation and conciliation. Apprised of an act of discrimination in a public place, the Commission could warn the offender, then cite it publicly, and, as a last resort, could seek a court order forcing dissenting from the settlement think the other four were wrong, they quickly add that there were controlling factors. Primary one is the clause that will keep the "Nine" from further work on the lots.

'H'wood Nine'

Aside from that point, the companies that settled did so on the basis that it was cheaper to part with the small amount of coin involved than pay legal fees. Dissenters, on the other hand, accepting victory in the courts as a sure thing, feel that for the sake of not admitting they were wrong in firing the men and thus suffering in public opinion, a fight must be made.

"Nine" lost their jobs after refusing to answer the questions of the House Un-American Activities Committee. There were originally 10, but Edward Dmytryk subsequently recanted. All 10 went to jail.

Four companies who joined in the settlement were Metro, which paid $65,000; Universal, $13.750; Columbia, $13,750, and Warner Bros., $15,000. Other four defendants were 20th-Fox, RKO, Paramount and Republic.

Metro's payment was the heaviest, since it involved breach-of-contract actions by Lester Cole and Dalton Trumbo. Other three studios were defendants only in a $61,000,000 conspiracy action for blacklisting.

Cole and Trumbo sought $350,000 in wages due under cancelled contracts from Metro. Writer Ring Lardner, Jr., and director-producer Adrian Scott similarly seek a total of $25,000 from 20th and $150,000 from RKO, respectively. Trial is set for Feb. 4.

All nine of the plaintiffs joined in the $61,000,000 conspiracy suit. Albert Maltz, one of the group, has a slightly different aspect to his case. It involves the purchase by 20th and subsequent shelving of his play, "The Journey of Simon McKeever." He contends that a product, not a person, is being blacklisted in violation of Federal law. Suit comes up in court this week.

The California cases have no connection with a suit brought against the studios by the Screen Writers Guild in N. Y. Federal Court. It alleges that the anti-Communist employment policy is illegal. In bringing the suit, the Guild disassociated itself from the litigation by the "10," asserting it was acting on behalf of all writers. Pre-trial conferences are scheduled for Feb. 24. No changes are sought.

FAMOUS FIRST NIGHTS

'The Widow Jones'

(Bijou, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1895)

May Irwin, who was regarded as the most able singer of the then popular "coon" songs, came to Broadway with a play by John J. McNally. It was a light farce, but sufficient to put her solidly to the fore as a star, and easily the best play she ever had so far as entertainment values were concerned. It had opened in Brockton, Mass., Aug. 19, and had been breaking in on the road with the result that the performance ran with unusual smoothness. She was supported by John C. Rice and his wife, Sallie Cohen, and Jacques Kruger, who had been associated with her 10 years earlier at Tony Pastor's.

It was from this farce the long famous "May Irwin-John C. Rice Kiss," the first motion picture ever censored and practically the first close-up, was taken. The play had a deservedly long run.

Supreme Court Rules Vs. Natalie Kalmus

Washington, Jan. 8.

Supreme Court found, in effect, last week that Natalie Kalmus was properly divorced from Dr. Herbert T. Kalmus 30 years ago, and that she has no partnership interest in Technicolor, nor any community property interest in Kalmus' other holdings.

The tribunal refused to hear an appeal by Mrs. Kalmus in which she claimed to be the common-law wife of Dr. Kalmus. She demanded an accounting of their community property and her partnership interest in Technicolor. Dr. Kalmus denied all her allegations. He won in the trial court and on appeal to the Supreme Court of California.

Bing Gains Point in Case Of Merrill; Artists Get Alerted to 'Met First'

Return of Robert Merrill to the Met Opera roster had been anticipated in the trade for some months, despite Met general manager Rudolf Bing's assertion last spring that Merrill was out for good and the case closed.

Merrill, who was dropped last spring for alleged contract violations when he went to Hollywood to make a film instead of showing up for the Met's spring tour, was reinstated last weekend after he had publicly "apologized" to the Met. In a letter to Bing, Merrill begged to come back, and Bing accepted the apology and request, calling Merrill's letter "a sign of moral courage and decency." Merrill is officially due back for the spring tour, but will likely appear at the Met during the winter.

It's known that AGMA (American Guild of Musical Artists) had been in touch with Bing and board chairman George A. Sloan during last summer, discussing the situation. Trade belief was that after Bing cooled down, he'd reconsider the Merrill firing. Feeling, too, is that Bing has gained his chief point—which is to alert Met singers against any outside activities that conflict with Met performances or otherwise injure them. In pre-Bing days, for instance, it wasn't uncommon for artists to go off on mid-season concert tours, and come back late for opera rehearsals, under plea of bad weather or other factors. There were many other abuses.

Meantime, at the other N. Y. opera house, the City Center, excitement over the dismissal of Laszlo Halasz as director of the N. Y. City Opera Co. hasn't subsided. Milton Pollack, Halasz's attorney, asked Mayor Impellitteri, as prez of the Center, to call a meeting to discuss the matter, claiming the board of directors, in dismissing Halasz, had "acted on mal-information," and that the decision to dismiss the director "appears to have been reached by a minority of the board." Pollack preferred making this appeal to the mayor before discussing any legal action. Various singers in the opera company have come to Halasz's defense in the matter of the ouster, disclaiming any pressure or duress in their actions. "Duress" part was not claimed by AGMA, as erratumed earlier.

Argentina's Low Cost Of Living on $ Basis; 20c Picture Admissions

By RAY JOSEPHS

Buenos Aires, Jan. 1.

The one place in the hemisphere where a single U. S. greenback is still worth more than a few tips for the Stork Club hatcheck gal is here in this capital of the Argentine Republic.

For an American dime you can get a pound of the most luscious tenderloin; for a penny ride a subway which looks like an art gallery. And for 4c get the biggest glass of beer and free lunch—you've ever encountered. Film admissions in cine palaces which out-rival Radio City come to about 20c. U. S. theatres and concerts are only slightly higher.

And it's almost impossible to spend much more than a dollar or two on the most elaborate meal.

The secret is, of course, the exchange—the most favorable ever given by any Latin country.

In normal times when I used to cover for VARIETY under this dateline Argentina's exchange rate was 4 to 1. This meant your dollar got you four pesos. But in the past year Argentina's meat and wheat exports have gone down. Inflation has been spiralling and dictator Juan Peron and his free spending, ex-actress wife Evita have been raiding the treasury.

The peso has, as a result, been getting more and more limp. Our greenbacks are essential to those Argentines who need products with that Made-in-USA mark. They bid for dollars on the free market. Currently it's even higher, and many of the boys who dope out such things feel it may even go to 40. But exchange figures are meaningless unless you know just what the 30 pesos you get will buy.

Take food. Buenos Aires, Argentina's capital, is a cosmopolitan metropolis of close to 4,000,000 whose restaurants are among the world's best. La Estancia, for instance, specializes in meat. Its Bismark steak is 6 pesos or 20c; the special exportation steak, smothered in mushrooms and big enough to serve an average U. S. family of four, is 34c. A "baby beef curasco" will cost you a dime. A steaming toureen of creamed soup 4c. and the fanciest mixed salad 11c. A whole pejerray—Argentina's favorite fish—is 13c. Desserts are in the same proportion. The best ice-cream is 7c. the finest camembert 5c., roquefort a penny more and you can indulge your taste for crepes suzette every day since they only cost 3 pesos, or just under a dime.

If these prices seem slightly dizzying, you'll be glad to know that by law every Argentine restaurant must serve an "Economic Menu." La Cabano, where prize shorthorns and Aberdeen Angus cattle are immortalized in cathedral-like stained glass windows, offers vegetable soup, vallalligos romano (an Italian dish) grilled steak and caramel custard for a legal limit of 4.50 pesos or 15c. You'll find similar menus—served with Ritz touches, everywhere.

Practically Banknite

An American who lives down there with dollars would, of course, find his grocery bill even less. Just try these for size: 4 lbs. of potatoes 3c., peas a nickel a pound, pork chops 14c. a pound, and fresh eggs up to 19c. a dozen. Partridge, a luxury item here, run 19c. each and a 12-lb. turkey, in season, $1.68.

Your other costs are in the same proportion. Gas in Argentina is only 4c. a gallon. But since cabs almost anywhere in town are under a dime—and no tipping expected—you mightn't even want to bother. American suburbanites around Buenos Aires believe that trains are more convenient, however, and frequently go home during the two-hour lunch period. No wonder. Round trip tickets from downtown to San Fernando—which is about as far as Penn Station to Great Neck—are 8c. and 67c. gets you an unlimited monthly ticket from the centre to the suburb of Martinez—a distance roughly that of Grand Central to White Plains.

Greene Minority Group Wins 2 Seats On RKO Theatres Bd. of 6 Directors

Minority stockholder group headed by David J. Greene has won two seats on the RKO Theatres board. That will be disclosed tomorrow (Thurs.) when the recessed annual stockholders meet is reconvened in Dover, Del.

Irving Trust Co., N.Y., as trustee for stockholder Howard Hughes, will elect another two directors, and the present management, headed by prexy Sol J. Schwartz, will elect two more to make up an enlarged board of six members.

Since the Irving Trust and Schwart groups are closely allied, they'll outvote the Green dissidents by two to one. That means that there will be no change in the present management.

Count of proxies has been going on at the company's nominal headquarters in Dover since the shareholders' meet was originally convened last Dec. 6. After many recesses while the tallying continued, inspectors today were nearing the end of their task.

Results of the count were clear by yesterday. All that remains now is for formal casting of their votes by the proxyholders at the session tomorrow. Directors who are elected will then hold a meeting to relect present officers.

Greene, a Wall St. investment counselor and member of the N.Y. Stock Exchange, drew his strength, as might be expected, from the professional traders on the Street. His proxies from that quarter far outstripped those obtained by the management.

Schwartz on the other hand, showed his strength among the small, independent stockholders, most of whom were pretty much unfamiliar with the issues. All

No One Talking on Why Only One Theatre TV'd Rose Bowl—and to SRO

What happened to prevent all but one theatre from carrying the New Year's Day Rose Bowl game on big-screen television remained veiled behind the refusal this week of all interested parties to comment on the situation. It appeared, though, that the Rose Bowl committee had stepped in at the last minute with a definite nix on the theatre televising and that Sherrill Corwin, whose Los Angeles Orpheum was the only house to carry the event, went ahead with his plans because he had sold a number of seats in advance.

Of particular interest to theatre TV proponents, meanwhile, was the fact that the Orpheum did near-SRO biz, grossing $1,600 at a $1.50 scale, though the game was played virtually in his backyard and was available on home TV in L. A. Fact that the house did such good biz with such competition should prove that big-screen TV has now established its lure to the paying public as one of the best

HITCHY, BERNSTEIN IN N.Y. PROD. HUDDLES

Alfred Hitchcock and Sidney Bernstein are huddling in New York on the future program of their Transatlantic indie unit, which releases through Warner Bros. They have about decided on a story and expect to get started on production in Hollywood within a month.

Hitchcock came east over the weekend with his wife primarily for the marriage of their daughter, Patricia, in Boston, Jan. 17. Miss Hitchcock has done both films and legit. She's marrying Joseph E. O'Connell, Jr. a textileman.

Bernstein, British circuit owner, arrived from London Christmas eve. He'll go back to the Coast with Hitchcock and remain in the U. S. while their pic is in production.

Zimbalist Again Locationing

Sam Zimbalist, producer of "Quo Vadis," is due in N. Y. from the Coast tomorrow (Thurs.) and sails Saturday for Europe on the Ile de France.

He'll set the preliminaries for his next for Metro, "Mogambo," Clark Gable starrer, to be lensed in Africa with some European players and technicians.

Stockholder Suit Shows Mayer Yet To Get M-G Coin

Louis B. Mayer has yet to collect for settlement of his Metro contract, which gave him a 10% ownership in all M-G films, while a stockholders' action against his and J. Robert Rubin's employment pacts has the immediate effect of jeopardizing the payoff.

M-G (or more specifically, Loew's, the parent organization) announced a few weeks ago that the Mayer contract had been brought to an end via settlement, but terms were not disclosed. It was tipped this week that Mayer has yet to actually collect.

Plaintiff in the suit is Gustave B. Garfield, as president of Geramy Holding Corp. The outfit, which owns 100 shares of Loew's common stock, claims that the Mayer and Rubin employment deals are in violation of the Security and Exchange Commission Act of 1934. Garfield is out to enjoin M-G from living up to its end of the Mayer contract terms on the charge that they were not given proper stockholders' approval.

Plaintiff believes Mayer's deal would give him over $2,000,000 as the value of his interest in all M-G pix produced while he was pro-

Petrillo Silent on TV Angles for New Pic Pact

James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, has been maintaining a characteristic silence regarding all television angles in a new contract with the film companies. Negotiations are slated to begin shortly on a new studio pact.

Whatever ideas Petrillo might have on possibly lifting the TV ban on pix are being kept under wraps, according to film execs. Present deal expires next Tuesday (15), but the likelihood is that it will be extended to allow for time to work out the new deal.

Marc Wolf on Bicycle

Marc J. Wolf, chief barker of Variety Clubs International, is in for a busy month being scheduled to preside at six functions in as many different cities. He officiated at installation of officers for the Chicago Variety Club at the Congress Hotel last Saturday (5).

Wolf jumped to Boston Monday (7) for dedication ceremonies of the Variety Children's Cancer Research Clinic and on Friday (11) is slated to attend the Chick Lewis Testimonial Dinner at the Hotel Astor, N. Y. He installs new officers and crew of the Indianapolis Tent Jan. 14, dittos at the Buffalo Tent Jan. 19 and speaks at the annual banquet of the Pittsburgh Tent Jan. 20.

Par Lunches Zukor

Adolph Zukor, Paramount board chairman, was the guest of all Par department heads, including president Barney Balaban, at a homeoffice luncheon in N. Y. Monday (7).

It was his 79th birthday.

HCL NOW SEEN AS MAJOR BOGEY

Whether TV has done something of a fade as a threat to pix, or whether exhibs are just getting used to the idea of living with the new medium, there's much less tendency currently for theatremen to blame video for their woes.

That's evident from a nationwide survey of exhib opinion made by VARIETY correspondents in key cities during the past several weeks. (First installment of the roundup ran in a recent issue).

There appears to be no tendency by theatremen to take the TV threat to their own futures less than seriously, but their approach lacks the hysterical and crisis proportions of past years. Exhibs seem somewhat resigned to a TV-infested future in which film houses will never again see the heydays of a 1946.

There's also a distinct indication in the exhib interviews that tele hasn't retained the hold it once had on audiences. A New Haven theatreman reports, for instance, that whereas tele used to kill all biz after 7:30 Sunday evenings, it doesn't take hold until 8:45 or thereabouts now.

If there's a tendency to blame

Pix Prexies Set Mid-Jan. Fla. Gabs

Prexies of major film companies will hold a general powwow in Miami Beach later this month. Date has been tentatively set for Jan. 18.

Talks will range over various industry problems, similar to those at huddles in Florida in past years. Many of the presidents will be in the resort city at the time, anyhow, which makes the locale convenient.

Eric Johnston, Motion Picture Assn. of America prexy, may fly south for the confabs, but it isn't certain yet. Topics for discussion include labor relations, public relations, foreign activities, cost structure in Hollywood and a wide range of other activities.

Quo Yo' All Goin'?

Washington, Jan. 8.

The balmy Dixie influence has gotten to Metro's super-dooper epic, "Quo Vadis?" Film's title translates in English to "Whither Goest Thou?"

However, word reaches here from the deep south that it's being explained down yonder as "Where Yo'all Goin'?".

Rackets Squad To Probe Payoffs On N.Y. Firemen

Investigation will be made later this year of bribes sought from theatres by Fire Dept. inspectors in New York, Asst. District Attorney Alfred Scotti, head of the Rackets Squad, said this week. Scotti stated he would go into the matter as soon as he concludes the prosecution on other charges against James A. Moran, former Fire Dept. official.

Regular weekly payoffs to fire inspectors came to light as a result of the controversy on "Ways of Love," Roberto Rossellini pix, at the Paris Theatre. While the film was under attack as "blasphemous" by the Catholic Church, house suddenly received a Fire Dept. summons for overcrowding.

In the ensuing hearings, testimony was presented by the Paris management that regular bribes were expected by inspectors and had been made from the time the house was opened. That brought plenty of whispers from other theatremen that all houses made such payoffs and had been doing so for so long they considered it part of the normal cost of doing business.

District Attorney Frank Hogan promised at the time that an investigation would be made as soon as his office had the time free.

National Boxoffice Survey

Post-Holiday Biz Still Hotsy; 'Dreams' New Champ, 'Quo Vadis' Next, 'Drums' 3d, 'Spy' Fourth

The sharp upbeat at the nation's first-runs Xmas-New Year's week still is considerably in evidence this session although a majority of theatres have holdover product or are playing extended-run. Despite most films being in second or third stanzas, current week will show more than $1,100,000 total gross for the five strongest pix in key cities covered by VARIETY.

"I'll See You in My Dreams" (WB) is taking over No. 1 spot nationally although virtually the first week out on release. The Danny Thomas-Doris Day starrer is rounding out a highly profitable five-week run at the N. Y. Music Hall today (Wed.), with better than $728,000 gross likely for run.

"Quo Vadis" (M-G), in first place for about a month, is slipping to second slot while "Distant Drums" (WB) is a very close third. "Drums" caught on from the outset, with some 17 playdates this week ranging largely from fine to smash or terrific. "Favorite Spy" (Par) is capturing fourth money with a long string of solid and sock sessions.

Fifth position is being taken over by "Westward the Women" (M-G) though its best dates are only rated nice. "Double Dynamite" (RKO) is winding up sixth but currently a bit spotty. "Decision Before Dawn" (20th) is finishing seventh while "Flame of Araby" (U) will be eighth. Latter caught on remarkably well after previous somewhat uneven results.

"Detective Story" (Par) is copping ninth place, with "Weekend With Father" (U) in 10th spot. "I Want You" (RKO), just getting under way, is taking 11th position while "10 Tall Men" (Col), with a flock of new dates, is landing in 12th.

"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep), "Elopement" (20th), "Two Tickets To Broadway" (RKO) and "Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G) are runner-up films in that sequence.

"Death of a Salesman" (Col) shapes as outstanding new film which is just getting under way. It is big both in N. Y. and L. A. "African Queen" (UA) currently is fine in L. A. "On Dangerous Ground" (RKO) looks nice in Frisco and Pittsburgh but light in Baltimore. "Model and Marriage Broker" (20th) is rated mild on holdover this week in L. A. but started well in first week.

"American in Paris" (M-G), with several fresh bookings, is adding three sock sessions to its former laurels this week. "Bright Victory" (U) shapes brisk in Louisville. "Never Forget You" (20th) is mild in Balto.

"Lavender Hill Mob" (U) is sock in K. C. and Pitt, big in Philly and great in N. Y. "Racket" (RKO) looks fast in Montreal.

"Starlift" (WB) is smart in Omaha and Frisco. "Fixed Bayonets" (20th) looms modest in Detroit.

Transfer of 50% Ownership, 100% Mgt. Of 'Healthy' UA Seen in Feb. by Krim

Actual transfer of 50% ownership and 100% of management control of United Artists to the group headed by Arthur B. Krim is expected in about 45 days, Krim said in N. Y. yesterday (Tues.). In what he described as another "progress report," UA's president confirmed that the outfit, according to preliminary auditing, finished 1951 with a "substantial profit." Subject to affirmation by Price, Waterhouse & Co., this means that 8,000 shares of UA's 16,000 common stock shares will be pocketed by Krim and his associates in the UA operation, with Mary Pickford and Charles Chaplin holding the balance of 4,000 shares each.

Profit the first year also assures the Krim group of 9 more years in the UA management saddle. That is in keeping with the terms of the deal with Miss Pickford and Chaplin.

While Krim insisted that vesting of the stock by himself and his partners still is contingent on the official Price, Waterhouse report, it was clear that the new UA toppers were confident of such confirmation. All members of the al-

Lippert Sez SAG, Crafts Brought on His Resolve To Fold Wings as Pic Angel

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Giving his recent battle with the Screen Actors Guild and craft unions as the reason, Robert L. Lippert disclosed yesterday (Mon.) that he is withdrawing from all future production financing. He had previously dropped his own producing activities.

Lippert said he'd concentrate in the future solely on distribution via Lippert Pictures, Inc., releasing company formed in 1948 as an outgrowth of Screen Guild after Lippert had bought out all SG franchises.

Withdrawal from financing will deprive Hollywood of $2,000,000

'Vadis' Easily Tops Dec. B.O. Stakes; 'Detective' 2d, '2 Tix' 3d, 'Paris' 4th

Despite the usual sluggish national boxoffice pace in December, there were some pix which made strong showings last month. While only five new films made the Top 12 list, many films that were unveiled as the month ended shaped up as potentially strong grossers for coming weeks.

"Quo Vadis" (M-G), fourth in November, easily set the pace in VARIETY's compilations for December. The spectacle finished first every week of the month by a great margi . "Detective Story" (Par), third the previous month, copped second, while "Two Tickets to Broadway" (RKO), seventh in November, wound up third last month.

"American in Paris" (M-G), champ in the two preceding months, wound up fourth in December with not too many new launchings. "Blue Veil" (RKO) duplicated its November standing by again finishing fifth while "Too Young to Kiss" (M-G) was sixth. "Fixed Bayonets" (20th), failing to display expected strength, wound up seventh.

"Lavender Hill Mob" (U), consistently strong all month despite the offish tone at the b.o., copped eighth place, never falling lower than 10th all month and being seventh and eighth on two weekly compilations. It is the first time a British-made pic has been this high on VARIETY's monthly listings in many months. It was a runner-up in November.

"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep) finished ninth, almost even with "Lavender," although being preemed during the worst pre-Xmas weeks. "The River" (UA), 11th in November, wound up 10th. "Tanks Are Coming" (WB) took 11th money. It was 10th the previous month. "Strange Door" (U) rounded out the Top 12 list.

"Submarine Command" (Par), "Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G),

TELEMETER DUE FOR COAST DEMONSTRATION

Demonstration of Telemeter for the trade is being planned in the next couple weeks. The subscription tele device, in which Paramount owns a half-interest, will be shown at Telemeter's plant on the Coast.

No special Federal Communications Commission permit will be required. Outfit already has a permit for field testing, which has been going on since last fall and is about completed. It is picking up special off-hour broadcasts from KTLA, Par's video station in Hollywood.

Talks are being held by Carl Leserman, who owns a chunk of Telemeter stock and is operating head of the company on the Coast, with people from various parts of the country who have shown an interest in franchising the device in their territory. Talks are preliminary, however, since no approach has even been made to the FCC yet for permission to broadcast the scrambled waves picked up by the coinbox machine.

It is believed likely that investments made by franchise-holders may be used to finance production of the device. If this can be worked out, it will probably be part of the pitch to the FCC. It may also eliminate going to the public with a stock issue, which was mentioned as a possibility in a brochure recently issued by Telemeter.

Poe Tours Exchanges

Seymour Poe, partner with Irving Lesser in Producers Representatives, Inc., leaves New York next Wednesday (16) for a tour of exchange cities that will wind him up in Los Angeles Feb. 1. At that time, he and Lesser, who will fly from New York, will meet with producer Sol Lesser.

Sessions will be devoted to future policy of PRI, which reps the producer on pix sales to both theatres and TV, and on Sol Lesser's own production activities. Poe's tour of RKO exchanges will be on behalf of number of Lesser pix, "Tarzan's Peril," "Tarzan's Savage Fury," "Kon-Tiki" and "Jungle Headhunters."

Hint Par May Get NPA Okay To Mfr. Color Tube

Washington, Jan. 8.

Hints are heard here that Paramount may be permitted by the National Production Authority to go ahead with manufacture of its color TV tube if the NPA can find itself a satisfactory face-saving formula. Entrance of Senator Edwin C. Johnson, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, into the picture reportedly has put the NPA on a spot that may help Par.

Johnson has written Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson, whose office heads the NPA, for an explanation of the ban about six weeks ago on production of tele equipment that can receive color. He is understood to have received no answer as yet, although he wrote several weeks ago.

Johnson's interest is believed to have been spurred by the Federal Communications Commission, which falls under the aegis of his Senate committee. FCC has for several years been pushing for early introduction of color and got quite a shock when NPA suddenly banned it under the guise of preservation of vital materials for defense.

Par has been bulldoggedly fighting to escape the freeze. It claims its Lawrence Chromatic tube uses no more strategic materials than black-and-white tubes and that at a meeting of manufacturers with Wilson several months ago it was agreed that NPA would make no effort to dictate what end products could be made from allocated materials.

To that end, Par's Washington attorney, Paul R. Porter, has been pushing the NPA for a reversal. The Government agency so far has been outwardly adamant against a change.

It is understood, however, that Johnson's interest, which might lead to embarrassing Congressional questioning, plus other factors which have arisen, have put NPA in a position where it may want to backtrack if it can do it gracefully.

Small, Ferry to Team As Pickman Sells Out

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Deal is on for Fefe Ferry to buy out Milton Pickman's share in the Ferry-Pickman talent agency here. Ferry will line up with Paul Small.

Negotiations are expected to be completed by next week, when Pickman returns from Europe, where he went on agency business.

Pickman, brother of Jerry Pickman, Paramount Pix veepee, is expected to join a pix-producing group when he severs from current connection.

4 Regional Sales Meets This Month for Rep

Republic will hold a series of four regional sales meetings this month. Prexy Herbert J. Yates will address each session.

Initial meet will be held at Rep's North Hollywood studios today (Wed.) and tomorrow (Thurs.). Second is set for the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago, Jan. 14-15, while the third will be held at the N. Y. homeoffice, Jan. 16-17. Meets wind up in New Orleans Jan. 21-22, where the final sesh is pencilled for the Jung Hotel.

'Gone' Tops Grossers

the $35,000,000 to $50,000,000 claimed for it.

Musicals led the way by far on the All-Time Top-Grossers list. Of the 88 pix included, 21 are straight tuners. Add to that six more musical biogs to give an idea of what hold song-and-dance has held on the American public's taste for entertainment.

On the other hand, pic patrons have also shown plenty of proclivity for straight drama. That's the second most-often-seen classification on the list, with 13 films. To that might be added many other sub-categories of drama. (Any classification of pix by type is loose, at best.)

The nine war dramas that appear on the list might be added to the 13 others. There are also five costume dramas and two religious dramas, plus a couple of mellers and three Biblical specs.

War Themes Profitable

That war has been a profitable theme for pix is seen by the nine war dramas plus two war comedies that have made the $4,000,000-or-over grade. That comedies on the whole have also had their appeal is evident in the count. Ten pix fall in the straight comedy category, plus the two war comedies, plus a quartet of comedies with music (not actually musicals).

Westerns also account for four of the films on the list, while five other pix fall in the general classification of "action." Feature cartoons (both by Disney) also make up two of the total count of 88 films.

Selznick appears to hold producer honors, with the first and third pix on the list, as well as with "Spellbound" and "Since You Went Away" down farther. Cecil B. DeMille figures prominently, too, with "Samson and Delilah" in fourth spot on the list and "Reap the Wild Wind" and "Unconquered" also on it.

Bing Crosby figures probably as the all-time top moneymaker for the industry among players. He's in no less than six of the pix in the over-$4,000,000 category. They include "Going My Way," "Welcome Stranger," "Blue Skies," "Road to Rio," "Road to Utopia" and "Emperor Waltz."

Irving Berlin appears prominently among contributors to big grosses. Four pix to which he contributed the tunes are high up on the list of the industry's all-time coin-grabbers. They include "This Is the Army" (in fifth position), "Blue Skies," "Annie Get Your Gun," and "Easter Parade."

Jolson's Trio

Al Jolson, too, holds some sort of record for three appearances on the list. They include the two biopix of late years, "The Jolson Story" and "Jolson Sings Again," plus a film that figured prominently in the birth of the talkers, "Singing Fool."

The list proves Metro to be by far the industry's most durable producer of moneymaking pix. It has 32 films among the Big 88—more than one-third of the entire list. In a photo finish for place position are Paramount and 20th-Fox, each with 13 entries. Here's the whole lineup:

All-Time Top-Grossers

Filmdom's "Golden Circle"—1952 edition—is presented below. It includes all of those pictures which have earned, or give promise of earning, a minimum of $4,000,000 in domestic (U. S. and Canada) film rentals. Foreign income is not included, since it cannot be accurately estimated on a dollar remittance standard.

Figures below are, in general, what the distribs have in the till to date, except in the case of 1951 releases. On the latter, estimates of final totals have been projected on the basis of a film's earnings up to the end of the year. Many of the films below will derive further income from reissues—and possibly much additional coin eventually from TV.

D. W. Griffith's 1915 smash, "The Birth of a Nation" (Mutual), belongs on the list, but exactly where is a question lost in nostalgia and unassembled records. Oldtimers in one way or another associated with the picture estimate its gross at from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000.

1.	Gone With the Wind (M-G) (1939)	$26,000,000
2.	Best Years Of Our Lives (RKO) (1947)	10,400,000
3.	Duel In the Sun (SRO) (1947)	10,000,000
4.	Samson & Delilah (Par) (1950)	9,000,000
5.	This Is the Army (WB) (1943)	8,500,000
6.	Bells of St. Mary's (RKO) (1946)	8,000,000
7.	Jolson Story (Col) (1947)	8,000,000
8.	David & Bathsheba (20th) (1951)	7,000,000
9.	Going My Way (Par) (1944)	6,500,000
10.	For Whom the Bell Tolls (Par) (1943)	6,300,000
11.	Welcome Stranger (Par) (1947)	6,100,000
12.	Snow White (RKO) (1937)	6,000,000
13.	Sergeant York (WB) (1941)	6,000,000
14.	Blue Skies (Par) (1946)	5,700,000
15.	Egg and I (U) (1947)	5,550,000
16.	Leave Her to Heaven (20th) (1945)	5,550,000

'LONG PURSE' NO DISTRIB BOGEY

Lesser, Small Reach Friendly Split, Both TV, UA Projects Fall Through

Sol Lesser and Edward Small have discovered that a Hollywood partnership is not for them. They've both come to the conclusion—reportedly a perfectly friendly one—that they are apparently each too set in their own ways of wealth, success and habit to join forces at this late date.

As a result, two projects in which they were planning to join forces are understood to have been called off. One was for a combine to produce and distribute their pix to tele, while the other called for them to join with Sam Briskin in a three-way amalgamation to turn out pix for United Artists release.

TV agency, Peerless Television Productions, was established three months ago by Small with the expectation that Lesser would join him providing pix and running the operation. Pair joined in hiring George Shupert away from Paramount, where he was guiding TV sales, to head Peerless.

While Lesser's withdrawal leaves Peerless without the valuable backlog of product he could provide, it ill continue otherwise on its original operating pattern. Small will be principal stockholder, with Shupert holding a minority interest and other producers also being offered stock participation. Latter will include producers with pix backlogs they are willing to throw in the pot and producers who will turn out special tele material.

Actually, Lesser only tossed in two of his own pix—"Red House"

D.C. MPAA Asks Weekly 'Diary' From Staffers

Washington, Jan. 8.

Washington office of the Motion Picture Assn. of America has instituted a new system which requires execs and staff members to turn in detailed weekly reports of their activities. Staffers, with lone exception of Joyce O'Hara, who heads the Washington operation, must outline in detail how they spent their time, what they did, whom they saw, etc.

Those in the local office obligated to make reports include Jack Bryson, chief lobbyist; Jerry Cahill, his assistant; Norman Kuehne, the new D. C. pressagent and speech writer; Edward Cooper, just hired from the Senate Democratic policy committee to handle television and Senate contacts; Cecil Dickson, listed as assistant to the veepee (O'Hara), who handles House contacts and is registered as an MPAA lobbyist; Roger Albright, director of the educational division of MPAA; Stanley McIntosh, associate-director of education; Col. Robert T. McDonnell, who was until recently manager of the Washington office and has done embassy contact work, but who is

High Court Refuses To Hear Sutphin Appeal

Washington, Jan. 8.

Supreme Court last week rehear the appeal by Sutphin Estates that it be permitted to intervene in th Warner Bros. antitrust decree. Sutphin owns the Warner Theatre property in New York which WB circuit has on long lease. Sutphin claims that in the decree its rights were not properly protected, and it wants the case reopened for addition assurance that the lease is financially protected for its full term.

Supreme Court heard an appeal last fall. Then it turned down Sutphin's contention and left the decree unchanged. The new refusal comes in answer to a subsequent request by Sutphin that the Supreme Court hear the matter anew.

Blumberg to the Coast

Universal prez Nate J. Blumberg will head from New York for the Coast at the end of this month. He'll be accompanied by Mrs. Blumberg. Plan is for them to remain for several months, at least. Probably only important confabs on the proposed merger of U with Decca Records, which owns controlling interest in the company, will bring him back east.

Blumberg is recuperating at his home from a long hospital siege. He'll continue to be out of his office, under doctor's orders, until he leaves for Hollywood.

Decca Working Out Reorg For Merger With U

Decca attorneys, reportedly in collaboration with Serge Semenenko, are said to be working out a reorganization plan by which the record company would be merged into Universal Pictures. Decca recently acquired controlling interest in U.

Semenenko's interest in the merger results from his position as banker for both companies. He's v.p. of the First National Bank of Boston and was instrumental in bringing about the stock purchase by which Decca obtained U control.

J. Arthur Rank, whose position as second largest stockholder to Decca may make him a key figure in passage of any reorg plan, has given no hint as yet of his position. Rank's U. S. rep, Robert S. Benjamin, said this week that no plan or indication of a plan had yet been presented for perusal by the British film tycoon.

"We can't possibly take a position, one way or the other," Benjamin explained, "until we have something to take a position on. Our attitude will not be determined until we have studied any proposals that are made. So far there have been none."

Merger plan would have to be okayed by two-thirds of the shareholders of each company. Rank

See Personnel Changes In Par Sales at Meet Slated for Next Week

Personnel changes just short of the top echelon are expected when Paramount opens its division sales managers meeting at the Hotel Plaza, N. Y., next Monday (14). Session will go two days at least, possibly a third.

A. W. Schwalberg, distribution chief, will preside at the conclave, which will be attended by board chairman Adolph Zukor, president Barney Balaban, all homeoffice department toppers and the division chiefs. The territorial heads are Hugh Owen, Howard Minsky, Duke Clark, J. J. Donohue, George Smith and Gordon Lightstone.

Schwalberg, president of Paramount Distributing Corp., and E. K. O'Shea, . p. of the subsid outfit, will be unaffected by the anticipated new personnel setup.

Convention will concern itself with all new product from the selling end. Jerry Pickman, ad-pub director, will discuss promotion angles. This will be the first such session for Pickman in his role as v.p. and Par Distributing board member. He was elected an officer of the outfit about 10 days ago.

Repping production at the sales huddle will be Y. Frank Freeman, studio boss, who arrives in N. Y. from the Coast this week.

FEARS ALLAYED ON OVERBIDDING

Fear that the "long purse" would prevail under competitive bidding has not materialized, distribution execs have agreed in looking back over the five-year operation of the system. At least one distrib, however, was prepared with a unique antidote for overbidding had it become a problem.

Concern of distribs when the bidding system was instituted at the end of 1946 was the "long purse" theory. That was that an exhib who was better heeled—or more ready to spend money—than his competition would make excessive offers for film, just to keep it away from opposing houses.

Net result could have been that the fellow with the "long purse" might put his competitors out of business by snatching up product. He would do a dog-in-the-manger, sometimes paying for pix and never actually playing them.

Even worse than that from the distributor's standpoint was the possibility that exhibs would overbuy, and thus, with more films than they could use, never book a pic. The distrib could wait indefinitely—or forever—before he'd get paid even his minimum rental guarantee.

It was to meet such a situation that RKO attorneys developed a formula. They've never had to let it out of the box, however, because the situation never arose to any significant degree.

Scheme was, in inviting bids, to set a reasonable maximum on monetary terms that exhibs could offer. That would leave as the only point on which one theatre could top another the amount of playing time offered.

Exhib couldn't bid unless he had actual playing time to give pix and would name the approximate starting date. This would effectively cut off his buying too many.

Though this one major evil has

W-K Renews RKO Lease for Year

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Wald-Krasna are remaining at RKO for another year, during which the team will make eight more features, following Howard Hughes' approval of a continuance agreement reached by studio manager C. J. Tevlin in huddles with attorney David Tannenbaum and Lew Wasserman, repping W-K. Hughes already has okayed start of "High Heels," "Size 12," "Strike A Match" and "I Married A Woman," for as soon as the cast toppers are secured.

Wald functions executive producer with Krasna writing and directing two features in addition to working on other scripts. First is expected to be ready for May start. Each continues as partners in W-K, drawing salaries of $2,500 weekly and sharing in 50% profit on their pix as provided in their original contract.

Although deal on whole gives the team what they wanted, Hughes still retains approval of properties and casts. It's indicated, however, that the producers will get speedy decisions on latter. Unit has completed three films and has one shooting.

WB's 6-Mo. Deferment On Theatre Divorcement

Washington, Jan. 8.

Warner Bros. has been given a six months' extension for divestiture of the group of theatres scheduled to be sold away from the WB Theatre chain during the first year of the company's antitrust decree. The one-year limit expired at the beginning of this month.

Justice Department, which has been reasonable about granting extensions to antitrust defendants showing good faith, had no trouble agreeing to the extension.

Johnston Calls FCC Hearings on TV No. 1 Industry Problem; Cancels Trek

Most important immediate problem facing the industry is the hearings before the Federal Communications Commission on channels for theatre TV, Eric Johnston said yesterday (Tues.). He made the observation in explanation of cancellation of his plans for a monthlong Latin American tour slated to begin next week.

Motion Picture Assn. of America prez said that a tremendous amount of work remained to prepare the industry's case for presentation in four weeks. He will be the lead-off witness.

"It's a particularly important issue," he explained, "since many people feel that if we don't get the channels at this time we'll be forever estopped."

Despite this pressure, MPAA topper revealed that he may make a one-week trip to Brazil and Uruguay at the end of January. Rio stopoff would be in an effort to ameliorate new restrictions on American films which have been decreed by the Brazilian government.

Uruguay jaunt would be to attend the film festival at Punte del Este. Johnston said he was under pressure from both the State Dept. and the Ambassador in Uruguay to make the trip.

"If we expect cooperation from the State Dept. we must also give some," he asserted.

Unified Front

Various facets of the industry have been cooperating in preparation of a unified front at the FCC

Foreclose 'Man-Eater'

Los Angeles, Jan. 8.

Foreclosure suit on "Man-Eater of Kumaon," produced by Monty Shaff for Universal-International release in 1948, was filed by Pacific Finance, which put up second money, amounting to 15%.

Company also foreclosed on the Sam Bischoff indie, "Intrigue," for which it put up second coin. Bank of America was paid off for its first money on the picture but a PF spokesman said second money has not been forthcoming.

20th Sets 36 Pix For 1952 Release; Sales Dept. Shifts

Total of 36 productions have been set by 20th-Fox for 1952 release, representing the first time that the outfit has set a full year's schedule in advance. Lineup was presented to 20th's N. Y. sales convention by Al Lichtman, distribution topper, yesterday (Tues.).

With one-third of the roster in color, films will be delivered months in advance so that longterm promotion campaigns may be worked out, it was said. Extensive releasing sked is attributable to the "highly geared production pace which has been maintained at the studio." Sked includes five outside productions to be released by 20th.

Company's conclave got underway Monday (7) with announcement by Lichtman of some personnel realignment. Edwin W. Aaron and Arthur Silverstone, eastern and western sales managers, respectively, have been named assistant general sales managers. Aaron will be responsible for the detail operation of all sales throughout the U. S., and Silverstone will supervise all circuit and key city sales as well as the Canadian branches.

William C. Gehring, formerly assistant sales chief, has been upped to executive assistant sales manager, continuing to assist Lichtman in all matters pertaining to the operation of the distribution department.

Glenn Norris was upped from Washington branch manager to head of a newly-formed Atlantic division comprising Washington, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. Joseph Rosen heads the Washington office and Robert McNabb succeeds Rosen as Cincinnati sales manager, Marvin Doris, formerly Atlanta salesman, will manage the new Jacksonville, Fla., exchange.

MPAA Enlarging Scope Of Research Department Under Griffith Johnson

Motion Picture Assn. of America will enlarge the scope of its research activity, particularly on the economics of foreign countries, prexy Eric Johnston disclosed in New York yesterday (Tues.). Department will be in charge of a newcomer to the staff, Griffith Johnson. He formerly was an economist with the ESA.

Johnson replaces Robert Chambers, who resigned about a year-and-a-half ago. While Chambers built up the record of domestic activities of MPAA member companies, Johnson's research tentacles will be aimed abroad.

Reason, Johnston said, is experience has shown the industry has been able to head off legislation and get maximum coin out of various countries by having all possible advance info their economic trends.

Newsreels Quit Brazil as Reply To Pic % Edict

Newsreel companies have discontinued the shipment of films to Brazil, John G. McCarthy, director of the international division of th Motion Picture Assn. of America, disclosed in New York yesterday (Tues.).

Move is a retaliatory measure resulting from the implementation last Friday (4) of a decree which has been on the government books of Brazil since last December. Latter provides that for each eight weeks of playing time for a foreign pic, there must be one week given to the showing of native product. However, this section of the decree has been inoperative. One reason is that not enough native films have been available.

Section of ukase which brought about MPAA action concerned importation of newsreel, travelog and documentary footage. Brazil regulation provides that for all footage imported, 10% Brazilian product in that category must be taken in return. This regulation was enforced for the first time last Friday and resulted in the action taken by the newsreel companies.

Newsreel outfits the U. S. agree that Brazil may turn out enough news films, but that th

Frank McNamee Named Fire Commish of Philly

Philadelphia, Jan. 8.

Frank L. McNamee, former president of United Artists and a partner in an Eastern Pennsylvania film house chain, has been named fire commissioner of Philadelphia, one of the first appointments of the newly elected Democratic Mayor Joseph Sill Clark, Jr.

During World War II, McNamee served as War Manpower Commissioner and later became War Assets Administrator in the Philadelphia area. He also is treasurer of the Philadelphia Eagles, pro football club.

'Vadis' Easily Tops Dec. B.O. Stakes; 'Detective' 2d, '2 Tix' 3d, 'Paris' 4th

Despite the usual sluggish national boxoffice pace in December, there were some pix which made strong showings last month. While only five new films made the Top 12 list, many films that were unveiled as the month ended shaped up as potentially strong grossers for coming weeks.

"Quo Vadis" (M-G), fourth in November, easily set the pace in VARIETY's compilations for December. The spectacle finished first every week of the month by a great margi "Detective Story" (Par), third the previous month, copped second, while "Two Tickets to Broadway" (RKO), seventh in November, wound up third last month.

"American in Paris" (M-G), champ in the two preceding months, wound up fourth in December with not too many new launchings. "Blue Veil" (RKO) duplicated its November standing by again finishing fifth while "Too Young to Kiss" (M-G) was sixth. "Fixed Bayonets" (20th), failing to display expected strength, wound up seventh.

"Lavender Hill Mob" (U), consistently strong all month despite the offish tone at the b.o., copped eighth place, never falling lower than 10th all month and being seventh and eighth on two weekly compilations. It is the first time a British-made pic has been this high on VARIETY's monthly listings in many months. It was a runner-up in November.

"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep) finished ninth, almost even with "Lavender," although being preemed during the worst pre-Xmas weeks. "The River" (UA), 11th in November, wound up 10th. "Tanks Are Coming" (WB) took 11th money. It was 10th the previous month. "Strange Door" (U) rounded out the Top 12 list.

"Submarine Command" (Par), "Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G),

TELEMETER DUE FOR COAST DEMONSTRATION

Demonstration of Telemeter for the trade is being planned in the next couple weeks. The subscription tele device, in which Paramount owns a half-interest, will be shown at Telemeter's plant on the Coast.

No special Federal Communications Commission permit will be required. Outfit already has a permit for field testing, which has been going on since last fall and is about completed. It is picking up special off-hour broadcasts from KTLA, Par's video station in Hollywood.

Talks are being held by Carl Leserman, who owns a chunk of Telemeter stock and is operating head of the company on the Coast, with people from various parts of the country who have shown an interest in franchising the device in their territory. Talks are preliminary, however, since no approach has even been made to the FCC yet for permission to broadcast the scrambled waves picked up by the coinbox machine.

It is believed likely that investments made by franchise-holders may be used to finance production of the device. If this can be worked out, it will probably be part of the pitch to the FCC. It may also eliminate going to the public with a stock issue, which was mentioned as a possibility in a brochure recently issued by Telemeter.

Poe Tours Exchanges

Seymour Poe, partner with Irving Lesser in Producers Representatives, Inc., leaves New York next Wednesday (16) for a tour of exchange cities that will wind him up in Los Angeles Feb. 1. At that time, he and Lesser, who will fly from New York, will meet with producer Sol Lesser.

Sessions will be devoted to future policy of PRI, which reps the producer on pix sales to both theatres and TV, and on Sol Lesser's own production activities. Poe's tour of RKO exchanges will be on behalf of number of Lesser pix, "Tarzan's Peril," "Tarzan's Savage Fury," "Kon-Tiki" and "Jungle Headhunters."

Hint Par May Get NPA Okay To Mfr. Color Tube

Washington, Jan. 8.

Hints are heard here that Paramount may be permitted by the National Production Authority to go ahead with manufacture of its color TV tube if the NPA can find itself a satisfactory face-saving formula. Entrance of Senator Edwin C. Johnson, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, into the picture reportedly has put the NPA on a spot that may help Par.

Johnson has written Defense Mobilizer Charles E. Wilson, whose office heads the NPA, for an explanation of the ban about six weeks ago on production of tele equipment that can receive color. He is understood to have received no answer as yet, although he wrote several weeks ago.

Johnson's interest is believed to have been spurred by the Federal Communications Commission, which falls under the aegis of his Senate committee. FCC has for several years been pushing for early introduction of color and got quite a shock when NPA suddenly banned it under the guise of preservation of vital materials for defense.

Par has been bulldoggedly fighting to escape the freeze. It claims its Lawrence Chromatic tube uses no more strategic materials than black-and-white tubes and that at a meeting of manufacturers with Wilson several months ago it was agreed that NPA would make no effort to dictate what end products could be made from allocated materials.

To that end, Par's Washington attorney, Paul R. Porter, has been pushing the NPA for a reversal. The Government agency so far has been outwardly adamant against a change.

It is understood, however, that Johnson's interest, which might lead to embarrassing Congressional questioning, plus other factors which have arisen, have put NPA in a position where it may want to backtrack if it can do it gracefully.

Small, Ferry to Team As Pickman Sells Out

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Deal is on for Fefe Ferry to buy out Milton Pickman's share in the Ferry-Pickman talent agency here. Ferry will line up with Paul Small.

Negotiations are expected to be completed by next week, when Pickman returns from Europe, where he went on agency business.

Pickman, brother of Jerry Pickman, Paramount Pix veepee, is expected to join a pix-producing group when he severs from current connection.

4 Regional Sales Meets This Month for Rep

Republic will hold a series of four regional sales meetings this month. Prexy Herbert J. Yates will address each session.

Initial meet will be held at Rep's North Hollywood studios today (Wed.) and tomorrow (Thurs.). Second is set for the Blackstone Hotel, Chicago, Jan. 14-15, while the third will be held at the N. Y. homeoffice, Jan. 16-17. Meets wind up in New Orleans Jan. 21-22, where the final sesh is pencilled for the Jung Hotel.

'Gone' Tops Grossers

the $85,000,006 to $50,000,000 claimed for it.

Musicals led the way by far on the All-Time Top-Grossers list. Of the 88 pix included, 21 are straight tuners. Add to that six more musical biogs to give an idea of what hold song-and-dance has held on the American public's taste for entertainment.

On the other hand, pic patrons have also shown plenty of proclivity for straight drama. That's the second most-often-seen classification on the list, with 13 films. To that might be added many other sub-categories of drama. (Any classification of pix by type is loose, at best.)

The nine war dramas that appear on the list might be added to the 13 others. There are also five costume dramas and two religious dramas, plus a couple of mellers and three Biblical specs.

War Themes Profitable

That war has been a profitable theme for pix is seen by the nine war dramas plus two war comedies that have made the $4,000,000-or-over grade. That comedies on the whole have also had their appeal is evident in the count. Ten pix fall in the straight comedy category, plus the two war comedies, plus a quartet of comedies with music (not actually musicals).

Westerns also account for four of the films on the list, while five other pix fall in the general classification of "action." Feature cartoons (both by Disney) also make up two of the total count of 88 films.

Selznick appears to hold producer honors, with the first and third pix on the list, as well as with "Spellbound" and "Since You Went Away" down farther. Cecil B. DeMille figures prominently, too, with "Samson and Delilah" in fourth spot on the list and "Reap the Wild Wind" and "Unconquered" also on it.

Bing Crosby figures probably as the all-time top moneymaker for the industry among players. He's in no less than six of the pix in the over-$4,000,000 category. They include "Going My Way," "Welcome Stranger," "Blue Skies," "Road to Rio," "Road to Utopia" and "Emperor Waltz."

Irving Berlin appears prominently among contributors to big grosses. Four pix to which he contributed the tunes are high up on the list of the industry's all-time coin-grabbers. They include "This Is the Army" (in fifth position), "Blue Skies," "Annie Get Your Gun," and "Easter Parade."

Jolson's Trio

Al Jolson, too, holds some sort of record for three appearances on the list. They include the two biopix of late years, "The Jolson Story" and "Jolson Sings Again," plus a film that figured prominently in the birth of the talkers, "Singing Fool."

The list proves Metro to be by far the industry's most durable producer of moneymaking pix. It has 32 films among the Big 88—more than one-third of the entire list. In a photo finish for place position are Paramount and 20th-Fox, each with 13 entries. Here's the whole lineup:

All-Time Top-Grossers

Filmdom's "Golden Circle"—1952 edition—is presented below. It includes all of those pictures which have earned, or give promise of earning, a minimum of $4,000,000 in domestic (U. S. and Canada) film rentals. Foreign income is not included, since it cannot be accurately estimated on a dollar remittance standard.

Figures below are, in general, what the distribs have in the till to date, except in the case of 1951 releases. On the latter, estimates of final totals have been projected on the basis of a film's earnings up to the end of the year. Many of the films below will derive further income from reissues—and possibly much additional coin eventually from TV.

D. W. Griffith's 1915 smash, "The Birth of a Nation" (Mutual), belongs on the list, but exactly where is a question lost in nostalgia and unassembled records. Oldtimers in one way or another associated with the picture estimate its gross at from $35,000,000 to $50,000,000.

'LONG PURSE' NO DISTRIB BOGEY

Lesser, Small Reach Friendly Split, Both TV, UA Projects Fall Through

Sol Lesser and Edward Small have discovered that a Hollywood partnership not for them. They've both come to the conclusion—reportedly a perfectly friendly one—that they are apparently each too set in their own ways of wealth, success and habit to join forces at this late date.

As a result, two projects in which they were planning to join forces are understood to have been called off. One was for a combine to produce and distribute their pix to tele, while the other called for them to join with Sam Briskin in a three-way amalgamation to turn out pix for United Artists release.

TV agency, Peerless Television Productions, was established three months ago by Small with the expectation that Lesser would join him providing pix and running the operation. Pair joined in hiring George Shupert away from Paramount, where he was guiding TV sales, to head Peerless.

While Lesser's withdrawal leaves Peerless without the valuable backlog of product he could provide, it will continue otherwise on its original operating pattern. Small will be principal stockholder, with Shupert holding a minority interest and other producers also being offered stock participation. Latter will include producers with pix backlogs they are willing to throw in the pot and producers who will turn out special tele material.

Actually, Lesser only tossed in two of his own pix—"Red House"

D.C. MPAA Asks Weekly 'Diary' From Staffers

Washington, Jan. 8.

Washington office of the Motion Picture Assn. of America has instituted a new system which requires execs and staff members to turn in detailed weekly reports of their activities. Staffers, with lone exception of Joyce O'Hara, who heads the Washington operation, must outline in detail how they spent their time, what they did, whom they saw, etc.

Those in the local office obligated to make reports include Jack Bryson, chief lobbyist; Jerry Cahill, his assistant; Norman Kuehne, the new D. C. pressagent and speech writer; Edward Cooper, just hired from the Senate Democratic policy committee to handle television and Senate contacts; Cecil Dickson, listed as assistant to the veepee (O'Hara), who handles House contacts and is registered as an MPAA lobbyist; Roger Albright, director of the educational division of MPAA; Stanley McIntosh, associate-director of education; Col. Robert T. McDonnell, who was until recently manager of the Washington office and has done mbassy contact work, but who is

Washington, Jan. 8.

Supreme Court last week rehear the appeal by Sutphin Estates that it be permitted to intervene in the Warner Bros. antitrust decree. Sutphin owns the Warner Theatre property in New York which WB circuit has on long lease. Sutphin claims that in the decree its rights were not properly protected, and it wants the case reopened for addition assurance that the lease is financially protected for its full term.

Supreme Court heard an appeal last fall. Then it turned down Sutphin's contention and left the decree unchanged. The new refusal comes in answer to a subsequent request by Sutphin that the Supreme Court hear the matter anew.

Blumberg to the Coast

Universal prez Nate J. Blumberg will head from New York for the Coast at the end of this month. He'll be accompanied by Mrs. Blumberg. Plan is for them to remain for several months, at least. Probably only important confabs on the proposed merger of U with Decca Records, which owns controlling interest in the company, will bring him back east.

Blumberg is recuperating at his home from a long hospital siege. He'll continue to be out of his office, under doctor's orders, until he leaves for Hollywood.

Decca Working Out Reorg For Merger With U

Decca attorneys, reportedly in collaboration with Serge Semenenko, are said to be working out a reorganization plan by which the record company would be merged into Universal Pictures. Decca recently acquired controlling interest in U.

Semenenko's interest the merger results from his position as banker for both companies. He's v.p. of the First National Bank of Boston and was instrumental in bringing about the stock purchase by which Decca obtained U control.

J. Arthur Rank, whose position as second largest stockholder to Decca may make him a key figure in passage of any reorg plan, has given no hint as yet of his position. Rank's U. S. rep, Robert S. Benjamin, said this week that no plan or indication of a plan had yet been presented for perusal by the British film tycoon.

"We can't possibly take a position, one way or the other," Benjamin explained, "until we have something to take a position on. Our attitude will not be determined until we have studied any proposals that are made. So far there have been none." ....

Merger plan would have to be okayed by two-thirds of the shareholders of each company. Rank

See Personnel Changes In Par Sales at Meet Slated for Next Week

Personnel changes just short of the top echelon are expected when Paramount opens its division sales managers meeting at the Hotel Plaza, N. Y., next Monday (14). Session will go two days at least, possibly a third.

A. W. Schwalberg, distribution chief, will preside at the conclave, which will be attended by board chairman Adolph Zukor, president Barney Balaban, all homeoffice department toppers and the division chiefs. The territorial heads are Hugh Owen, Howard Minsky, Duke Clark, J. J. Donohue, George Smith and Gordon Lightstone.

Schwalberg, president of Paramount Distributing Corp., and E. K. O'Shea, v. p. of the subsid outfit, will be unaffected by the anticipated new personnel setup.

Convention will concern itself with all new product from the selling end. Jerry Pickman, ad-pub director, will discuss promotion angles. This will be the first such session for Pickman in his role as v.p. and Par Distributing board member. He was elected an officer of the outfit about 10 days ago.

Repping production at the sales huddle will be Y. Frank Freeman, studio boss, who arrives in N. Y. from the Coast this week.

FEARS ALLAYED ON OVERBIDDING

Fear that the "long purse" would prevail under competitive bidding has not materialized, distribution execs have agreed in looking back over the five-year operation of the system. At least one distrib, however, was prepared with a unique antidote for overbidding had it become problem.

Concern of distribs when the bidding system was instituted at the end of 1946 was the "long purse" theory. That was that an exhib who was better heeled—or more ready to spend money—than his competition would make excessive offers for film, just to keep it away from opposing houses.

Net result could have been that the fellow with the "long purse" might put his competitors out of business by snatching up product. He would do a dog-in-the-manger, sometimes paying for pix and never actually playing them.

Even worse than that from the distributor's standpoint was the possibility that exhibs would overbuy, and thus, with more films than they could use, never book a pic. The distrib could wait indefinitely—or forever—before he'd get paid even his minimum rental guarantee.

It was to meet such a situation that RKO attorneys developed a formula. They've never had to let it out of the box, however, because the situation never arose to any significant degree.

Scheme was, in inviting bids, to set a reasonable maximum on monetary terms that exhibs could offer. That would leave as the only point on which one theatre could top another the amount of playing time offered.

Exhib couldn't bid unless he had actual playing time to give pix and would name the approximate starting date. This would effectively cut off his buying too many.

Though this one major evil has

W-K Renews RKO Lease for Year

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Wald-Krasna are remaining at RKO for another year, during which the team will make eight more features, following Howard Hughes' approval of a continuance agreement reached by studio manager C. J. Tevlin in huddles with attorney David Tannenbaum and Lew Wasserman, repping W-K. Hughes already has okayed start of "High Heels," "Size 12," "Strike A Match" and "I Married A Woman," for as soon as the cast toppers are secured.

Wald functions as executive producer with Krasna writing and directing two features in addition to working on other scripts. First is expected to be ready for May start. Each continues as partners in W-K, drawing salaries of $2,500 weekly and sharing in 50% profit on their pix as provided in their original contract.

Although deal on whole gives the team what they wanted, Hughes still retains approval of properties and casts. It's indicated, however, that the producers will get speedy decisions on latter. Unit has completed three films and has one shooting.

WB's 6-Mo. Deferment On Theatre Divorcement

Washington, Jan. 8.

Warner Bros. has been given a six months' extension for divestiture of the group of theatres scheduled to be sold away from the WB Theatre chain during the first year of the company's antitrust decree. The one-year limit expired at the beginning of this month.

Justice Department, which has been reasonable about granting extensions to antitrust defendants showing good faith, had no trouble agreeing to the extension.

Johnston Calls FCC Hearings on TV No. 1 Industry Problem; Cancels Trek

Most important immediate problem facing the industry is the hearings before the Federal Communications Commission on channels for theatre TV, Eric Johnston said yesterday (Tues.). He made the observation in explanation of cancellation of his plans for a month-long Latin American tour slated to begin next week.

Motion Picture Assn. of America prez said that tremendous amount of work remained to prepare the industry's case for presentation in four weeks. He will be the lead-off witness.

"It's a particularly important issue," he explained, "since many people feel that if we don't get the channels at this time we'll be forever estopped."

Despite this pressur MPAA topper revealed that he may make a one-week trip to Brazil and Uruguay at the end of January. Rio stopoff would be in an effort to ameliorate new restrictions on American films which have been decreed by the Brazilian government.

Uruguay jaunt would be to attend the film festival at Punte del Este. Johnston said he was under pressure from both the State Dept. and the Ambassador in Uruguay to make the trip.

"If we expect cooperation from the State Dept. we must also give some," he asserted.

Various facets of the industry have been cooperating in preparation of a unified front at the FCC

Foreclose 'Man-Eater'

Los Angeles, Jan. 8.

Foreclosure suit on "Man-Eater of Kumaon," produced by Monty Shaff for Universal-International release in 1948, was filed by Pacific Finance, which put up second money, amounting to 15%

Company also foreclosed on the Sam Bischoff indie, "Intrigue," for which it put up second coin. Bank of America was paid off for its first money on the picture but a PF spokesman said second money has not been forthcoming.

20th Sets 36 Pix For 1952 Release; Sales Dept. Shifts

Total of 36 productions have been set by 20th-Fox for 1952 release, representing the first time that the outfit has set a full year's schedule in advance. Lineup was presented to 20th's N. Y. sales convention by Al Lichtman, distribution topper, yesterday (Tues.).

With one-third of the roster in color, films will be delivered months in advance so that long-term promotion campaigns may be worked out, it was said. Extensive releasing sked is attributable to the "highly geared production pace which has been maintained at the studio." Sked includes five outside productions to be released by 20th.

Company's conclave got underway Monday (7) with announcement by Lichtman of some personnel realignment. Edwin W. Aaron and Arthur Silverstone, eastern and western sales managers, respectively, have been named assistant general sales managers. Aaron will be responsible for the detail operation of all sales throughout the U. S., and Silverstone will supervise all circuit and key city sales as well the Canadian branches.

William C. Gehring, formerly assistant sales chief, has been upped to executive assistant sales manager, continuing to assist Lichtman in all matters pertaining to the operation of the distribution department.

Glenn Norris was upped from Washington branch manager to head of a newly-formed Atlantic division comprising Washington, Pittsburgh and Philadelphia. Joseph Rosen heads the Washington office and Robert McNabb succeeds Rosen as Cincinnati sales manager, Marvin Doris, formerly Atlanta salesman, will manage the new Jacksonville, Fla., exchange.

MPAA Enlarging Scope Of Research Department Under Griffith Johnson

Motion Picture Assn. of America will enlarge the scope of its research activity, particularly on the economics of foreign countries, prexy Eric Johnston disclosed in New York yesterday (Tues.). Department will be in charge of a newcomer to the staff, Griffith Johnson. He formerly was an economist with the ESA.

Johnson replaces Robert Chambers, who resigned about a year-and-a-half ago. While Chambers built up the record of domestic activities of MPAA member companies, Johnson's research tentacles will be aimed abroad.

Reason, Johnston said, is experience has shown the industry has been able to head off legislation and get maximum coin out of various countries by having all possible advance info on their economic trends.

Newsreels Quit Brazil as Reply To Pic % Edict

Newsreel companies have discontinued the shipment of films to Brazil, John G. McCarthy, director of the international division of the Motion Picture Assn. of America, disclosed in New York yesterday (Tues.).

Move is a retaliatory measure resulting from the implementation last Friday (4) of a decree which has been on the government books of Brazil since last December. Latter provides that for each eight weeks of playing time for a foreign pic, there must be one week given to the showing of native product. However, this section of the decree has been inoperative. One reason is that not enough native films have been available.

Section of ukase which brought about MPAA action concerned importation of newsreel, travelog and documentary footage. Brazil regulation provides that for all footage imported, 10% Brazilian product in that category must be taken in return. This regulation was enforced for the first time last Friday and resulted the action taken by the newsreel companies.

Newsreel outfits the U. S. agree that Brazil may turn out enough news films, but that th

Frank McNamee Named Fire Commish of Philly

Philadelphia, Jan. 8.

Frank L. McNamee, former president of United Artists and a partner in an Eastern Pennsylvania film house chain, has been named fire commissioner of Philadelphi , one of the first appointments of the newly elected Democratic Mayor Joseph Sill Clark, Jr.

During World War II, McNamee served as War Manpower Commissioner and later became War Assets Administrator in the Philadelphia area. He also is treasurer of the Philadelphia Eagles, pro football club.

The Las Vegas Story
(SONGS)

Fair romance-murder meller laid in Las Vegas but obscurely motivated. Jane Russell, Victor Mature and spotty b.o. outlook.

Hollywood, Jan. 1.

RKO release of Robert Sparks production. Stars Jane Russell, Victor Mature, Vincent Price; features Hoagy Carmichael, Brad Dexter, Gordon Oliver, Jay C. Flippen. Directed by Robert Stevenson. Screenplay, Earl Felton, Harry Essex; based on story by Jay Dratler; camera, Harry J. Wild; editor, George Shrader, Frederic Knudtson; music, Leigh Harline; songs Hoagy Carmichael, Harold Adamson. Tradeshown Dec. 27, '51. Running time, 87 MINS.

Linda Rollins	Jane Russell
Dave Andrew	Victor Mature
Lloyd Rollins	Vincent Price
Happy	Hoagy Carmichael
Thomas Hubler	Brad Dexter
Drucker	Gordon Oliver
Harris	Jay C. Flippen
Fogarty	Will Wright
Martin	Bill Welsh
Desk Clerk	Ray Montgomery
Mary	Colleen Miller
Clayton	Robert Wilke

Only a fair amount of melodrama entertainment is cooked up in this Jane Russell-Victor Mature starrer. The hard-boiled nature of its characters and the star teaming, however, supply sufficient ad-ballyhoo factors to help regular bookings in the general market. Boxoffice reaction will be spotty.

Principal point against film is the obscure motivations of plot principals. A little more light on the subject would have helped but scripters and direction apparently prefer to keep both audience and players in the dark.

Cryptic story line finds Miss Russell and her husband returning to Las Vegas, where she can dig up old memories that included a love affair with Mature, now a lieutenant in the sheriff's office. Along the way it gradually comes out that the husband, Vincent Price, is desperately in need of money despite seemingly being wealthy, and is trying to make it at the dice tables.

Sparks still fly between Mature and Miss Russell, and Price is getting nowhere with his gambling. When a gambler with whom he has quarreled is found murdered, Price is arrested. Later, Mature turns up the real killer, Brad Dexter, a mysterious character who spends most of his time ogling bountifully endowed femmes, including Miss Russell. Still later, an embezzlement charge catches up with Price, and Miss Russell decides to take the six-week treatment in Las Vegas and stay with Mature.

Only real thrill point in the plot is the helicopter chase after Dexter and the kidnapped Miss Russell. It's 10 minutes of exciting footage that enlivens an otherwise rather dull 87 minutes.

Mature and Miss Russell take advantage of an occasional bright piece of dialog tossed their way, but overall can't do much with the characters as scripted by Earl Felton and Harry Essex from a Jay Dratler story. Nor does Robert Stevenson's direction do anything to clear up plot obscurities, although he does maintain a tough feeling throughout that goes with this type of yarn.

Miss Russell sings "I Get Along Without You Very Well" and "My Resistance Is Low," while Hoagy Carmichael, as a gambling joint pianist, delivers "The Monkey Song." Price, Dexter, Jay C. Flippen, (a fishing sheriff), Will Wright and other cast members are adequate to demands.

The Robert Sparks production obtains an authentic background by using plenty of Las Vegas footage against which to tell the story, and the technical credits are all expertly delivered. Brog.

Scandal Sheet

Newspaper melodrama with moderate b.o. possibilities.

Columbia release of Edward Small production. Stars Broderick Crawford, Donna Reed, John Derek; features Rosemary DeCamp, Henry O'Neill, Henry Morgan, James Millican, Griff Barnett, Jonathan Hale. Directed by Phil Karlson. Screenplay, Ted Sherdeman, Eugene Ling, James Poe, based upon novel, "The Dark Page," by Samuel Fuller; camera, Burnett Guffey; editor, Jerome Thoms; musical director, Morris Stoloff. Tradeshown N.Y., Jan. 7, '52. Running time, 82 MINS.

"Scandal Sheet" is a program picture that blends a hunt for a killer against a newspaper background. Story is full of twists and generates fair suspense as a reporter's search for the murderer gains momentum. B.o. prospects shape as moderately good in most situations. Broderick Crawford provides some marquee dressing as do Donna Reed and John Derek.

Based upon the Samuel Fuller novel, "The Dark Page," tale is of an editor whose spurned wife reaches up some 20 years later to knock him off the pinnacle of success. When she threatens to expose him as a deserter he accidentally kills her. To prevent discovery of his guilt, he kills an aged reporter but eventually is nabbed through sleuthing of one of his star staffers.

Picture has its moments of interest. However, filmgoers are let in on the identity of the killer from the start and that tends to dampen things somewhat. For no matter how well the script is written there's always much more audience concern in whodunit rather than in the technique used in tracking down the culprit.

What's more, this yarn studiously follows the favorite Hollywood theory that the reporter always gets to the scene of the crime before the cops and invariably turns up all clues long before the d.a.'s minions even get a second-hand whiff of the scent. There's a classic at the finale, too, when the editor is confronted with a man who positively identifies him.

At this embarrassing point he dictates a lead that's to be used on the story of his capture. Unfortunately, producer Edward Small fails to follow through on this, for a different lead appears in the banner story thrown on the screen in the closing frames.

Brod Crawford turns in a competent job as the erring editor—a role that obviously is far from a sympathetic one. Miss Reed is credible as a feature writer who disapproves of her boss' use of sensational journalism in building circulation. Derek goes about his chores as the star reporter-sleuth with gusto. However, his youthful appearance is more in keeping with a cub's countenance than a top newshound's carriage.

Rosemary DeCamp, as the slain wife, does well with a small part while Henry O'Neil scores handily with a fine characterization of a veteran reporter reduced to a Bowery existence because of his penchant for drink. Direction of Phil Karlson builds suspense nicely and extracts good performances from a lengthy supporting cast. Burnett Guffey's camerawork is good as are Small's production values and sundry technical credits. Gilb.

Phone Call From a Stranger

Interesting plot, developed along mostly acceptable adult lines; okay b.o.

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

20th-Fox release of Nunnally Johnson production. Stars Shelley Winters, Gary Merrill, Michael Rennie, Bette Davis; features Keenan Wynn, Evelyn Varden, Warren Stevens, Beatrice Straight, Ted Donaldson, Craig Stevens, Helen Westcott. Directed by Jean Negulesco. Screenplay, Nunnally Johnson, based on story by I. A. R. Wylie; camera, Milton Krasner; editor, Hugh Fowler; music, Franz Waxman. Tradeshown Jan. 3, '52. Running time, 96 MINS.

A solidly based dramatic story idea has been brought off with a reasonable amount of success in "Phone Call from a Stranger," and the boxoffice prospects appear fairly okay. It's an episodic flashback type of unfoldment that throws the cameras on quite a number of tense, exciting scenes.

Nunnally Johnson produced and did the script from a story by I. A. R. Wylie. Writing and playing make most of the episodes play with a lot of strength and only falls down in one when the approach is too "cute" to be in keeping with dramatic worth of the others. Jean Negulesco's direction is strong in handling both players and story.

Plot concerns the survivor of an airplane crash who decides to call on the families of three people with whom he had become friends during the air trip that led up to the tragedy; hence the title. Before this stage of the story is reached, however, script does a topnotch job of slugging dramatics dealing with Gary Merrill's departure from home after his wife has made a mistake. On the flight to Los Angeles, Merrill becomes acquainted with Shelley Winters, ex-stage stripper; Michael Rennie, a doctor with a burdening mental problem; and Keenan Wynn, loud, travelling-salesmen jokester.

A forced landing because of weather in an isolated spot gives the odd foursome a chance to figure each other out. It also reveals Rennie's problem, one of manslaughter which he had ducked for five years. After the get-acquainted night, plane is off again but crashes before its destination is reached and Merrill is one of the few survivors.

He first calls on Rennie's widow, Beatrice Straight, finds the husband's behavior over the past five years has created a problem with the young son, Ted Donaldson. Merrill forces the son to return home after running away and puts the relationship between mother and son straight by revealing Rennie was ready to take his medicine. Miss Straight and young Donaldson, particularly the former, score decisively.

His visit to Craig Stevens and Evelyn Varden, the husband to whom Miss Winters was returning, and the hammy mother-in-law, has its moments of dramatic punch but loses a lot of its effectiveness when Johnson lets the script go for a hearts-and-flowers takeoff on the assorted reasons for the original breakup of the marriage. Performances are good, however.

Merrill next visits Bette Davis, the wife of Wynn, and finds her a bedridden cripple, not the glamour gal pictured by her husband. There he learns a story of marital faith and love in which Wynn had forgiven Miss Davis for an error that led to her running away with another man and becoming a cripple. These concluding scenes, played to the hilt by Miss Davis, force Merrill to realize his mistake in walking out on his wife, so film ends with his own reconciliation.

Miss Winters does a good job of work on her flip character, particularly in the scenes leading up to the chash. Merrill is convincing, as is Rennie. Wynn puts over his brash, coarse salesman character most effectively. Miss Davis's role occupies comparitively short footage but gives thespian strength to the film. Helen Westcott, as Merrill's wife, also appeals and the other performers are capable.

Camera by Milton Krasner does a topnotch job of pointing up the excitement in the air and auto crash sequences. Music score by Waxman is unobtrusively effective, and technical assists are good. Brog.

Tom Brown's Schooldays

"Tom Brown's Schooldays," British import which preemed at the Park Avenue Theatre, N. Y., Monday (7), was reviewed from London by VARIETY in the issue of May 2, 1951. George Minter produced Noel Langley's adaptation of the Thomas Hughes novel. Cast stars John Howard Davies in the title role and Robert Newton as the headmaster. United Artists is releasing in the U. S.

Myro observed that "England's classic story of public school life . . . is acted with great sincerity by a name cast, but script and direction go all out to emphasize the obvious emotional tearjerker angles. Subject is a clear winner for native cinemagoers and should have reasonable success in the overseas markets." Critic praised performances of both Davies and Newton.

Bonnie Prince Charlie

"Bonnie Prince Charlie," a Sir Alexander Korda production which preemed Sunday (6) at the Trans-Lux 60th St. Theatre, N. Y., was reviewed from London in VARIETY, Nov. 3, 1948. Myro called the picture "long, ponderous and often boring." Despite the money expended on the venture, he noted, "it is not a picture to enhance the prestige of Britain, and the producers cannot hope to recoup much of their cash outlay from the American market."

"Devoid of the spectacle and pageantry which was to have been expected from this historical drama," wrote Myro, "Charlie" plods its dull and weary way through a series of meaningless adventures that follow the failure of the young pretender to recapture the throne for his exiled father." Acting of the stars, David Niven and Margaret Leighton, the reviewer opined, could not be criticized by normal standards. Snader Productions is distributing the Technicolor film in the U. S.

Japanese War Bride

Exploitation feature for ballyhoo dates; otherwise, dual bill companion film with modest prospects.

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

20th-Fox release of Joseph Bernhard (Anson Bond) production. Stars Shirley Yamaguchi, Don Taylor; features Cameron Mitchell, Marie Windsor, James Bell, Louise Lorimer, Philip Ahn, Sybil Merritt, Lane Nakamo, Kathleen Mulqueen, Orley Lindgren, George Wallace. Directed by King Vidor. Screenplay, Catherine Turney; story, Anson Bond; camera, Lionel Lundon; editor, Terry Morse; music, Emil Newman, Arthur Lange. Tradeshown Jan. 3, '52. Running time, 91 MINS.

Tae Shimizu	Shirley Yamaguchi
Jim Sterling	Don Taylor
Art Sterling	Cameron Mitchell
Fran Sterling	Marie Windsor
Ed Sterling	James Bell
Harriet Sterling	Louise Lorimer
Eitaro Shimizu	Philip Ahn
Emily Shafer	Sybil Merritt
Shiro Hasagawa	Lane Nakano
Mrs. Milly Shafer	Kathleen Mulqueen
Ted Sterling	Orley Lindgren
Woody Blacker	George Wallace
Emma Hasagawa	May Takasugi
Mr. Hasagawa	William Yokota

Man at Fish Market	Jerry Fujikawa
Japanese Servants	Chieko Sato, Tetsu Komai
Old Japanese Woman	Hisa Chiba
Man at Plant	David March

Hypoed ballyhoo should make "Japanese War Bride" a good contender in most exploitation bookings. While not sensational in story content, subject furnishes material for campaigning and should respond to hearty selling. Otherwise, it has modest chances as a dualer.

Film is an independent production by Joseph Bernhard and Anson Bond for 20th-Fox distribution. Scripting, direction and playing treats story with more natural dignity and restraint than usually accorded such a subject, letting it play off with enough validity to satisfy demands of general release and keeping the soap opera flavor within bounds.

Shirley Yamaguchi, Japanese film star, plays the title role and fits naturally into the story. Her restrained personality is ingratiating. Don Taylor is good as the Korean War veteran who marries her and brings her to Salinas, Cal., for a new life in an American farming community where public opinion is prejudiced.

The Catherine Turney script, based on a story by Bond, brings the bride up against such pitfalls as reluctant acceptance by the groom's family, a jealous sister-in-law, anti-Jap feeling among some of the farmers and similar standard dramatic angles that go with plot. Story comes to its head when the sister-in-law spreads rumor that the child born to the couple was actually fathered by a neighboring Japanese farmer. The war bride flees with the child, but the husband pursues and brings about a finale reconciliation that wipes out past mistakes and misunderstandings.

Marie Windsor is the jealous, vindictive sister-in-law, married to Cameron Mitchell. Both do well by the demands of their characters, as do James Bell and Louise Lorimer as Taylor's parents; Philip Ahn, Miss Yamaguchi's grandfather in the Japanese sequences; Sybil Merritt, Taylor's old girl friend; Lane Nakano, May Takasugi and William Yokota, neighboring farmers; Orley Lindgren and other cast members.

Picture's presentation benefits for the excellent direction given it by King Vidor, who helps make it credible through restraint in handling. Noteworthy on the production end is the fine photography of Lionel Lundon and the good music by Emil Newman and Arthur Lange. Film is a bit long at 91 minutes for the general market. Brog.

The Old West
(SONGS)

Gene Autry oatuner for program western market.

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Columbia release of Armand Schaefer production. Stars Gene Autry, Champion; features Pat Buttram, Gail Davis, Lyle Talbot, Louis Jean Heydt, House Peters, Sr., House Peters, Jr., Dick Jones, Kathy Johnson. Directed by George Archainbaud. Written by Gerald Geraghty; camera, William Bradford; editor, James Sweeney. Previewed Jan. 4, '52. Running time, 61 MINS.

Gene Autry	Gene Autry
Panhandle Gibbs	Pat Buttram
Arlie Williams	Gail Davis
Doc Lockwood	Lyle Talbot

Judie	Kathy Johnson
Hod Evers	Don Harvey
Eddie Jamison	Dee Pollock
Duffield	Raymond L. Morgan
Daniels	James Craven
Chadwick	Tom London
Watkins	Frank Marvin

A religioso touch dressed up "The Old West" to make it slightly more than just a routine program oater from the Gene Autry stable at Columbia. Homely church theme is acceptably woven in without lessening the hero's action chances.

Autry, wild horse wrangler for a stage line, is nursed back to health by a traveling parson after being bushwacked and decides to help the sky pilot bring religion to the lawless town of Saddlerock. Lyle Talbot, horse rancher and secretly the head of all the vice in the town, provides another menace angle by not only resisting the efforts to clean up the village but also seeking to break Autry's contract with the stage line.

Latter sets up a stagecoach race, with the winner to get the line's horse business. Naturally the hero comes through triumphant, even though foul play wrecks his coach. Talbot and his henchmen lose out to the might of law and religion and the townspeople settle down to a peaceful life.

The Gerald Geraghty screenplay gets a bit involved with a number of characters outside the main theme but enough interest is kept on Autry to discount this. Pat Buttram supplies his bearded rural comedy antics to the yarn for kiddie chuckles, and Autry slugs it out often enough with the heavies to make sure action is good. Talbot is a satisfactory villain. Gail Davis is okay as the femme interest. Louis Jean Heydt, a stage driver going blind; House Peters, Sr., the parson; Peters, Jr., a Talbot henchman; Dick Jones and Don Harvey are among other okay cast members. Moppets are played by Kathy Johnson and Dee Pollock.

The Armand Schaefer production, directed by George Archainbaud, gives Autry's nags, Champion and Champ, Jr., a chance to show off horsey tricks which the juves will like. Autry, with villagers as a chorus, sings "Music by the Angels" and "Somebody Bigger Than You and I," both fitting the religious flavor. William Bradford's lensing is good as sepia prints add interest. Brog.

Tales of Robin Hood

Another Robin Hood adventure pic lacking names; modest boxoffice for some dual combos.

Lippert Pictures release of Hal Roach, Jr., production. Stars Robert Clarke, Mary Hatcher, Paul Cavanagh, Wade Crosby, Ben Welden. Directed by James Tinling. Screenplay and story, Leroy H. Zehren; camera, George Robinson; editor, Richard Currier; music, Leon Klatzkin. At New York, N. Y., starting Jan. 2, '52. Running time, 61 MINS.

Robin Hood	Robert Clarke
Maid Marian	Mary Hatcher
Sir Gui	Paul Cavanagh
Little John	Wade Crosby
Will Stutely	Whit Bissell
Friar Tuck	Ben Welden
Will Scarlett	Robert Bice
Sir Alan	Keith Richards
Alan A-Dale	Bruce Lester
Sheriff of Nottingham	Tiny Stowe
Sir Fitzwalter	Lester Matthews
Earl of Chester	John Vosper
Much	Norman Bishop
Betty	Margia Dean
Landlord	Lorin Raker
Captain of the Guards	George Slocum
Wilfred	John Doucette

Exploits of this noted bandit of Sherwood Forest and his band makes high adventure in "Tales of Robin Hood." Absence of any marquee names and a dull title militate against this well-produced picture that boasts several bright performances. Film's running time and no-name cast fit this twin-bill category.

Plot brings in a comparatively new version of the lovable scoundrel's fight against arrogant Norman rulers, who are making life intolerable for the defeated Saxons. Story has Robin Hood ultimately winning back his ancestral rights at the point of his sharp sword and marrying Maid Marian. Otherwise, it follows the usual antics of the Sherwood Forest bandit and his Merry Men, who rob the rich knights to give to the poor.

Producer Hal Roach, Jr., has packed plenty of action into this comparatively short-running feature while James Tinling has directed with pace in mind while not overlooking some trim portrayals. Robert Clarke is an acceptable, not too heroic Robin Hood, while Mary Hatcher, from Broadway musicals, is okay as Maid Marian. A standout role is provided by Ben Welden as Friar Tuck. Wade Crosby also does nicely as Little John while Paul Cavanagh makes a suitably villainous Sir Gui. Whit Bissell, Tiny Stowe and Robert Bice head the supporting cast. Wear.

NABE ARTIES NAB 'LOST AUDIENCE'

Stress TV-Exhib Competition

"Hollywood is not in competition with television. The competition is between the local movie theatre and the living room television set."

Council of Motion Picture Organizations makes that point in the public relations plan presented to company prexies last week. It asks on the basis of that premise that emphasis in the future be shifted away from Hollywood and to the local theatre as the purveyor of the entertainment.

"In telling the public of the motion picture's unique assets," report states, "we must shift our emphasis. Instead of glorifying Hollywood as the source of the best entertainment, instead of making claims for the industry, our public relations program should point to the local movie theatre as the possessor of these vast entertainment resources."

Accepting the combined competition of TV and the public's generally low esteem of pic quality as the industry's major pub relations problem, COMPO exec v.p. Arthur L. Mayer suggested: "In destroying the public's belief that pictures are not as good as they used to be, we must not only convince the public that the movie theatre has production values possessed by no other form of entertainment; we must make the public believe that these values are so important they outweigh the comfort and convenience of staying home and watching a show in the living room."

Feb. 1 Deadline for N.Y. District 65 In Pub-Ad Talks With 5 Majors

Deadline of Feb. 1 has been set by pub-ad staffers affiliated with N. Y. District 65, Distributive, Processing and Office Workers of America, for the conclusion of talks for a new contract with five pix companies. If no pact is reached at that time or if no concrete acceptable proposals are received, union execs indicated that the publicists would take their case to the public. District 65 reps flack homeoffice units at 20th-Fox, Warner Bros., Universal, Columbia and United Artists, and have been negotiating for a new pact since the week of Nov. 21. The old agreement expired Oct. 21.

Should the talks break down, it's expected that the union would put into effect the strategic moves which its strike and strategy committee has been mapping for the past several weeks. Earlier unionites noted that they would maintain "a period of peace" and would not resort to any pressure or demonstrations during the negotiations. With the announcement of the deadline, it's assumed that they have made little or no progress toward the signing of a new agreement.

Union is asking for an 18% general increase in both minimums and present salaries, a guaranteed minimum staff during the life of the contract, arbitration of all disputes, union shop and a pension plan. As far as could be ascertained, the companies involved in the talks have turned thumbs down on all proposals. Several counter offers have been made, but it hasn't reached the stage where

N.Y., Chi, L.A. Lensers Dicker With Newsreelers, NBC on New Contract

Cameramen of the New York, Chicago and Los Angeles locals of the International Photographers of the Motion Picture Industries currently are negotiating with the five newsreel companies and the television news division of the National Broadcasting Co. for a new contract to replace the one which expired Dec. 31.

Joint talks being held with Fox Movietone, Warner Pathe, News of the Day, Universal and Paramount while separate negotiations are taking place with NBC. While talks are being held, the former pact remains in force.

In elections held last week, the N. Y. local named the following officers: Fred Fordham, president; Jack Painter, v.p.; Harold Muller, secretary; Sidney Zucker, treasurer; Jay Rescher, biz rep, and Frank Landi, sgt.-at-arms.

Also presently holding talks with the newsreel companies is the Motion Picture Film Editors, Local 771, New York, whose contract also expired Dec. 31. Officials of both the cameraman's and the film editor's unions said the negotiations were at a preliminary stage.

306 Reelects Gelber

Herman Gelber has been reelected prexy of Projectionists Local 306, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees. Gelber defeated former veepee Harry Storin and William Salke.

Al Kunzie replaced Storin as v.p. while the following were named for new terms: S. D'Inzillo and Harry Garfman, biz agents; Ernest Lang, recording secretary; Izzy Schwartz, financial secretary, and Abe Kessler, treasurer.

High Ct. Nixes Both Sides On Towne Appeals

Washington, Jan. 8.

The Supreme Court yesterday (Mon.) turned down appeals by both sides in the Milwaukee Towne Corp.'s treble-damage antitrust case, thereby permitting the damages awarded by the 7th Circuit Court to stand.

Milwaukee Towne, operator of the indie Towne Theatre in that city, was granted a verdict of $941,574 plus $75,000 in legal fees from Loew's, RKO, Columbia, Paramount, 20th and Warners. Towne appealed, asking that the Supreme Court restore the higher verdict of $1,295,878 plus $225,000 in legal fees, won in the trial court. The majors appealed on the ground that the circuit court verdict was too high and was won partly by perjured testimony.

Each side has a right to ask the High Court to reconsider yesterday's action. However, the Supreme Court almost never reverses itself after refusing to hear a case.

12 TINTERS AMONG U-I'S RECORD 22-PIC BACKLOG

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Total of 22 films, largest backlog in the studio's history, marks Universal-International's 1952 start.

Twelve of the pix are Technicolor and all will be released before Oct. 31, the end of the company's 1951-52 schedule.

Two 'Miserables'

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Film fans are due to see two versions of "Les Miserables," one currently in production at 20th-Fox and one filmed in Italy and France and distributed in this country by Lux Films.

Starring in the foreign versions is Valentina Cortesa who, ironically, has a multiple picture contract with 20th-Fox.

MORE 'SELECT' PIX PERK B.O.

Conversion of subsequent-run nabes to first-run art houses in many key cities is regarded in some film circles as playing an important role in bringing back the "lost audience" (higher education groups) to theatres.

Most recent changeover is that of Warner Bros.' Squirrel Hill Theatre, Pittsburgh, which launched an art policy with J. Arthur Rank's "Lavender Hill Mob." B.o. returns from this neighborhood house during the recent holiday weeks showed the theatre keeping close pace with the well-established downtown first-runs.

Among other nabe theatres that switched within the past year to first-run art theatres include the Art Cinema, Rochester, N. Y.; Guild, Cincinnati; Art, Dayton; Pageant and Shady Oak, St. Louis; Coronet, Dallas; 7th Street, Ft. Worth; River Oaks, Houston; Rowner, Milwaukee, and Vogue, Kansas City.

Difficulty in getting suitable product has influenced the subsequent runs to adopt the art policy. With the nabes usually showing films on a second, third or fourth-run basis, it would be necessary for them to bid for a film if they wished to move up a run. Finding themselves too small to enter into a bidding arrangement, they have decided to forget the standard product.

Better British Pix

Another factor believed to have influenced the changeover the larger group of excellent quality British and other English-language films available for "select" audiences. Formerly, foreign-language pix, especially French and Italian films, dominated the art house field, with only an occasional British production becoming a b.o. factor. Elimination of subtitles and the availability of offbeat Hollywood products also has been a contributing cause.

With release of "Lavender Hill Mob" and "The Browning Version," latter also a J. Arthur Rank pic, British films are making a strong comeback in the U. S. market. Former, now showing in about 25

See Battle Over Grainger Firing Reprised in Court

Hassle over the dismissal of E. C. Grainger as general manager of Shea Enterprises, extensive eastern seaboard circuit, is expected to flare up again on two counts later this month. Grainger last week claimed he was dropped by the company and barred from his office unexpectedly, although his employment contract has until 1956 to run.

Set for Jan. 23 is a Bronx County (N. Y.) Surrogate's Court session at which Gerald Shea, president of the circuit, and heirs of the Shea estate will demand an accounting from the trustees, including Grainger and N. Y. attorney Edward C. Raftery.

On the following day, in N. Y. Supreme Court, Grainger will press a demand that any differences over his employment be submitted to arbitration.

Judge's Wife Sues Philly Carman on Loan

Philadelphia, Jan. 8.

Suit against the closed Carman Theatre, longtime North Philly vaudfilmer, has been brought in Common Pleas Court by Mrs. Harry Kalodner, wife of a Federal Appellate Court judge. Action asks recovery of $30,000 on a loan allegedly made Carman Theatre Corp.

Albert M. Greenfield, realtor, has taken over the Carman ownership and his brother, William I. Greenfield, will reopen the house. Although date hasn't been set, theatre is due to relight with Metro's "American in Paris," but without vaudeville.

COMPO Wouldn't Try to Whitewash H'wood Scandals in Overall Campaign

Film industry should make no effort to refute charges of Communist infiltration in Hollywood, nor should it attempt to whitewash recurrent Coast scandals. That is the recommendation of the Council of Motion Picture Organizations in a confidential memorandum prepared for prexies and publicity-ad heads of the major companies.

Recommendations are part of an overall plan for public relations which the presidents and pub-ad men began to consider point-by-point at a session at Motion Picture Assn. of America headquarters in New York last Friday (4). Plan was presented by COMPO exec v.p. Arthur L. Mayer and was prepared with the aid of several pub-ad toppers.

Time permitted only two items to be considered. One was for resumption of star tours, similar to last fall's "Movietime U.S.A." in the spring. Tentative appropriation of $150,000 was made to finance them. Cooperative ad campagin was also discussed and given to an advertising committee to work out details.

References to Communism and scandals in Hollywood were contained in a survey of what the industry should aim for in a pub relations campaign. Survey precedes seven points on which COMPO recommends action.

Re Red Charges

In eliminating refutation of Communism and scandals potential aims for the campaign, COMPO memorandum makes several points. As for the Red charges, it states:

"While (they) have brought all patriotic members of this industry great personal embarrassment, how much loss of patronage they have caused, except among certain

25G for Lectures

Public relations plan for the industry presented by the Council of Motion Picture Organizations to company prexies last week calls for $25,000 appropriation for speakers' bureau. It is suggested that six or seven professional men and women gabbers be hired and booked at conventions, civic group meetings and before opinion-forming organizations.

COMPO also suggests that personalities within the industry — execs, stars, directors, writers, etc. — be similarly booked for appearances at important gatherings.

Co. Prexies Vote Extra $25,000 On 'Movietime' Push

Company prexies, in enthusiastic approval of Arthur L. Mayer's suggestion for renewal of star tours in the spring, have committed themselves to expenditure of $25,000 more than the personality peregrinations cost during the "Movietime U.S.A." campaign of last October. Purpose of the added coin was to enable spread of the tours over several months or more, rather than jamming them into a single week.

The approximately 30 groups of players, writers, producers and directors who hit the road for "Movietime" ran up a travel tab of $125,000. To that was added an expenditure of several times that sum by local exhib committees, which took the personalities in hand once they were delivered to exchange centres.

Prexies, meeting at the Motion Picture Assn. of America headquarters in New York, committed themselves to $150,000 for the tours to start in the spring. Added funds were said to be necessary for administration because of the hegiras being spread out.

Mayer, exec v.p. of the Council of Motion Picture Organizations,

PIC DELIVERERS REACH NEW YORK ACCORD

Uninterrupted delivery of prints to theatres in the N. Y. metropolitan area was assured last week when film delivery men affiliated with the AFL Teamsters Local 817 and 14 carrier companies came to an agreement on a new pact. Contract, which will be officially inked this week, calls for a $10 to $15 pay hike, increased insurance benefits, improvement in general working conditions and nine holidays instead of the previous six.

Agreement, which contains a no-strike clause, has been set to run for two years, with the unionites getting an automatic increase averaging $5 per man after the first year. Conclusion of negotiations forestalled a threatened strike scheduled for the New Year's weekend and then postponed to a week later.

Union and carrier companies had been negotiating for two months until a final agreement was reached. Union was formerly an indie outfit known as the Motion Picture Film Handlers Assn. However, with expiration of 1951 pact, the group became a unit of Local 817, which has jurisdiction of all teamsters in the theatrical field.

According to Ira Meinhardt, attorney for the carriers, wage hikes granted must still be approved by the Wage Stabilization Board.

Arthur Mayer Booked For Europe, Leaving No Doubt on COMPO Exit

Arthur L. Mayer left no doubt in the minds of company prexies at a session last Friday (4) that he intends to follow through on his determination to resign exec v.p. of the Council of Motion Picture Organizations. He has steamer passage to Europe booked for March 11, and will be away for two months, at least.

Ned E. Depinet, RKO prexy, also reiterated his intention of quitting the COMPO presidency. It is hoped, however, that he will be persuaded to change his mind—a hope that has been pretty much abandoned in regard to Mayer.

Mayer's trip abroad is primarily a vacation jaunt. However, he'll also prowl for pix for distribution in the U. S. by the outfit in which he is partnered with Edward Kingsley. On his return he intends to complete a book on which he has been working.

Committee headed by Jack Alicoate is canvessing the field for possible successors to Mayer and Depinet. Names will be presented for approval at the COMPO membership meeting now slated for Feb. 14-15 in New York.

D.C. Col Sales Meet

Washington, Jan. 8.

Second of series of sales confabs of Columbia pix execs got underway here today at the Statler Hotel. Attending two-day conclave are Abe Montague, general sales chief; Rube Jackter, assistant sales manager; Louis Astor, circuit sales exec, and George Josephs, Montague's aide.

Field reps at meeting are Sam Galanty, mid-eastern division manager, and Ben Caplon, Oscar Ruby, Phil Fox and Jack Judd, branch managers in Washington, Cleveland, Cincinnati and Pittsburgh, respectively. Company has set sales meetings for New York and Chicago later this month.

L.A. Lively; 'Dreams' Smash $45,000, 'Weekend' Mildish 12G, 'Quo Vadis' Brisk 30G, 6th, 'Women' 29½G, 2d

Los Angeles, Jan. 8.

Although first-runs here this week are dominated by holdovers, a sprightly session is shaping up. "See You in My Dreams" is topping the town with a solid $45,000 in three theatres. Only other newcomer, "Weekend With Father" looks mild $12,000 in three houses.

Best of 11 holdovers is "Quo Vadis," which looks sound with $30,000 for sixth week in two locations. "Westward the Women" shapes good $29,500 for 10-day second week, also two spots. "Two Tickets to Broadway" is rated fair with $19,000 for third session in two sites.

Estimates for This Week

Los Angeles, Chinese, Uptown, Loyola (FWC) (2,097; 2,048; 1,719; 1,248; 70-$1.10)—"Model and Marriage Broker" (20th) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono) (2d wk). Off to $6,800 in 3 days. Last week, fair $29,200.

H.O.s Hamper Pitt But 'Ground' $7,000; 'Men' 7 'Lavender' Hot 4G, 2d

Pittsburgh, Jan. 8.

Things have been looking up all over town in the wake of the holiday, with holdovers of the New Year's pix the general rule. Only one not sharing the general prosperity has been "Elopement" at the Fulton. "Distant Drums" at Stanley, "Ten Tall Men" at Harris and "Texas Carnival" are all doing okay in second stanzas while "On Dangerous Ground" looks nice at the Warner. New art policy at Squirrel Hill, WB name house, off to a flying start with "Lavender Hill Mob," and if first film is any criterion, small-seater should be in for some heavy sugar.

Estimates for This Week

Fulton (Shea) (1,700; 50-85) — "Elopement" (20th. Will hardly better $6,000, including the holiday take, and rather dismal. Last week, "Weekend With Father" (U), $6,200.

Harris (Harris) (2,200; 50-85) — "Ten Tall Men" (Col) (2d wk). Best thing this house has had in months. Still nice at $7,500 on top of sock $13,500 last week.

Penn (Loew's (3,300; 50-85) — "Texas Carnival" (M-G) (2d wk). Holding for 6 extra days and in

Kansas City, Jan. 8.

"Quo Vadis" in its second week continues to shatter precedents here after record $40,000 in first week. Among the newcomers, "Distant Drums' 'at Paramount is socko standout, and may hold. "Double Dynamite" at Missouri suffered from crix, and moved out after five days. Weather has been uncooperative to first-runs, with snow and cold most of time since New Year's.

Estimates for This Week

Esquire (Fox Midwest) (820; 50-75)—"Japanese War Bride" (20th) and "Northwest Territory" (Mono). Better than average play at $3,500 or less. Last week "Jungle Book" (UA) and "Thief of Bagdad" (UA) (reissues), $5,000 in 9 days.

'Araby' Torrid $19,000, Hub; 'Vadis' Huge 56G, 'Drums' Tight 15G, 2d

Boston, Jan. 8.

"Quo Vadis" in second stanza at State and Orpheum continues to lead the field here by a wide margin. "My Favorite Spy" i second week at Met and "Distant Drums" in second at Paramount and Fenway also shape well. "I Want You" in Astor third stanza is slipping. "Flame of Araby" at Boston looks strong while "Weekend With Father" at Memorial rates fair.

Estimates for This Week

Astor (B&Q) (1,200; 50-95) — "I Want You" (RKO) (3d wk). Off to about $9,000 following oke $12,800 for second.

Paramount (NET) (1,700; 40-85) —"Distant Drums" (WB) and "St. Benny" (UA) (2d wk). Fine $11,000 after great $16,000 first.

State (Loew) (3,500; 90-$1.20)—"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (2d wk). Big $18,000 after $29,000 opener.

Chi 100% Holdover, B.O. Uneven; 'Dreams'-Monroe Lush $54,000, 'Story' Brisk 31G, 'Drums' Fat 14G, All 2d

Chicago, Jan. 8.

Chicago pic grosses are running uneven although generally they are on the upgrade for a change. New Year's Eve, while solid in many cases, didn't work out as well as expected with the $2 top pushing customers to other houses. This tab was put on at 5 o'clock and several exhibitors are going to wait until later next year. Grand retained its 98c. price, and did capacity business. All houses are holding over from holidays, but the Chicago brought in Vaughn Monroe to top stageshow on second week of "I'll See You in My Dreams" which should land lush $54,000.

Also strong among second weekers is "Detective Story" at the Woods with bright $31,000. "Emperor's Nightingale" at World looks staunch $6,000. State-Lake, "Ten Tall Men" and "Ft. Defiance," is catching some of the Chicago overflow for okay $14,000. Roosevelt with "Distant Drums" and "Highwayman" is loud at same figure. "Callaway Went Thataway" at Oriental, plus the Ames Bros. onstage is very sluggish at $25,000 while "Two Tickets to Broadway" at United Artists looks slim.

Estimates for This Week

Chicago (B&K) (3,900; 55-98)—"See You in Dreams" (WB) (2d wk) with Vaughn Monroe in to head stageshow. Socko $54,000. Last week, $56,000.

Grand (RKO) (1,200; 55-98)—"Weekend with Father" (U) and "Her First Romance" (Col) (2d wk). Okay $10,000. Last week, $14,500.

Oriental (Indie) (3,400; 55-98)—"Callaway Went Thataway" (M-G) with Ames Bros. in person. Weak $25,000. Last week, $35,000.

Roosevelt (B&K) (1,500; 55-98)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "Highwayman" (Mono) (2d wk). Trim $14,000. Last week, big $19,000.

State-Lake (B&K) (2,700 (55-98) —"Ten Tall Men" (Col) and "Ft. Defiance" (UA) (2d wk). Oke $14,000. Last week, $20,000.

United Artists (B&K) (1,700; 55-98) — "Two Tickets Broadway" (RKO) and "Whip Hand" (RKO). Slim $9,000. Last week, $14,000.

Woods (Essaness) (1,087; 98)—"Detective Story" (Par) (2d wk). Fine $31,000. Last week, $35,000.

World (Indie) (587; 80)—"Emperor's Nightingale" (Indie) (2d wk). Solid $6,000. Last week, $6,500.

Ziegfield (Lopert) (434; $1.25-$2.40)—"The River" (UA) (6th wk). Strong with $4,000. Last week, same.

'Drums' Terrif $25,000, D.C.; 'Father' Hefty 12G, 'Quo Vadis' Hot 35G, 2d

Washington, Jan. 8.

The post-holiday letdown shapes about normal, with newcomers somewhat on slow side and holdovers remaining steady. There's no standout except "Quo Vadis," wow in second session at Loew's Palace. "Distant Drums" at the Warner is smash. with New Year's weekend part of its current estimate. "Flame of Araby" with vaude is okay at Capitol.

Estimates for This Week

Capitol (Loew's) (3,434; 55-90)—"Flame of Araby" (U) plus vaude. Okay $18,000. Last week, "Elopement" (20th) plus vaude, $22,000.

Dupont (Lopert) (372; $1.20-$2.40)—"Tales of Hoffmann" (Indie) (2d run) (2d wk). Fine $5,000 after $5,500 last week, and holds.

Keith's (RKO) (1,939; 44-85) — "Weekend With Father" (U). Brisk $12,000 in 8 days or near, with double feature New Year's Day helping. Last week, "Double Dynamite" (RKO), solid $14,000 9 days.

Metropolitan (Warner) (1,200; 44-74) — "Son of Dr. Jekyll" (Col). Nice $6,000. Last week, "FBI Girl" (Lip), $5,000.

Palace (Loew's) (2,370; 90-$1.50) —"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (2d wk). Wow $35,000 after $52,000 last week. Holds again.

Playhouse (Lopert) (485; 55-$1)—"Caesar and Cleopatra" (UA) (reissue). Fine $5,000. Last week, "The River" (9th wk), spurted to big $6,000, at tilted scale, in final week.

Warner (WB) (2,174; 44-80) — "Distant Drums" (WB). Sock $25,000 for 10 days. Last week, "When Worlds Collide" (Par), okay $12,000.

Estimates Are Net

Film gross estimates as reported herewith from the various key cities, are net; i. e., without the 20% tax. Distributors share on net take, when playing percentage, hence the estimated figures are net income.

The parenthetic admission prices, however, as indicated, include the U. S. amusement tax.

'Ground' Smooth $14,000, Frisco

San Francisco, Jan. 8.

Weekend cold and rains are dampening firstrun biz here this session, even putting skids under "Quo Vadis" in seventh week at the Warfield. Fact that city is nearly 100% holdover also is damaging, nearly all second rounds being down sharply from initial stanzas. "Distant Drums," which was fancy in opening round at the Fox, managed to hold fairly steady in a 5-day second week holdover at this house being something new at house in recent weeks. "On Dangerous Ground" looms pleasing in first Golden Gate week.

Estimates for This Week

Golden Gate (RKO) (2,850; 60-85) —"On Dangerous Ground" (RKO) and "Young Scarface" (Indie). Pleasing $14,000 or near. Last week, "Double Dynamite" (RKO), bolstered by special New Year's Eve. prevue, weak $19,000 for 9 days.

Fox (FWC) (4,651; 60-95)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "Banner Line" (M-G) (2d wk—5 days). Off to $10,000 after fine $25,000 opener.

B'way Soars Into New Year; 'Yonder' Nice 20G, 'Women' Okay 45G, 'Vadis' Great 38G, 'Dynamite'-Vaude 74G, 2d

In the wake of a terrific Christmas week and an unusually big New Year's Eve, Broadway first-run theatre business is holding up in markedly strong fashion this session. The post-holiday week is loaded with extended-run pix and holdover bills, only two big films coming in during the past week. The holiday week was helped by many out-of-town visitors as well as servicemen from camps and ships within a 300-mile radius of N.Y. Latter got holiday furloughs enabling them to visit Broadway over New Year's.

Usual kited scales New Year's Eve, paced by a $7.20 top at the Palace, and the holiday prices on Jan. 1 pushed trade to its highest point in more than a year, many houses doing better than a year ago in the comparable period. The Paramount, Palace and Music Hall racked up record weeks in periods covering Dec. 31. Pupils did not go back to school until Jan. 2, with Catholic schools resuming a day later, this being reflected in, theatre grosses.

Best new entry is "Wild Blue Yonder," with nice $20,000 at the State. "Westward the Women" hit only an okay $45,000 in its first week at the Capitol, despite extra shows New Year's Eve and following day. "Quo Vadis," which switched to continuous run Jan. 1, at the Astor, came through with terrific $38,000 in first week of the new policy. Showing is better comparatively than at the Cap where it finished its seventh week (10 days) on Dec. 30.

Paramount, which hit $120,000, new Christmas week high, in first stanza, held to solid $74,000 in second round with "Double Dynamite" and stageshow headed by Tony Bennett. The Hall, which edged to new all-time record of $180,000 in fourth round, is down to $128,000 in fifth week with "See You in My Dreams" and Xmas stageshow. Music Hall held its annual Christmas stageshow through the fifth session, with the understanding that a complete new bill would come in Jan. 10. "Greatest Show on Earth" and new stage bill opens tomorrow (Thurs.).

The Palace, with all-vaude policy headed by Judy Garland, continued nice with $37,000 in 12th week after a record $53,000 for 11th round.

"Distant Drums," sock $43,000 opening stanza, still was good with $20,000 in second frame at the Warner. "Favorite Spy," with smash $33,000 opening round, held nicely at $20,000 in second Globe session.

"Death of Salesman," is winding its third frame today (Wed.) with big $26,000 at the Victoria. Another great long-runner is "Detective Story," still socko at $24,500 in ninth round at the Mayfair. Also displaying remarkable stamina is "Lavender Hill Mob," its 12th stanza being smash $11,000 at the Fine Arts.

Although off sharply from its second week, "Decision Before Dawn" still is solid $23,500 in third session at the Rivoli. "I Want You" is down to nice $19,500 in third week at the Criterion. "Elopement" with Guy Mitchell topping holiday stage bill is also down sharply to mild $52,000 in third Roxy round after great $108,000 in second week. "Tales of Hoffmann," playing second-run at Sutton, is going great guns with $13,500 in second stanza.

Estimates for This Week

Astor (City Inv.) (1,300; $1.25-$1.80)—"Quo Vadis" (M-G) (2d wk). Initial week here on continuous run and lower scale ended Monday (7) at terrific $38,000. Film did sock $22,000 in eighth week of only five days, including New Year's Eve, on two-a-day and $2.40 top.

Bijou (City Inv.) (589; $1.20-$2.40)—"Henry V" (UA) (reissue) (2d wk). Second week ended Monday (7) dipped to $5,500, and closed. Got okay $7,000 first round. House stays shuttered until "Cry Beloved Country" (Indie) opens Jan. 23.

Capitol (Loew's) (4,820; 70-$1.80)—"Westward the Women" (M-G) (2d wk). First stanza ended Sunday (6) hit okay $45,000 albeit very disappointing, since it included New Year's and New Year's Eve. In ahead, "Quo Vadis" (M-G) (7th wk-10 days), huge $101,000. "Light Touch" (M-G), originally slated for the State, opens here after "Women."

Criterion (Moss) (1,700; 50-$1.80)—"I Want You" (RKO) (3d wk). Current round ending Friday (11) is holding fairly well at $19,500 after big $26,000 for second week.

Globe (Brandt) (1,500; 50-$1.80) — "Favorite Spy" (Par) (3d wk). Second round ended Monday (7) held nicely at $20,000 after smash $33,000 opening week.

Fine Arts (Davis) (468; 90-$1.80) —"Lavender Hill Mob" (U) (13th wk). The 12th frame ended Monday (7) held to great $11,000. The 11th week was $12,500.

Mayfair (Brandt) (1,736; 50-$1.80) — "Detective Story" (Par) (10th wk). The ninth stanza ended Monday (7) held at $24,500, after big $28,000 for eighth week.

Normandie (Normandie Theatres Corp.) (592; 95-$1.80)—"Pandora and Flying Dutchman" (M-G) (5th wk). Fifth round ending tomorrow (Thurs.) looks to reach solid $7,000 after $8,000 for fourth week.

Palace (RKO) (1,700; $1.20-$2.40) —All-vaude, two-a-day policy headed by Judy Garland (13th wk). Present round started yesterday (Tues.). The 12th week ended Sunday (6) slipped to stout $37,000 after record $53,000 for 11th week that took in New Year's Eve, with $7.20 for that performance.

Paramount (Par) (3,664; 70-$1.80)—"Double Dynamite" (RKO) with stageshow headed by Tony Bennett, Joey Adams, Art Mooney orch, Five De Marco Sisters (3d wk). Second week ended Monday (7) continued very solid with $74,000 after terrific $120,000, new Xmas Week record here, in first stanza that took in New Year's Eve. "Scandal Sheet" (Col) opens next.

Park Avenue (Reade) (583; 90-$1.50)—"Tom Brown's Schooldays" (UA). Opened Monday (7). Last week, "Clouded Yellow" (Col) (8th wk), hit fancy $7,300 after $6,000 in previous round.

Paris (Indie) (568) ($1.20-$2.40) —"The River" (UA) (18th wk). The 17th session ended Sunday (6) held at smash $12,000 after $16,800 in 16th week.

Radio City Music Hall (Rockefellers) (5,945; 80-$2.40)—"I'll See You in My Dreams" (WB) and Xmas stageshow (5th-final wk). Off to $128,000 or over, but still very strong for this stage of run. Fourth frame went to giant $180,000, new all-time high, to edge out "On Town" (M-G) mark by a couple of thousand dollars made two years ago in comparable week. Combo this year had advantage of most of Christmas week, plus New Year's Eve and New Year's Day which obviously contributed to high mark. "Greatest Show on Earth" (Par) opens tomorrow (Thurs.).

Rivoli (UAT-Par) (2,092; 90-$1.80) — "Decision Before Dawn" (20th) (3d wk). Present stanza ending tomorrow is heading for sharp dip at $23,500, after smash $41,000 for second week. Stays.

Roxy (20th) (5,886; 80-$2.20) — "Elopement" (20th) with Guy Mitchell heading stageshow (3d-final wk). Current frame being stretched to eight days but looks only slow $52,000. This is way off from the great $108,000 racked up in second week. "Model and Marriage Broker" (20th) with Alan Dale, Beatrice Kraft Dancers heading stageshow, opens Friday (11).

State (Loew's (3,450; 55-$1.80)—"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep) (2d wk). First round ended Monday (7) hit nice $20,000. Stays only two weeks with "For Men Only" (Lip) coming in Jan. 16 instead of "Light Touch" (M-G).

Warner (WB) (2,756; 85-$2) — "Distant Drums" (WB) (3d-final wk). Initial holdover week ended Monday (7) slipped to good $20,000 but down sharply from sock $43,000 registered in first stanza.

Sutton (R&B) (561; 90-$1.50) — "Tales of Hoffmann" (Indie) (3d wk). Second session ended Monday (7) held at $13,500. Initial week, taking in New Year's Eve, was smash $15,200.

Trans-Lux 60th St. (T-L) (453; 90-$1.50) — "Bonnie Prince Charlie" (Indie). Opened Sunday (6). Last week, "Galloping Major" (Indie) (3d wk-8 days) was $3,000 after $4,500 in second week ending Dec. 28.

Trans-Lux 52d St. (T-L) (540; 90-$1.50)—"It's a Big Country" (M-G). Opened yesterday (Tues.). In ahead, "Man With Cloak" (M-G) (6th wk), held at $3,000 in week ending Monday (7), after $3,500 in fifth frame.

Victoria (City Inv.) (1,060; 55-$1.80)—"Death of Salesman" (Col) (3d wk). Current round ending today looks to hold at big $26,000 after smash $36,000 for second week. Stays on indef.

British Pix Prods. Collect $2,404,000 From Eady Fund; $732,000 Balance

London, Jan. 8.

Producers of British films collected upwards of $2,404,000 from the first year's proceeds of the Eady fund (from Sept. 10, 1950, to Aug. 4, 1951) and there is still a balance of $732,000 to be shared out. These figures are published in the interim directors' report of the British Film Production Fund, which was set up by the four major trade associations to administer the Eady levy when it first started 18 months ago.

In the 11 months reviewed in the interim report, Eady collections in picture theatres throughout the country exceeded $3,348,000. Bank interest added a modest $5,414 to income, but administration expenses carved off almost $50,000 from the total available for distribution. Altogether the fund was left with a share-out capital of $3,304,683, of which $177,426 was set aside for financing of children's films.

The amount paid out to producers was spread over the four quarters and in the first distribution, covering the last quarter of 1950, 274 pix qualified for a share. These earned gross rentals in excess of $4,200,000. In the second quarter, 299 films shared, although gross receipts were under $4,000,000. Number of qualifying British films soared to 327 in the third quarter and gross earnings were again in the region of $4,000,000. Final distribution covering only a period of eight weeks embraced 290 films with total gross about $1,900,000.

The first distribution was calculated at 12½% of the gross and there were 61 recipients. In the next quarter, the percentage was up to 16% and the number benefitting rose to 58. The cut stayed at 16% in the third quarter, while in the final payment, at 20%, recipients were down to the original level of 51.

Since the period under review, the Eady fund has undergone a major expansion as a result of proposals agreed in last year's budget. It is reckoned that in this and subsequent years, producers will get an additional 34% on their gross earnings.

French Animators Seen Making Some Progress; Aim for Feature Field

Paris, Jan. 1.

French animators have been trying for years to get solid footing in production here with limited results. Most animation has been confined to commercial trailer pix shown during intermissions. A few shorts are made from time to time but they are rare.

The important animators here are Paul Grimault and Jean Image. Grimault has attained some European prestige in three prize-winning festival shorts. In 1943, he copped the Venice occulade for his "The Scarecrow" and again in Venice in 1945 for his "Lightning Rod Thief." Third Venice prize in 1948 was for his "Little Soldier."

In 1949, Grimault, in conjunction with Gemaux Productions, undertook the making of a feature animated film, "The Shepherd and the Chimneysweep," from a script by Jacques Prevert. In 1950, the film was three-fourths finished when financial and esthetic differences halted the work. Sarrut, head of Gemaux, is finishing the film himself without Grimault and Prevert, who threaten to bring suit against him for changing the spirit of the work.

Jean Image, who has made a few animated shorts, finished a feature lenth pic last year, called "Jeannot the Intrepid." It won a prize for the best kid's film at the last Venice Film Fest. Recently opened here, film is doing fair biz.

Top animated appeal here are the Walt Disney films. Every Xmas, a full-length Disney, usually preceded by excellent advance publicity, mops up in holiday b.o. receipts. "Cinderella" still holds the record as three of the big houses here. "Alice in Wonderland" opened here late last month, and looks headed for sock results. Metro and Warner shorts enjoy a fine popularity among the filmgoers.

Liquor Firms Fight Mex TV Ban on Booze Adv.

Mexico City, Jan. 8.

Liquor interests, spearheaded by a local brewery and a rum manufacturer, have asked a local court for an injunction against enforcement of the Public Health and Welfare Ministry's ban on alcholic beverages advertising on TV. The board drink people argue that the ban infringes the constitutional guarantee of freedom of expression, also and because their products are regarded as lawful in Mexico that lawlessness covers advertising them.

Two years ago, the ministry banned hard drink advertising on radio. The liquor people lost their court fights against the ban. The courts ruled that the ministry was constitutionally correct in the ban because freedom of expression has bounds.

Arty Pix in Stix Win Many New Patrons In France; Seen as Trend

Paris, Jan. 1.

With the perennial cry of crisis still keeping the film industry hopped up here a group of film lovers have been taking the problem to the public. They found that the answer still is to make good pictures. In seven days they screened 10 unreleased features and 25 shorts in such communities as Carcassone, Versailles and Toulon.

Called "The Day of Cinema," the group hires a local theatre for the showings. Most exhibs refused and were dismayed to find this carny idea is giving them serious competition and exciting populace interest. Film Minister Fourre-Cormeray even tried to have the showings stopped in the various towns but they went off on schedule. Films were mainly of art house calibre, artistic in treatment and offbeat in subject matter and treatment. These films, seldom shown in the country areas, included the Mexican film, "Los Olvidados," the audacious Swedish picture, "Miss Julie" and Rossellini's "St. Francis." Films excited a lot of interest and brought many letters from people who missed certain showings, asking when they could see the pix again.

The public complained about phony three-sheeting, stereotyped film content and the lack of interest in some of the famous stars.

No definite constructive plan has been decided upon here to handle the film troubles. In the rather typical Gallic manner there is much agitation, a lot of motion and handwaving but as yet no new tangible solution has been suggested.

Ready 1st Italian Film With New Ferranicolor

Rome, Jan. 1.

"Toto, a Colori" is the tentative title of the first feature-length color film ever to be made in Italy with an Italian color process called Ferranicolor. Prior to this time, a few documentaries and shorts had employed Ferranicolor mainly as a basis for experiment. In the meantime, the Ferrania Co., makers of this stock, has spent its time to perfect the process.

The color picture stars local comedian Toto and Isa Barzizza.

20th Finishing 'Gaucho' in Arg.

Buenos Aires, Jan. 1.

Four or five days behind schedule, 20th-Fox expects to complete shooting "Way of a Gaucho" early this month. Company then will fete the cast and crew at a party in the home of producer Philip Dunne in Martinez, nearby suburb. About 60 technical men, plus assistant directors, as well as actors and extras have been working on the film since it started last May. Producer Philip Dunne has been at work on it over 18 months.

According to an agreement made by 20th-Fox with the Argentine Producers Assn. before the film started, all local extras were paid according to the scale paid at studios here.

Luis C. Amadori of Argentina Sono Film Studios has collaborated with 20th-Fox on details of local atmosphere, as has local writer Horacio Rega Molina, an authority on gaucho lore.

The producers found 100% cooperation all round. Joseph Behm, associate producer, termed it the most successful foreign assignment he has ever been on. It will be a year or more before the picture is ready for distribution, since there is processing work to be done yet in Hollywood, along with considerable dubbing, editing and scoring. Because of fluctuating exchange rates, the picture ran slightly over its budget, but in general there were few gimmicks to its smooth sailing.

British Comic Miller To Open Palladium Season

London, Jan. 8.

The London Palladium opens its vaude season this year with a British comedian as headliner. Max Miller is to be the opening star attraction and has been pacted for two weeks beginning March 10. If the current pantomime season should be curtailed, Miller's booking will be brought forward and he will play a three-week engagement from March 3.

Miller's booking marks the end of a feud with Val Parnell, who was angry at the comic's behavior at the 1950 Command Performance when he departed from his script and overran his time. Miller's excuse at that time was that he had lost his gag book.

Five U. S. headliners have also been inked by Parnell to play in the upcoming Palladium vaude season, but firm dates have not been made in all cases. In addition to Sophie Tucker, Jack Benny and Jimmy Durante, who had been previously announced, the season's headliners may include Eddie Cantor and Judy Garland. The latter would repeat her Palace act which will be done in similar costume.

Argentine Film Biz Still on Rocks, Despite Peron's Protection Policy

Buenos Aires, Jan. 1.

As the new year opens Argentine film producers are teetering once more on the verge of bankruptcy—as they have been many times before—but this time with less excuse, because their government certainly went all out to help them by excluding foreign films for two and a half years, believing that a protectionist policy would ultimately reap rich rewards in foreign exchange.

The outlook for the industry is gloomy and uncertain. Producers are being needled by the government into self-analysis to determine where their mistakes lay. The producers themselves are about ready to go out of business unless the government bolsters them with further protection and financing. Film talent, reading the writing on the wall, are signing contracts for legit to keep the wolf from the door.

Both Raul Apold, head of the Presidential Press Bureau, who is the mastermind ruling all entertainment matters, and Entertainment Board chief Ernesto de Oliveira repeatedly ask any U. S. production men they meet to tell them what is wrong with Argentine films. The answer is: "Everything."

Producers have certainly learned the hard way that something is wrong: through crashing boxoffice failures with at least 50% of the year's record crop of some 70 films produced. Last year's record figure was 57.

Infuriated by these results, the industry is hitting out at exhibitors and foreign competition, blaming them for this poor showing. It would like the market closed again; little understanding that in entertainment, monopolies and dictatorship defeat their own ends, because audiences can't be forced to accept what they don't like. Local audiences have proved that they won't see films indiscriminately. If a Hollywood picture is poor, that picture will flop, too; if an Argentine-made is poor, mere patriotism won't get audiences to endure it.

Rap Exhibs

In turning against exhibitors, the film producers seek a cure for their financial gimmicks, claiming higher rental percentages. In a series of producer-exhibitor parleys over which the entertainment board is presiding, they claim that film admission scales must be upped, their rental percentages should be boosted and the foreign imports must be curbed. Exhibitors have countered by stating that if the producers would only get down to making really good films, the industry would have nothing to complain about and the foreign film grosses would help them recoup the losses they withstand with the local material.

Apold, a former scriptwriter, has roundly told the producers that they are mercenary and inept, and have taken advantage of the government's generous protection to put stress on quantity with disregard for quality films. Results were so poor that the material lost ground at home and abroad.

When any observer tries to analyze what is wrong with the Argentine pictures, he finds it difficult to answer. Talent seems to be available. Camerawork and technique are really good, especially if allowances are made for lack of equipment, which cannot be renewed due to the dollar shortage.

The fault lies in the selection of story material, faulty continuity and a tendency to over-emphasize melodramatic treatment. "Los Isleros" alone marked a departure from this, and owed much of its success to having been adapted from a best-selling local novel with a good local background. This marked a step in the right direction, which producers duly noted, and there has been a rush to purchase film rights to other bestsellers. But although "Los Isleros" is a fine picture and is to be exhibited in Italy under the exchange agreement with that country, its atmosphere is too local to be understood by other countries.

The greatest fault in the local film industry, however, lies in the complete lack of organization shown by the producers. That is one reason why the government welcomed 20th-Fox's decision to make a film in Argentina ("Way of a Gaucho"), so that its own producers could catch the Yanks at work and learn something.

WB Sets Second Deal For Pix on Rank Circuit

London, Jan. 8.

After having gone for more than eight years without negotiating an outlet for its product on either of the two J. Arthur Rank circuits, Warner Bros. last week concluded its second deal within a month. Two of their latest pix, "Painting Clouds with Sunshine" and "Tomorrow is Another Day" start a general release on Gaumont-British circuit Feb. 25 after a pre-release at the Odeon, Marble Arch.

WB set a deal last month for the release of "Come Fill the Cup" on the Odeon circuit beginning Feb. 4. This pic opens a West End run at Leicester Square Theatre beginning Jan. 10.

By the end of the month, WB will have five films running in the West End, but their own showcase, the Warner, is housing an indie film, "African Queen." "Streetcar Named Desire," set to follow "Queen," will open day date at their Leicester Square house as well as at Studio One, probably Jan. 31.

Mex League of Decency Plans Campaign Vs. All Dirt, Nudity on Tele

Mexico City, Jan. 2.

Claiming that TV and radio have joined films in what it calls contaminating the morality of school children, to such extent it causes most juvenile delinquency court cases, the Mexican League of Decency plans to clean up the airwaves just as it did the screen. Felipe Gomez Mont, league prexy, revealed this plan.

Appalled by what the League calls a new low in culture and morality among school children, Mont said it will strive to prune all dirt from radio. Especially under attack are blue novels, and "nudity" on TV.

League, reporting improvement in Mexican censorship of native and imported pix, explained it operates like its U. S. counterpart by classifying films according to Catholic standards. It will do the same with TV and radio.

London Legit Bits

London, Jan. 1.

Gino Arbib, exec of the Jack Hylton office, looking for theatre in West End for end of March to bring back Teresa and Luisello Spanish Ballet for eight weeks, as result of their big hit last year, when they played a season at Stoll theatre and several provincial dates... Patrick Cargill's new play, "The Loving Elms," to be tried out at the Embassy Theatre, Swiss Cottage, Jan. 15, with Andre Van Gyseghem to direct.

As result of having proved a big moneymaker for the summer season at Blackpool with the "Hobson's Choice" revival, H. M. Tennent, Ltd., signed Wilfred Pickles to star in "A Dog for Delmont," which was tried out at the "Q" theatre last February. Play will try out in provinces, opening at the Opera House, Manchester, March 31, coming to the West End later. Wallace Douglas will stage... Although "The Innocents" was first produced in London, at the Arts Theatre, some two years ago as a tryout, it was never staged in a regular theatre. Stephen Mitchell is now to present it, with Flora Robson starred. Play will be directed by Peter Glenville, who did the Broadway production, going into rehearsal Feb. 25, coming to the West End sometime in March. Play is based on the Henry James novel, "Turn of the Screw."

"Old Chelsea," the late Richard Tauber's hit musical operetta, which is owned by Bernard Delfont, will be revived by the latter again this fall, with Josef Locke to play the lead... Desmond O'Donovan is dickering for English rights of Tedwell Chapman's play, "The Deadly Done"... Peter Ustinov has just finished two days in Rome, where he flew his entire Wyndham's Theatre production, "The Love of Four Colonels," playing in the native language.

Russia Converts East Germany's Pix Industry Into Propaganda Tool

By GEORGE GAAL

Berlin, Jan. 1.

Eastern Germany's state-controlled film industry monopoly has been completely turned into a branch of the Communist propaganda machine by the Soviet occupation authorities and the ruling Red government. With this achievement, the Communists have accomplished a complete control of the film industries in the Soviet sphere of the world, along the patterns first introduced in Russia, and then gradually in the other satellite states.

Ironically enough, such a monopoly is nothing new to the Germans. While in the other satellite states, such as Poland, Hungary, Czechoslovakia and other countries, the film industry was run by private enterprise before and during the war, in Germany there was only UFA, the Nazi state's giant film monopoly. At its height, UFA represented a $200,000,000-a-year business. In western Germany the film industry is now completely private-run, but for the East Germans the film monopoly is the same old story. The only difference is that before 1945 their pix ran under the sign of the swastika, now discarded for the hammer and sickle.

UFA's giant studios in Neu-Babelsberg, a suburb of Berlin, have been rebuilt from the war's destruction with Soviet aid, and were immediately nationalized. At the same time a joint Soviet-East German owned film monopoly, Deutsche Film A.G. (DEFA) has been established, with the Russians owning 55% of the shares, and the Socialist Unity (Communist) Party (SED) 45%. At the same time, the Soviet distribution firm, Sovexport, assumed monopolistic distribution rights in the Soviet Zone.

Later, the Russians turned over their DEFA shares to the SED, which thus now has 100% control of the company. DEFA operates with an estimated yearly budget of 50-100,000,000 East Marks. If counted on the approximately five to one exchange rate between the East Mark and the West Mark, this would equal only $2,380,000 to $4,760,000. However, since wages and production costs in East and West Germany are about the same, a more realistic estimate of the DEFA budget should be made on a par basis between the East Mark and West Mark. That would come to $11,900,000 to $23,800,000 per year.

Boxoffice Values

While the Communist control of the industry is complete, the films produced by DEFA are by no means boxoffice hits among East Germans, who, even though they do live under Communist rule, hate their propaganda. (A good indication of DEFA's ineffectiveness is shown by the success of the so-called "border theatres" of West Berlin. These houses, located in the immediate vicinity of the Soviet sector, show western-produced films for practically nothing to East Germans who venture across the border. Thousands come every month, and about 1,000,000 came during the 1951 Communist World Youth Rally, which was staged in East Berlin. The youngsters, however, preferred Esther Williams and Hollywood musicals to propaganda lectures and Communist pix. The "border theatre" scheme is operated by Oscar Martay, U. S. High Commission film officer in West Berlin. Yank distribs give their pictures to these houses for free.)

Despite DEFA's enormous losses, however, the Communists have no troubles to keep their studios going. The Soviet Progress distribution company, which now has the distribution monopoly in East Germany, guarantees quite high returns to every DEFA picture, regardless of the boxoffice barometer. The losses, in turn, are added to the reparations account of East Germany, thus eventually East Germans have to pay for these pictures, even though they themselves might never go to a theatre to see them.

There are, of course, East Germans—even though anti-Communists—who do go and see these films, for the simple reason that there is no alternative. And, as was true of Nazi propaganda, DEFA films eventually manage to penetrate the minds of some of the people.

Protection Vs. Bad Gags

London, Jan. 8.

An organization for the protection of the public against overworked stage and radio gags has been formed by Henry Cain. He has started the Society for the Abolition of Old Radio and Stage Humor (registered), with the object of improving the general standard.

Cain, who is on the British Broadcasting Corp. list of gag writers, complains that comedians often use jokes, but refuse to pay for them. The Society, he claims, will see that they do.

4 Classics Planned By Renown on '52 Lineup; 'Trilby' to Start First

London, Jan. 8.

Initial project on producer George Minter's 1952 program of four international classics for Renown Pictures Corp. will be a new film version of George Du Maurier's melodrama, "Trilby." Venture is scheduled to roll sometime in March with two American stars in top roles. Exteriors would be lensed in Paris.

Minter will trek to N. Y. and Hollywood in quest of talent for "Trilby" after attending the International Film Festival in Uruguay this month. The British entry at the fete is Minter's production of Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol." While in N. Y., he will also confer with Richard Gordon, prez of Renown Pictures of America, Inc., on U. S. distribution arrangements.

Other three classics on Minter's slate include Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," Dickens' "The Pickwick Papers" and an adaptation of Richard Sheridan's Comedy, "School for Scandal," the last now being mulled. "Trilby," incidentally, was turned out twice previously in Hollywood by Equitable-World and also by First National.

OLD VIC'S 'KING LEAR' ON TOUR OF EUROPE

London, Jan. 8.

An Old Vic production of "King Lear" opens a continental tour tonight (8) at Rotterdam. It will play through Belgium, Germany and Scandinavia before its London preem March 3.

Apart from four nights at Brussels and five in Helsinki, the company will play mainly one-night stands. It will be the first visit of the Old Vic to Scandinavia. Stephen Murray plays the title part and other prominent roles are taken by Freda Jackson, Coral Browne and Andre Morell.

McEldowney in London Readying 2d Indian Pic

London, Jan. 8.

Kenneth McEldowney, here for the last week lining up a crew for his second Indian production, leaves for Calcutta soon for the Indian film festival. His production, "The River," has been submitted by the U.S. State Department. By having a predominantly British technical crew McEldowney hopes that his new production, "The Keddah," will rank for the British quota like "River."

Actual lensing will not get under way until October although major location work was completed some time back. During his London stay, McEldowney conferred with UA execs on British distribution arrangements for "River."

Eros Films' Sales Shakeup

London, Jan. 8.

Ben Henry, director of Eros Films since its formation, has taken over the newly created position of director of sales, following reorganization of the sales staff.

Nat Kramer has quit as sales manager, and this spot will be handled by Leslie Greenspan, who has been with Eros since it started.

Moodabe Honored by King

Michael Moodabe, governing director of Amalgamated Theatres, Ltd., in New Zealand, was named to the Order of the British Empire by King George VI in a Royal Honor List announced on New Year's Day.

Amalgamated is affiliated with 20th-Fox, and provides firstrun outlets for 20th product throughout New Zealand.

Liberalize Rules Of Venice Fete

Genoa, Jan. 8.

Several important changes have been announced in the regulations governing the 13th Venice Film Festival, Aug. 20-Sept. 10. Venice and Cannes fests, latter to be held in April, are the only two recognized officially as "competitive festivals" by the International Producers Assn. for the coming year.

Venice has decided this year to abolish the "Film Mart," commercial subdivision of the main festival, although it will continue to encourage international tradeshowings and sales on an unofficial basis. Instead, an International Exhibit of Film Publications will be held. Though the clause limiting total entries per country to four, except for other pix especially "invited," remains unchanged, this year's poor showing made by Italian films has brought a loosening of the regulation requiring all native-made pix be world preemed in Venice. Italo pix produced during the preceding year may now be "invited," provided not shown outside this country.

Further changes include abolition of controversial "political" clause which prohibited showings of pix of "political or ideological propaganda." Reshuffled kudos, now include one grand prix-gold Lion of St. Mark to the best pic; three second place silver Lions to runner-up films; one to the best national selection; and seven prizes (bronze lions) to be awarded at the jury's discretion for acting, scripting, camera, art, direction, music, or other special motivations. Two changes suggested by the association have been adopted for the 1952 fete: no press shows will be held prior to official presentation of film and members of the jury will not be allowed to air their views of pix on the radio or in the press for the entire run of the fete.

Ustinov's 'Truth' Folds After 6 Wks. in London; Stars Into 'Mask' Film

London, Jan. 8.

Peter Ustinov's play, "Moment of Truth," presented by Linnit & Dunfee at the Adelphi in association with Jack Hylton, folds Jan. 12 after six weeks. Eric Portman and Charles Goldner, who head the cast, have been signed by Mayflower Productions to be featured in its film, "Mask of Pharaoh," which stars Van Heflin and Wanda Hendrix, now on location in North Africa. Pic was originally to have been shot in Egypt. This is being directed by Jack Lee, with ABPC release.

Following "Truth," Hylton will stage Colonel Basil's Ballet Russe at the Adelphi for two and half weeks. It will be followed by new Hylton musical, "Bet Your Life," with book by Alan Melville and music by Kenneth Leslie Smith and Charles Zwar.

Show, which is having eight weeks' tryout at Manchester, stars Arthur Askey and Julie Wilson. It is expected to open at the Adelphi in February.

GIs Used as Extras In Mex-Made 'Cardinal'

Mexico City, Jan. 1.

Film production started here by Manuel Reachi on "Great Cardinal," theme about the Czech martyr.

Reachi is using a group of ex-GIs attending the Mexico City College under the GI Bill of Rights as extras. Among the latter is the son of Simon Goldschlag, prexy of Peliculas Selectas, distributor of independent U. S. pix.

London Film Biz Off Xmas Week Albeit 'Place in Sun' Wow $11,800; 'Women' Average $18,800 for 2d Wk.

London, Jan. 1.

The West End took its customary seasonal dip during Christmas week and most film theatres did below average biz. The major exception, however, was "A Place in the Sun," which finished its first frame with a smash $11,800 and is still packing the Plaza in second week.

The Empire is doing only average biz with "Westward the Women," second week being $18,800. "Elopement" started moderately at the Odeon, Leicester Square. At the Marble Arch Odeon, "Day Earth Stood Still" held at modest $6,700 in second round.

All West End houses were closed on Christmas Day and grosses therefore are for a six-day week.

Estimates for Last Week

Carlton (Par) (1,128; 70-$1.70)—"Thunder in East" (Par). Well below average at about $3,100. Holds for another fortnight.

Empire (M-G) (3,099; 55-$1.70)—"Westward Women" (M-G) and stage show (2d wk). Attracting only average biz, second round being $18,800. Stays a third, with "Lone Star" (M-G) opening Jan. 5.

Gaumont (CMA) (1,500; 50-$1.70)—"Double Dylamite" (RKO) and "Best of Badmen" (RKO) (2d wk). Second frame pushing up to $5,600 after fair $5,300 opening week. Holds a third with "His Excellency" (GFD) following.

Leicester Square Theatre (CMA) (1,753; 50-$1.70)—"Mr. Denning Drives North" (BL). Fair $6,200 or near. Stays another fortnight with "Come Fill Cup" (WB) following.

London Pavilion (UA) (1,217; 50-$1.70)—"M" (Col) and "Five" (Col) (2d wk). Average $3,000 after steady $6,200 opening stanza.

Odeon, Leicester Square (CMA) (2,200; 50-$1.70) — "Elopement" (20th) and "Care My Little Girl" (20th). Opened briskly with $5,800 possible in first four days. Likely in for three weeks.

Odeon, Marble Arch (CMA) (2,200; 50-$1.70)—"Earth Stood Still" (20th) and "Love Nest" (20th) (3d wk). Held at $5,300 after fair $5,300 in second frame. "Two Tickets to Broadway" (GFD) and "The Racket" (GFD) begin Jan. 3.

Plaza (Par) (1,902; 70-$1.70)—"Place in Sun" (Par) (2d wk.)—Only picture in town currently drawing big crowds, doing capacity nightly. Handsome $11,800 grossed in first week and likely to maintain same pace in second round. Stays, of course.

Warner (WB) (1,735; 50-$1.70)—"Only the Valient" (WB) (2d wk). Useful $5,800 after modest $7,800 in opening week. "African Queen" (Indie) opens Jan. 7.

Self-Censor

London, Jan. 8.

G. Watkyn, the British theatre play censor, has written a drama which he will censor himself titled, "The Moonraker." It's being tried out at Manchester by Hallmark Productions, with Terence de Marney directing.

It opens Feb. 9, with a West End bow to follow.

Scottish Exhib Leader Points to Brit. Cinema Tax Setup as Cockeyed

Glasgow, Jan. 1.

Sir Alexander B. King, British cinema magnate, who controls 92 cinemas in Scotland, has warned exhibitors here that present British cimera tax scales are cockeyed. He said he could never understand why other theatres and football clubs were not required to introduce the same cockeyed scales which cinemas are forced to use.

Sir Alex said his new tax scheme, okayed by the British Cinematograph Exhibitors Assn. would put the tax on a correct basis "so that if we got concessions in the next budget, we can get the concessions off every denomination for every third seat, and at least get 50% of the increase."

It is the first time since 1916 (when the Entertainments Tax was started) that they had a scheme set out so many months in advance of the budget, said Sir Alexander, who hoped exhibs would put their pleas before local members of Parliament.

If the plan, he said, was going to lose $12,000,000 to $15,000,000 in taxes, there are plenty of fields within the entertainment industry but outside cinemas where "that miserable $12,000,000 we are asking for" could be picked up.

MEX ACTORS STRIKE TO WIN BACK WAGES

Mexico City, Jan. 1.

Mexico's first strike of its kind, that called by the National Actors Union (ANDA) to force a theatrical empresario to pay wages claimed to be long in arrears, has been launched against the Italian Astral Musical Comedy Co., an imported troupe supplemented by several Mexicans which played the Teatro Iris here for four months. Biz flourished despite the new top here of $4.04 but only briefly. Trade progressively worsened. Some players claim that three months is owed them by the National Theatrical Federation.

The Iris, old namehouse of Esperanza Iris, vet comedian, now has red-black banners of organized Mexican labor draped across its front door, a regular procedure for strikes in Mexico. Day and night strike guards are being maintained by Mexican and Italian show biz members of the two unions.

The Federal Board of Conciliation and Arbitration is striving to end the strike but the unions aver it will only be settled by full payment of demanded wages.

'Third Person,' Lauded In London, Looms Okay

London, Jan. 8.

"Third Person," Andrew Rosenthal's dramatic but inconclusive play, opened at the Criterion last Thursday (3) under the management of Tom Arnold and Emile Littler. Drama of the returned soldier who becomes a misfit civilian has an even chance of succeeding, following favorable press acclaim. "Person" had a successful season recently at the Arts Theatre Club.

Play is superbly acted by a first-rate cast (original Arts Theatre cast), which comprises Roger Livesey, Ursula Jeans, Denholm Elliott, Ruth Dunning, Kenneth Hyde and Janette Scott. Roy Rich directed.

BIG EDINBURGH FEST ROLE FOR NEW YORKERS

Glasgow, Jan. 1.

New York will have its biggest share thus far in International Edinburgh Festival this year. This news was brought in by Ian Hunter, artistic director of the Festival, when he arrived by plane at Prestwick, near here, after two weeks in Canada and the U. S. The Festival of Music and Drama will be held Aug. 17-Sept. 6 this year.

He has made prelim arrangements for the N. Y. City Ballet to take part, and he expects the N. Y. Philharmonic to participate again.

This season German opera will be presented by the Hamburg State Opera. The Concertgebouw Orch of Amsterdam, under direction of Edouard van Beinum and Rafael Kugelik also has been set.

Brit. Technicians' 3d Pic Co-op Venture Underway

London, Jan. 8.

Production started yesterday (Mon.) on the Assn. of Cine Technicians' third cooperative venture, which is being made for Monarch release. Entitled "Private Information," it is being lensed at Nettlefold Studios.

Ronnie Kinnoch is producer and Fergus McDonell has the directing chore. Cast includes Jill Esmond, Jack Watling, Carole Marsh and Marcy Havstead

An Important Announce

WE'RE STARTING 1952
GREATEST PICTURES EVER

JANUARY

1 "DECISION BEFORE DAWN" Anatole Litvak, the man who gave you the "SNAKE PIT", has another masterpiece currently winning the critics' plaudits. Gary Merrill, Richard Basehart, and newcomers Oskar Werner and Hildegarde Neff lead the way in a film that is on everyone's "Ten Best" list... A "must" for every showman.

2 "JAPANESE WAR BRIDE" Out of the present Korean conflict comes a most unusual love story of mixed marriage. Introducing Japan's top feminine star "Yamaguchi", plus Don Taylor, Marie Windsor and Cameron Mitchell in a startling motion picture.

3 "THE MODEL AND THE MARRIAGE BROKER" The warm, human story of the unsung matchmakers who give Cupid a little push in the right direction. A Jeanne Crain picture perfectly embellished by the exciting performances of Thelma Ritter, Scott Brady, Frank Fontaine and Zero Mostel.

FEBRUARY

4 "PHONE CALL FROM A STRANGER" In the tradition of "A LETTER TO THREE WIVES" and "ALL ABOUT EVE" comes a dramatic triumph which lashes out at the "Double Standard" of marriage. Great performances by Bette Davis, Gary Merrill, Keenan Wynn, Michael Rennie and the positively sizzling Shelley Winters.

5 "RED SKIES OF MONTANA" The first story of the courageous "Smoke Jumpers"... Technicolor flashing across the screen with the most spectacular action sequences ever filmed. Richard Widmark heads a cast of rough, tough guys in a picture that combines power, drama, and all the excitement of the Great American Northwest.

MARCH

6 "FIVE FINGERS" The true, shocking revelations of the highest paid spy in history whose unbelievable exploits stunned the world. James Mason, Dannielle Darrieux and Michael Rennie head the cast of Joseph Mankiewicz's tingler filmed in Ankara and Istanbul.

7 "RETURN OF THE TEXAN" The adventurous story of a man who came home to the land that bred him and the woman who loved him. Vividly set in America's new great Southwest and dramatically portrayed by Dale Robertson, Joanne Dru and Walter Brennan.

8 "VIVA ZAPATA!" Another off-the-beaten-path dramatic achievement utilizing the collective talents of 20th Century-Fox's "Greats". John Steinbeck wrote it. Darryl Zanuck produced it. Elia Kazan directed it. Marlon Brando stars in it. "That" should give the theatre-going public an idea of what's in store for them.

nent from 20 Century-Fox

WITH SIX MONTHS OF THE COMPLETED IN 20 HISTORY

APRIL

9 "WITH A SONG IN MY HEART" The long awaited Jane Froman story brought to the screen as a brilliant Technicolor musical-drama. Susan Hayward, David Wayne, Thelma Ritter and Rory Calhoun head a sparkling cast in a film that is destined to be among the very best in 1952.

10 "PRIDE OF ST. LOUIS" Presenting Dan Dailey as he romps through the ever-loving Dizzy Dean story. A natural for the entire family (for exploitation too, as the release date coincides with the beginning of the baseball season). Joanne Dru co-stars in this great picture about a great guy.

11 "ROSE OF CIMARRON" Jack Beutel in his first film since "THE OUTLAW" plus Mala Powers (of "CYRANO") in an exciting outdoor adventure spectacle filmed in brilliant Natural Color.

MAY

12 "BELLES ON THEIR TOES" The delightful Gilbreth family of "CHEAPER BY THE DOZEN" is at it again in a great big bouncy Technicolor film headed by Jeanne Crain, Myrna Loy, Debra Paget and Jeffrey Hunter. Just the most wonderful kind of family entertainment anyone could hope for.

13 "DOWN AMONG THE SHELTERING PALMS" South Pacific splendor and good old-fashioned fun in this Technicolor musical featuring Mitzi Gaynor, David Wayne, Jane Greer, William Lundigan and Gloria DeHaven. A lot of singing... dancing... laughing... and box-office!

14 "THE OUTCASTS OF POKER FLAT" Bret Harte's classic story now unfolded on the screen color by Technicolor with an impressive cast headed by Anne Baxter, Dale Robertson, Miriam Hopkins, Barbara Bates and Cameron Mitchell. Top dramatic fare.

JUNE

15 "KANGAROO!" A roaring Technicolor adventure filmed entirely in Australia: Maureen O'Hara, Peter Lawford, Richard Boone and Finlay Currie... plus stampedes, aborigines, wild animals and blazing brush fires. Excitement all the way through and thoroughly promoted by equally exciting exploitation.

16 "WE'RE NOT MARRIED" . What happens when people suddenly find that they are not legally married. A group of unusual dramatic and hilarious situations breathtakingly performed by Ginger Rogers, David Wayne, Fred Allen, Marilyn Monroe, Paul Douglas and Jan Sterling.

Govt. Counsel Roughed Up In Hughes Appeal

Washington, Jan. 8.

Government counsel was given a rough time by the Supreme Court Monday (7) as he argued in the appeal of Howard Hughes against being compelled to sell his stock in RKO Theatres Corp.

Philip Marcus, motion picture specialist of the antitrust division, spoke in support of an order by the New York trial court that the court-appointed trustees of Hughes' theatre stock shall sell it unless Hughes himself disposes of it within two years. Thomas A. Slack, counsel for Hughes, asserted the trial was "improper and without legal foundation."

The RKO consent decree provides that Hughes' 24% interest in either the theatres the studio should be voted by court-named trustees until Hughes sells his holdings. He decided to trustee the theatre stock after the theatre and production interests were split in the decree.

Slack made the point that the decree itself does not compel Hughes to sell his stock and that the court and Justice Department were trying to rewrite the antitrust decree. Marcus, who was not responsible for the RKO decree, defended on the ground that the understanding of the Justice Department and the trial court was that Hughes would sell, and latter's refusal to unload the theatres created a change in circumstances. He pointed to sections in later decrees against the other majors which specifically call for sale of the divorced theatre interests by big stockholders in the studios.

"If the RKO decree were signed in 1948," asked Justice Stanley Reed, "why should we look to something subsequent to it to determine what it meant?"

"You say it was contemplated that Hughes should sell within a reasonable time," commented Justice Sherman Minton. "If reasonable time were written in the decree, wouldn't he be entitled to a hearing on what constituted a reasonable time?" Marcus claimed the new order gave Hughes a total of six years for selling the theatres.

Justices Felix Frankfurter and Hugo L. Black both asserted that the Government's position was "ambiguous." Marcus admitted there was no agreement that Hughes should sell, but "we understood he would sell."

Marcus said at first the decree was not being modified or amended by the N. Y. court, but merely "interpreted." Later, however, pressed by questions from the bench, Marcus admitted the Government position to be that it was "partly" modified.

In his arguments, Slack contended that "we cannot be penalized by later events to which we were not a party (the 20th and Warner decrees, which include specific provisions for sale of theatre stock). "The appellant," he continued, "has not had one single night of ownership of this theatre stock except under Government threat of forced sale. They have not given us one day free of harassment and threats. The decree should not be tortured into a forced sale."

Slack said Hughes had voluntarily agreed to trustee the stock and that, if he hadn't agreed, the Government "had no relief against him" since he was not a party to the antitrust suit. Slack said the decree should not require "forfeiture and forced sale" of stock by Hughes and added that it "shouldn't be construed as if he walked into a trap. It is elementary that the court should not change the decree without a showing of changed conditions of fraud."

Uniform Vacation Period At Col, July 21-Aug. 2

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Columbia has announced plans for a uniform vacation period for studio personnel, with studio suspending all activity between July 21-Aug. 2.

Studio said, however, that "activities relating to preparation of pictures requiring services of certain writers, producers and others will continue, also maintenance of plant production personnel."

Greene Minority

they knew of the battle for control was via the barrage of literature which went out during October, November and early December from both sides in their quest for support.

Exact tally won't be known until tomorrow, but under the cumulative voting system used, Schwartz and Greene obviously had nearly equal backing, with the huge block held by Hughes providing the decisive balance for the management.

One Vote For Each Director

Each share of stock has one vote for each director. There are just over 3,900,000 shares outstanding. Hughes owns 929,000 shares. That would leave approximately 3,000,000 shares divided between Schwartz and Greene.

With the Hughes-Schwartz victory, board will be enlarged from the present five to a proposed six members. While neither side has disclosed which of its nominees it will throw its votes behind and elect, insiders view likely a board make up as follows:

For Irving Trust—Ben-Fleming Sessel, v.p. of the bank, and William J. Wardall, retired, who is something of a professional board member. He pulled McKesson & Robbins out of receivership and has performed other important financial feats.

For management—Schwartz, who has been with RKO for 30 years and prexy since company was organized a year ago; and either Edward C. Raftery or Leland Hayward, probably the former. Raftery, former prexy of United Artists, is counsel for the RKO circuit and member of the law firm of O'Brien, Driscoll & Raftery. Hayward is a theatrical producer.

For Greene—Greene himself and A. Louis Oresman, attorney and accountant and former deputy regional director of the War Production Board.

Schwartz, Sessel and Wardall are now members of the board. Nominee on the management slate likely to drop out is J. P. Dreibelbis, v.p. of Bankers Trust N. Y. His position has been attacked since Bankers Trust finances RKO Pictures, from which the circuit is supposed to be detached.

Battle between the Greene group and the management has been going on virtually since the company was organized Jan. 1, 1951, under antitrust decrees requiring divorcement of picture and theatre companies. Greene has maintained that all the theatre board members were named by Hughes and were thus under his domination despite his election to stay with the picture company.

Greene nudged the Dept. of Justice into taking action, but the N. Y. Federal Court last October refused to order a change, particularly inasmuch as the stockholders' balloting was slated to follow so soon. Meantime, however, the D. of J. has been fighting Hughes' efforts to allay a court decision requiring Irving Trust, to which he has trusteed his theatre shares, to sell the stock by 1955 if Hughes hasn't arranged a sale by next year. Argument was heard by the U. S. Supreme Court Monday (7).

owns 13% (134,900 shares) of the outstanding shares and option warrants of U. Decca holds approximately 30%—304,000 shares and warrants.

Should Rank object to the reorg plan, it is conceivable that he could rally a sufficient number of independent stockholders to vote it down. It thus appears certain that when the lawyers have it in presentable form, Rank will be taken into confidence on it.

Meanwhile, Decca prexy Milton R. Rackmil has been on the Coast. Reportedly, his work there has been almost wholly concerned with Decca, with any huddles at the U studios pretty much coincidental. Plan is for him to become prexy of the merged companies and U's present chieftain, Nate Blumberg, to become chairman of the board.

Six pictures will make up Edmund Grainger's 1952 production program for RKO release, or double the number he turned out in 1951.

Judge Rules Story Buy For Pix Doesn't Include Character or Sequels

Los Angeles, Jan. 8.

Dashiell Hammett, author of "The Maltese Falcon," won a decision over Warners in a case that will have a far-reaching effect on future literary litigation. Verdict by Federal Judge William C. Mathes upheld a writer's continuing right to a character he has created.

In this case the character is Sam Spade, private eye in "Falcon," which Warners filmed several years ago. Studio sued Hammett, Regis Radio and CBS, charging plagiarism on the ground that in purchasing the story it also purchased all rights to the character.

Ruling was that Warners had no rights to "Falcon" but not to any sequel in which the Spade character is involved.

Jane Greer Buys Back Contract From RKO

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Jane Greer, dissatisfied with her assignments at RKO, paid an undisclosed sum to the studio for release for her player contract, which had five months to run on the current option term.

Her most recent appearances were in "Down Among the Sheltering Palms" and "You're in the Navy Now" on loanout to 20th-Fox.

Argentine Living

better suburbs or a swank eight-room apartment in the best part of town might run up to 4,000 pesos monthly, which at the current rate is $133.32. Such prices would be rated very much on the uppish side. I ran into a Panagra pilot whose place had three bedrooms, each with bath; living and dining rooms, kitchen, maid's quarters and sizable grounds. He was paying considerably less and complaining. Seems his predecessor had gotten the whole deal for $66.66 (2,000 pesos) and he had a swimming pool thrown in. Most of the 3,500 U. S. families who live in Argentina and earn dollars pay less. Said one: "This is the only place where you can really luxuriate on your Social Security benefits."

If you like the best while away from home, you can stop at B.A.'s Plaza, one of the best staffed and serviced hotels anywhere at $3.00 a day; the Lancaster, a Continental style hostelry for $1.87. Or get an apartment for two at the Bristol for $1.68 to $2.50. The law requires top hotels to add 24% for service in lieu of tips. Lesser places charge 18%. Though it doesn't seem logical it's even less expensive to head down to Argentina's leading summer vacation spot, Mardel Plata. The season runs from mid-December through mid-March, season below the equator being reversed. Here at such top hotels as the Tourbillion and Hermitage, a room overlooking the Atlantic, plus three meals a day, is only $5 plus service charges. Your admission to the world's largest casino is 68c. but it serves for a month and even entitles you to park the kids with a free, official baby-sitter. Chips for roulette start with a peso 3c. so that with a few bucks you can feel just like King Farouk.

Travelling around Argentina on one of the many excursions operated by Exprinter or American Express is even less costly. Seven days all expense to the mountain area of Mendoza, including sleepers, hotels, meals, cars is 630 pesos each or $21 if two go together. It's $18.34 apiece for a party of four. A 15-day trip to the lovely southern lakes between Argentina and Chile will set you back only $40 which averages out $2.60 for everything.

With such prices, we might conclude, it hardly seems worthwhile to keep on the local 9 to 5 grind. But there are a few hitches. It does cost $500 Idlewild to Buenos Aires. Additionally Argentina is run by the Perons although this doesn't worry visitors from the States overly much. Finally, these bargain prices are only for Americans who come down with dollars. Argentines who still earn in pesos aren't so lucky. When costs will catch up with the exchange no one knows. But with the dollar bill looking like small change daily, Argentina is certainly one place you might well consider.

Inside Stuff—Pictures

Metro crew which shot location scenes for "Mr. Congressman" in Washington last week was given a few bad minutes of worry by a flip editorial in the Washington Post. Editorial, in a light vein, claimed Metro found the Capitol rotunda "much too dirty for the fastidious eyes of movie customers" and put a crew of cleaners to work scrubbing grime from statues and pillars and shining up the floors.

"No doubt," said the Post editorial, "a lot of people who are upset about the current state of political morals will see something symbolic in the episode at the Capitol."

Since Metro was shooting inside the Capitol by special permission from Congress and with special cooperation from the Architect of the Capitol and his staff which maintains the structure, it was felt this could lead to complications. James W. Merrick, publicity man on location with the Metro crew, promptly wrote a letter to the editor denying that the place was "too dirty for movie customers," insisting that it had been well cleaned in advance by the Capitol crew and explained that the limited amount of cleaning was routine to bring out highlights in the pillars and eliminate footprints. He called the editorial "not only misleading, in variance with the fact, but definitely unfair to the office of the Capitol architect."

However, the newspaper had the final word. After printing Merrick's letter in full, it commented, "So far as it concerned the reasons for cleaning up the rotunda, the editorial was based on information given to our reporter by Mr. Merrick himself."

Dore Schary, Metro production topper, is the author of a booklet, "Hanukkah Home Service," which is being distributed by the United Synagogue of America.

In an introductory note, Simon Greenberg, executive director, expresses the organization's gratitude to Schary for permission to make available "this Hanukkah Home Service which he prepared for his own family service." Greenberg further notes that Schary "wrote this Service out of a desire to fill a deeply felt personal need. He wrote not for an outside audience, but for his children, his wife and himself. He sought to make Hanukkah a beautiful and meaningful experience in his home."

Sixteen-page booklet explains meaning of the holiday and purpose of the lighting of the candles. Eighth and final candle, Schary notes, stands for peace and for the eighth night service he writes: "America's own symbols and words, such as the words on the Liberty Bell and the words on its Great Seal, are words from the Torah. So, in every fibre of our being, as Americans and Jews, we can rededicate ourselves to the Festival of Peace."

"Maurice Guest," which reportedly will be one of Paramount's more ambitious ventures for 1952, is based upon a 45-year-old novel of the same name by the late Henry Handel Richardson. Studio recently acquired the work from the Richardson estate and W. W. Norton & Co., Inc., its publisher. Sellers were represented by the Sarah Rollitts Agency.

Bernard Smith, onetime Par story editor, will produce "Guest." He'll also hold production reins for the company on a film version of F. Scott Fitzgerald's "Babylon Revisited." Latter will be screenplayed by Philip and Julius Epstein. They'll also co-direct.

Another Richardson work, incidentally, was bought by Metro in 1945 but was never put before the cameras. Yarn is titled "Fortunes of Richard Mahoney."

Robert Flaherty Memorial Library has been launched by the Assn. of Documentary & Television Film Cameramen, section NABET-CIO. Funds obtained from a recent ADTFC showing of Flaherty films will be used to finance the project. Library will comprise a collection of technical and theoretical books on the film as a means of aiding the development of film craftsmanship.

Grosses rolled up by "Rebecca" in western Germany indicate a rich harvest for David O. Selznick, who has at least a dozen features never exhibited in that sector because of war conditions. For the first six months of 1952 Selznick has lined up "Spellbound," "The Prisoner of Zenda" and "Duel In the Sun" for German distribution, with more to follow.

Inadvertently omitted from the list of the year's top-grossing films in VARIETY's Anniversary Issue last week was Nat Holt's "Great Missouri Raid." Pic was released by Paramount and will gross about $1,400,000. List comprised films that will earn $1,000,000 or more in U.S. and Canadian film rentals.

Vote 25G Extra for Tours

which will again sponsor the tours, said this week that the timing of the trips and availability of personalities will be controlled on one hand by the local exhib groups and on the other by a Hollywood committee. COMPO's part will be to coordinate the two.

That means, he explained, that tours will be booked into each exchange territory as close as possible to the time asked by each local committee. Latter's requests will be forwarded to Hollywood to find what stars are available the desired week and an attempt will then be made to best satisfy both sides on timing.

For that reason, no effort will be made to condense all the tours into a specific month or months, Mayer said, except that in general the period will start in the spring and run through the season of good weather.

Most of the difficulties encountered in setting the "Movietime" tours was because they were crowded into a single week. It is expected the spread will eliminate such troubles, which primarily were the inability to get a sufficient number of important name personalities.

Company prexies also listened to Mayer's proposal for a joint ad campaign along considerably different lines from the composite copy used during last fall's "Movietime" drive. At that time 18 pix from 10 companies were featured in the ads, which were topped with institutional copy.

New scheme, for one thing, calls for ads to be spread out over many months instead of all being run in one week. Each of the participating companies would be responsible, both financially and in preparation and placement of copy, for advertising of a single month. It would plug its own pix in a minimum space schedule and would agree to an approximate space division between an industry message and pitch on its own pix.

Two space schedules were suggested, which could be used separately or in a combination of parts of each. One calls for 600 lines in 220 dailies in 103 cities of over 100,000 population. Total circulation would be 35,000,000. Cost would be $54,000.

Second schedule calls for 1,000 lines in the same papers. Cost would be $90,000. Mechanical, production and shipping costs would add 10% to each.

Plan was nixed by the smaller companies in the fear that they'd have no proper pix to so extensively plug during the months assigned to them. They also objected to a suggestion that the industry go back to the composite ads of "Movietime" and an impartial, outside jury select the pix to be plugged.

As a result, prexies referred the matter to an ad committee to try to find a formula that would be acceptable to all companies. There was agreement, however, that a campaign of some sort should be undertaken.

Styne Financing Frenzy

run of 11 years ago. And until he obtained all the bankroll for the project, he was unable to use any of the coin already invested, so he had to finance personally nearly all the production expense up to about 10 days prior to the opening last Thursday (3) at the Broadhurst, N. Y.

Originally budgeted at $125,000, the project appeared in sound shape early last fall. But then Ben Feiner, brother-in-law of Rodgers, had to pull out as co-producer because of commitments in Hollywood. Shortly afterward, a Chicago investor withdrew his pledged slice of the financing. Styne was by that time emotionally and financially committed on the production, so he started scrambling to lineup the balance of the required bankroll.

He gave co-producer billing and a small share of the management's end of the profits to Leonard Key, who brought in some money, and reportedly offered co-producer status and 'dollar-for-dollar return to other prospective backers. He generally got turn-downs, however, and still was $45,000 short only two weeks before the scheduled preem.

Royalties as Security

By borrowing from his own music publishing company and putting up his "Blondes" and "Aisle" royalties as security, Styne obtained $53,000, which was enough to complete the financing. Then, a few days before the Broadway opening, Anthony B. Farrell, who had put up the bond money and invested $10,000, being slated for associate producer billing, took an additional $20,000 slice, giving him a $30,000 share (plus the bonds) as limited partner and leaving Styne as $33,000 limited partner. Although the Styne end of the manager's 50% interest isn't revealed, he is understood to have retained most of it, so he stands to clean up from both ends if the show makes a profit.

The show's actual production cost was around $136,000, excluding bonds but including about $11,000 loss on the last-minute tryout booking in New Haven, where the gross was approximately $23,000. Styne figures that on the basis of $39,600 capacity at the Broadhurst, N. Y., the revival's $27,000 break-even nut will allow an operating profit of nearly $8,000 a week. At that rate, "Joey" stands to get into the black in about 20 weeks of sellout trade, or around the last week in May. In the event the musical holds up that long and is able to get through next summer, it might be in position to mop up next fall, either on Broadway or the road.

Styne reveals that, after being given the brush by nearly everybody he approached to invest in the show, he was amused when many of the same people wanted to buy in when they saw the show in the New Haven tryout. By that time, he says, he was in so deep and believed in the revival so firmly that, rather than "hedge" his investment, he was determined to go all the way through with it.

However, after that experience, he says he's lost his enthusiasm for playing horses. Compared to his "Joey" gamble, any other betting would seem penny-ante stuff, he thinks.

N. Y. District

either management or the union has had to give a conclusive "yes" or " " answer.

Nix 18% Demand

Companies apparently are willing to grant cost of living increase, but aren't prepared to go as high as the 18% District 65 is demanding. On the basis of the offer made two weeks ago by Columbia, it appears the pix outfits would agree to a 10% hike. Col's offer was for 10% for all salaries up to $100 and a $10 across-the-board increase for all those earning more than $100. Unionites, however, feel that 10% offer is too low since, they point out, they haven't had a pay hike in three years. The 10% wage increase seems to be the pattern being followed by the industry. Recent salary hikes obtained by white collarites as a result of new contracts negotiated by Home Office Employees Union, International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees, averaged approximately 10%. In addition, Local 230, Sign, Pictorial and Display Union, AFL, which reps pub-ad staffers at RKO Pictures, gained a $10 across-the-board hike.

Question of wages is not the only point separating film execs and District 65. Security clauses, which union deems as important as wage demands, reportedly is meeting serious opposition. "Basic crew" idea, which stemmed from union's resentment of layoffs and firings in recent years; arbitration of all disputes including layoffs, complete union shop, and the pension plan are proposals on which the union and the companies are still far apart.

No Formal Proposal

Although two companies had indicated that they would favor joint negotiations with all pix outfits, with District 65 members sitting in together, the union to date has received no formal proposal for such talks. Union execs refused to comment whether or not they would accept the proposal, but indicated that the membership would consider the offer when and if it were presented.

Meanwhile, Local 230, which speaks for publicists at RKO Theatres and Loew's, is setting a date for the opening of negotiations at these companies. H-63, Motion Picture Home Office Employees, third labor group in the field representing pub-ad staffers, is attempting to conclude pacts for all the white collarites under its jurisdiction before it begins negotiations for the Paramount flacks.

UA Stock

liance, jubilant in mood, had called in reporters to comment on the "progress" and to convey to all in the industry their thanks for the assists rendered.

'Marvelous' Exhib Support

William J. Heineman, sales topper, acknowledged the "marvelous support" given the outfit by exhibitors who, in some cases, actually had offered cash advances "which we couldn't accept." While he was grateful, Heineman said these theatremen recognized that to help UA initially meant to help themselves in the long run by contributing to the welfare of an outfit facing what would have represented elimination of an important source of product.

The new co-owners of UA, with Miss Pickford and Chaplin, are Krim, Heineman, Robert J. Benjamin, Matthew Fox, Max E. Youngstein and Arnold Picker. Breakdown on the specific amount of stock held by each was declined by Krim, who felt such disclosure would achieve no purpose.

Under their deal with Miss Pickford and Chaplin, Krim and associates receive 100% management control plus 50% of the actual UA ownership upon showing a profit in any of the first three years after signing of their pact. In what the trade generally acknowledges as a startling accomplishment, the group achieved the black-ink report in the first year.

Uphill Battle

Krim himself said it was "quite unexpected." It was aimed for in 1953 and "secretly hoped for" in 1952, he confided. He recalled that when his group took over last February they confronted nine weeks of losses "so staggering" they failed to see how they could be overcome. The following eight to 10 weeks were equally discouraging. improvement was noted in May and by mid-June the periods of profit-making began and have yet to cease.

1951's upbeat earnings (the specific amount has yet to be determined) represent the first profit for UA since 1946.

Krim complimented his pards in achieving the success. He cited Heineman's development of the domestic sales organization, Youngstein for building an "imaginative and vigorous" ad-pub department and the "remarkable change" in the foreign distribution setup. Benjamin handled the foreign operation until Picker switched from Columbia to UA last fall.

Toppers to Coast

Krim related UA is well heeled with product for 1952 and already is underway with negotiations looking to releasing deals for 1953. He, Benjamin and Youngstein probably will leave for the Coast in about 10 days to see new indie product for UA release and consult with Lew Wasserman, president of Music Corp. of America, regarding the projected package deal with a group of five MCA-client stars. Deal, still in the early stages of negotiation, would have Cary Grant, Alan Ladd, Marlon Brando, James Stewart and Gregory Peck each making one film per year and taking a partial ownership in lieu of salary.

Outlook for '52 looks "increasingly healthy," Krim stated. In line with this, Heineman reported that 50% of the Eagle Lion Classics product, acquired last spring, has yet to be liquidated. This includes new product such as Benegoss' unreleased "Green Gloves."

Krim said he's "hopeful" the new Charles Chaplin pic, "Limelight," will be channeled through UA, but there's no definite assurance of this. When Krim took over, preference deals with Miss Pickford and Chaplin were eliminated, meaning the two co-owners get no special distribution deals with UA but are free to enter releasing pacts with other outfits.

Bank Backing

UA's prexy claimed the outfit's finances are in good shape. He said there has been, and there is continuing, some bank support for indie production and there still remains $700,000 of the $2,000,000 revolving credit established by the Walter Heller factoring outfit of Chicago. Additionally, borrowings repaid will be restored to the revolving fund.

UA still is bent on barring any pix from television during the distrib's licensing period which runs normally from five to seven years, Krim said.

Warners Paces Several Companies In Buying Up Their Own Stock

Several film companies still are continuing with programs of reducing capitalization structure via purchases of their own stock on the N. Y. Stock Exchange. Leading the field is Warners, which reported it's considering an appropriation of $15,000,000 for acquisition of about 1,000,000 common shares.

Last summer WB laid out that same amount to buy up 1,015,915 shares. Invitation was sent to stockholders to tender their stock at up to $15 per share. New offer, when it's finally decided upon, will follow the same pattern but the maximum price is expected to be upped to around $16 per share or mor . WB stock on N. Y.' big board is now trading at close to $15 per share.

Columbia still following through on its policy of reducing its outstanding $4.25 cumulative preferred issue. Col within the past month bought up an additional 300 of these shares, bringing to 4,000 the number now held in treasury.

Universal is following the same course, having acquired an additional 350 of its 4¼% cumulative preferred stock. This ups to 6,510 shares now in the U treasury.

On another front, Col is adding to its outstanding common stock. Company listed an additional 16,395 common shares on the N. Y. Exchange, representing the 2½% stock dividend recently paid to stockholders. Col now has 672,183 common shares out.

Mayer-M-G

duction boss, and which he figured to collect upon employment termination. Rubin's equity was estimated at $1,080,000. Mayer's severance was immediately significant since he already has bowed from the M-G fold while Rubin is continuing as v.p. and general cousel.

Although controlling only 100 shares, Garfield could reap a handsome reward from successful prosecution of the action. The courts traditionally are liberal in awarding "damages" to plaintiffs in actions of the kind, although no fixed percentage is set.

Mayer's deal gave him 10% ownership of all pix made while he was at the helm, including those which were 50% completed when he exited as studio topper last Aug. 31. When he was in N. Y. early last month, Mayer and Loew's officials negotiated terms for the corporation's buyout of his interests. It was estimated that the basis of this was a payoff of about $2,500,000.

Garfield contends that the deal should be declared "void, cancelled, annulled, surrendered and relinquished." His suit, which was filed in N. Y. Federal Court, names Loew's board of directors as defendants, and he claims that "each of them is liable for breach of fiduciary duty, and for waste, misappropriation, conversion and wrongful dealing with the property and assets of the corporation."

Garfield became interested in the M-G contracts via a court action some time ago involving RKO. He had represented Frederick Lundberg, author of "The Imperial Hearst," in the successful suit charging RKO with plagiarism in its film, "Citizen Kane."

In this action, Garfield had cited the records of the famed "Letty Lynton" case, in which M-G was charged with plagiarism in its production of "Dishonored Lady." From testimony given by Mayer and Rubin during the "Lynton" court session, Garfield aims to show that the two drew straight compensation for M-G production and were to receive no right to residual values in pix.

U. S. Newsreels

quality is too poor to sell in the U. S. market.

MPAA has made representations to the State Dept., the Brazilian Embassy, and to local reps. So far, the State Dept. has made an informal protest, but officials are considering the drafting of a formal note. Newsreel companies gave notice that they will fight the decree strongly, since they consider their product a medium of information. The restrictions placed upon the news films by the Brazilian government is looked upon as an infringement of freedom of the press.

In a further effort to lift the decree, Eric Johnston, MPAA prexy, may visit Brazil at the end of this month to confer with government officials.

convention, 20th's prexy Spyros P, Skouras said the early delivery of product should mean a big advantage in that the sales force will "be enabled to give each picture the kind of handling it deserves."

He added: "The techniques of both the advertising and distribution departments must be completely reorganized and reset to conform with conditions that beset us today, and meet the taste and demand of the public."

Skouras called upon the field men to voice their opinions on selling methods in the interest of servicing exhibs. He pledged that all recommendations will be considered and "will be adopted if they are reasonable and practicable."

'Long Purse'

not materialized, enough other problems have grown out of bidding to make both exhibs and distribs unhappy over their five-year experience with it. Undoubtedly, however, the theatremen are much more unhappy than the film peddlers.

Exhibs—at whose instance the decree came about and bidding resulted—feel that it has inordinately pushed up film rentals. That's their beef.

Distribs, on the other hand, are pleased with bidding to the extent that it is an effective guarantee against lawsuits for failure to provide product. Secondly, just as the exhibs say, it has pushed up prices in some instances, which is fine as far as the sellers are concerned.

Distribs think bidding has created more evils than it has cured, however. That results principally from the fact that bidding, in part at least, has been responsible for many moveups of runs. Distribs feel that this has upset the whole system of gradual playoff of pix through various runs—a system on which the success of the industry was built. This trade practice revolution is thought in many circles to be largely responsible for the tough times at the b.o. in recent years.

Lippert-SAG

worth of production annually. Among those with whom he had deals to finance their production and who will be hit are Charles Marquis Warren and Stephen Longstreet. Move will probably also be a blow to Carl Foreman, with whom Lippert had a financing-releasing arrangement.

Lippert said he had been forced into his decision by suspicion of SAG and the crafts that the financing was actually a blind to cover his own production activities. SAG dispute involved extra payment the actors demanded for use of Lippert films on televisi Lippert had previously made deal with the American Federation of Musicians by which pix dualled into tele would be rescored and a 5% of gross fee paid the union.

Lippert Productions, which will be dissolved within the next few weeks, has produced 96 pix since May, 1948. Producer last year spent more than $2,000,000 on his program.

It is reported that Murray Lerner, who acted as exec v.p. of the company, will set up his own production outfit and release via Lippert.

TV Wanes As Exhib Fear

anything for sliding biz, it's the economic factors. High cost of living appears to be the principal villain, with inflation, installment buying and like factors frequently being named.

Reports on the whole are gloomy — even allowing for the exhib's traditional reticence at admitting biz is anything but terrible. Grosses appear to be down 2% to 15% from 1950, which was in turn not a good year. There's a large variance among theatres and among area.

Result is that lots of exhibs are starting to view sympathetically dishes and other artificial b.o. hypoes. Some theatremen see no survival short of the quick development of third-dimensional films. They're looking for the pix-in-depth in a year or so, but science has made virtually no progress in that direction and, actually, it looks like years—if ever—before there'll be third-dimension.

As for admission charges, there's pretty much unanimity against price cuts. Experience has been that the public will pay for what it wants and paring admission taps won't encourage attendance.

Reports from a number of cities follow:

K. C. Trade Uneven; Rural Area Better Than City

Kansas City, Jan. 8.

Theatre business during the fall of 1951 at best was about the same as that for the same period of 1950. In some instances biz is reported from 10% to 20% under that for the same period of 1950, according to exhibs polled on the subject.

Generally opinion prevails that business in the cities is off more than in the rural areas, but that, too, is spotty, depending on weather and crop results. One exhibitor who operates in both Kansas and Iowa reported that one of his communities is doing biz at about the same rate as last year, while another is definitely less.

Another exhibitor reports that grosses are so uneven it is difficult to tell exactly what should be normal or average. The better pictures show worthwhile returns, but there are a lot of in-between films that don't pay their way.

"There is no trend anymore," one exhib points out. A chart of grosses for the past year shows sharp rises and declines.

The basic factor is economic, and exhibs are solidly agreed on this. "We are still in a period affected by the credit regulations imposed months ago," it was said. "When the regulations were forecast, there was a wave of heavy consumer buying. The payments are still in effect on much of this merchandise—television sets, washers, autos, and will be for several months more. It has made the patron a little more wary of his spending and it shows up at the box office."

Since customers are shopping, there is more importance on selling and exploitation. This has to be carefully considered and well done, but it can pay off.

Admission prices are a less important factor. One exhib pointed out that if price was the barrier, the lower priced theatres should be doing better biz than the first runs and deluxe houses, which is far from the case. In some instances even advanced admission films can do biz, such as "David and Bathsheba" which had a fairly good whirl in this territory.

In most cases there have been no admission increases for many months. The last one in the city came about a year ago, key houses jumping from 65c. top to 75c.

Indpls. 1st Runs Steady; Drive-Ins Even With '50

Indianapolis, Jan. 8.

First-run and drive-in biz has just about held even with 1950 in past year. Nabes are about 10% off. Westerns and musicals, or a combination of the two, are generally the surest boxoffice attractions. Effects of television are potent but vary in different situations.

These are views held by representative exhibs here as 1951 passes out. Bluest note is sounded by nabe operators, most of whom claim they are losing money. The wails are loudest from those with bigger houses. One deluxe nabe, the Fountain Square group's Granada, was converted to commercial uses.

Factor in favorable comparison of year's biz downtown was price boost from 44-65 scale to 50-70 last winter, according to Howard Rutherford, manager of Loew's. He finds matinee biz is up, due in part to extending price differential from 5 to 6 p.m. Rutherford does not believe that television is hurting as much downtown as subsequent-run boys feel it's hurting them. There is no guaranteed pix formula, Rutherford says—"but, naturally, when you get 'An American In Paris' you're going to do business." But he confirms the potency of musicals and westerns, making it practically unanimous here.

Rosiest nabe report comes from Earl Cunningham, general manager of Fountain Square group. While biz is generally down because of a bad summer, both "Texas Carnival" and "Across Wide Missouri" have come within inches of boxoffice record, he said. His two houses, Fountain Square and Granada, have benefited by closing of its third, the Granada, he added. But plans are under consideration for converting the 672-seat Sanders to store rooms, leaving only one house at city's big south side community center.

Sunday nights are better than they've ever been, but video fights on Wednesday nights have knocked props from under midweek biz, Cunningham says. Meanwhile, exhibs in other parts of town, like Joe Cantor, on north and east sides, and Carl Niessee, north, complain their Sunday nights have been shot to pieces by video. Both report the situation "discouraging." Many operators are looking for new gimmicks to stimulate trade. "Movie Sweepstakes" will be inaugurated this week at nine Indianapolis nabes.

Some are toying with price concessions to particular groups, like American Legion members, or free admission for parents accompanied by kids. But panel discussion at the recent Allied States Assn. convention brought out that price reductions as such have not been helpful where tried.

Drive-ins did as well in 1951 as in 1950. There were 10 in the immediate Indianapolis area the past season. But their biz sagged in September and didn't recover, with result that all closed Nov. 4 instead of Thanksgiving week as usual.

Good Ones Still Draw Money in New Haven

New Haven, Jan. 8.

Business could be worse, and good pictures continue to make money. That's the gist of exhibitor opinion in this area.

Harry Lavietes, operator of the 1,269-seat Pequot (nabe), reports biz 40% below a year ago. He anticipates an even greater nick after Christmas while people are paying for the 1,200 video sets sold hereabouts for the Yuletide trade. On the other hand, Lavietes does not blame video entirely for the slump in his b.o. He cites living costs plus, in his neighborhood, a reduction in working time for employees of a sizable plant. As far as the Pequot is concerned, kid biz is a fizz. His last all-kiddie show cost more for film rental than he took in.

Irving Hillman of the Roger Sherman Theatre says, "Solve the baby sitting problem and you've gone a long way towards helping picture business."

Lawrence Caplan, at the Dixwell nabe, reports the b.o. not so hot, with dishes a mainstay that is proving a substantial prop. Matinees have dropped off considerably and the biggest portion of the night audiences is made up of teenagers. Best biz is done on weekends and pix doing best biz are musicals and comedies. Outstanding westerns also get a fair enough play, but not the run-of-the-prairie type. Pix with a homey story register well here.

According to Sid Kleper, College manager, December grosses total an approximate 8% boost over a year ago. Matinees continue on an even (moderate) keel but night biz is better. Attendance has gone through a levelling-off process in regard to overall weekly figures, with weekends a little less, midweek a little more, total gross a little better.

At Loew's Poli, manager Morris Rosenthal reports general biz on a level with a year ago but Xmas week itself a topper over last year. Matinee trade is regulated strictly by the nature of the picture being shown. Matinees fall off on male-appeal films like "Fixed Bayonets" but bounce back again as soon as a femme-angle pic comes along. Such pix as "Mob" and "Racket" do hefty weekend biz here and a good musical always garners plenty of shekels. Rosenthal noted an interesting point in regard to Sunday video competish. Whereas previously the house had practically no flow after 7:30 on a Sabbath night, they now do biz right up to 8:45, indicating that not so many tele fans as before are sticking to their sets at that hour. Manager figures a scale boost would have little, if any, effect on attendance. Being more selective these days, if fans really want to a picture, a slight price hike won't keep them away. Conversely, a drop in tariff isn't going to pull them into the turkeys.

Las Vegas Grosses Boosted by Localites

Las Vegas, Jan. 8.

Las Vegas, one of the last frontiers of legalized gambling, with a booming 52-week nitery biz, is still a good town for pix. Three downtown houses, one nabe outlet, a single al fresco (closed now until March 1), manage to draw okay returns from what could be an entertainment surfeited community. Two firms which control pix biz in town draw upon people who scarcely set foot within the niteries.

Business is above 1950 at the El Portal Theatre, located on the main stem, Fremont St., two blocks east of the area zoned for gambling halls, and owned by Ernie Cragin.

Matinees and mid-week are usually light. Not too many tourists make up steady trade. Preferred pix are in category of action and/or western. Scale is 65c general admission, 85 top for loges, Government tax included. In spite of rising costs, operation has no intention of raising tab. "Any increase," figures manager Lew Atkin, "would knock down volume."

Paul Sperling, operator of four theatres, relates that b.o. figures have shown a 10% increase over last year. Evening trade is 3 to 1 over matinee, with weekends cream. However, certain pix have shown good midweek biz, such as exploitable "M," and "Five." These were gimmicked, with local small fry being prevailed upon to chalk letter "M" on sidewalks all over town. Ditto for "Five." All theatres in operation have big kid and family trade, and preference shown also to be action pix. Musicals, big elsewhere, are only medium grossers in the three houses.

Certain types of "art" pix have never gone over in Las Vegas, but Sperling believes that if handled cannily, can do okay. Customers have been polled, with surprising figure wanting imports. Price policy is same as El Portal, 65c general admission, 85 top, but an increase may come if current conditions keep up. Exhibs pay same price as Los Angeles for first-runs, only profit margin is slimmer because of lower admish figures.

So. Cal. B. O. Down 15% From NSG '50

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Southern California theatre business, which developed the blind staggers during the first six months of 1951 before engaging in a slight recovery finished out the year approximately 15% off of 1950, which itself lagged well behind previous 12-month periods.

While the 15% drop is an overall figure for first-runs and chief subsequent operations, individual houses in the territory have plunged much lower. Area has been marked by a heavy list of closures and some of these will never be reopened. About a dozen former fringe operations here have been completely dismantled as property was more valuable as a parking lot or for conversion to another type of business.

Television draws its proper share of credits for the boxoffice downfall from troubled exhibs, but is not alone in responsibility. Exhibs stress that it is more a combination of circumstances rather than any single factor that has nicked business. Equal villains with free video are pictures and economy, with latter and high prices grabbing off coin that heretofore went to entertainment. Mushrooming drive-in operation here also figures in the nicking of the smaller conventional house, but ozoners, with some exceptions, haven't absorbed all of the lost trade.

Defense industry spurt and upping employment may bring back the type of swing-shift theatre operation that proved very popular during the World War II years. In the downtown Los Angeles sector, swing-shift trade on weekends already has increased over the past few years, but only when films shown are of the bold action-high adventure type.

Mid-week trade continues a sore spot. Houses breaking bills on Friday usually have two-thirds or more of their business in by Sunday night, and then coast through the remainder of the week. Back in the gravy days of World War II an exhib could estimate within a dollar or two what the week's take would be by doubling the weekend figure. Some downtown spots still do well on matinees, but such areas as Hollywood, Wilshire and Beverly Hills sell few tickets until after dark.

Public Indifference

Apparent public indifference to films, except top features, hasn't been changed much by exhibs who endeavor to make up entertaining, balanced dual bill combinations. After a few tries, a house soon slips back into the pattern of an "A" and a "B" as the first run combination. In the subsequents, more for the money is offered the buying public through teaming two "A's," but the extra rental hasn't been justified by trade.

Whenever admission prices and possible decreases are brought up in this territory, circuits and major independents always point the finger at Fanchon & Marco to show that cuts do not bring back the customer. F&M, running the two local Paramount first-runs as well as a number of suburban spots, have been plugging a low admission scale for months, but haven't increased revenue or customers.

Top features clicking elsewhere in the country usually react the same here, and there doesn't seem to be any difference whether it's a drama, a musical, melodrama or comedy, as long as the appeal is universal and it has been put together with both showmanship and entertainment values.

Most gloomy forecasters on the future of theatre business in Southern California see an eventual swing to practically nothing but first-run and drive-in operation. Anything in between, they believe, will be putting up a losing battle against the changing show-shopping trend. As one exhib, heading a rather large circuit of both first-runs and outlying nabes, puts it, the drive-in offers a less costly, to the family, way of seeing motion pictures, while the first-runs take care of that occasional desire to go out in more swanky atmosphere.

Recently Charles P. Skouras, head of Fox West Coast operating in the Pacific area as well as National Theatres, stated the local chain had shuttered a group of its losing houses and would follow with others just as soon as they failed to make even administration cost charges. He is optimistic, however, about future possibilities in FWC's larger theatres, either first-run or the seven or 14-day break houses, and has his eye on a possible plunge into drive-in operations when the situation caused by material shortages is eased.

Cincy Sees 1951 Holding Steady With '50 Levels

Cincinnati, Jan. 8.

Exhibitors in the Cincy area will total their business for 1951 in much the same figures as for 1950, survey shows. Any differences will be slight dips, of from 2 to 5% overall.

Theatregoers are getting more selective, exhibs agree, and favor the big musicals and spectacles along with occasional heavy subjects, such as "Streetcar Named Desire." Big westerns also are included in the "shopping tastes."

No price changes have been made in the past year to stimulate trade.

Frank Wes Huss, reporting for his string of nabes, said the first quarter of 1951 was under biz for the same period in 1950, but gains were made in the second and third quarters and continued after October until the recent spell of bad weather skidded patronage. Sunday matinee attendance has picked up, but Sunday night biz has dropped, Huss observed.

UPT Finds Buyers in Minn.

Minneapolis, Jan. 8.

There still seem to be plenty of people willing to back up their confidence in exhibition's future by shelling out substantial sums of coin for theatre properties. Included are pioneer successful exhibitors themselves who figured i a number of recent deals.

Seen as indicative of the good market still prevailing is the completion by the Minnesota Amusement Co. (United Paramount Theatres) of deals for the sale of four houses.

Under the Paramount consent decree provisions, MAC has sold the 526-seat Strand at Minot, N. D., to Arthur C. Bean, Riverdale, N. D., exhibitor, and the 500-seat 5th Ave., La Crosse, Wis., to Ben Marcus, and also leases on two Eau Claire, Wis., theatres, the 850-seat Badger and 450-seat Cameo, to the latter. The two Eau Claire houses were included in the deal for the La Crosse theatre and give Marcus a total of five theatres in La Crosse where he also owns a drivein i partnership with Eddie Ruben.

With the disposal of the houses in Minot and La Crosse, MAC has fulfilled its commitments under the Paramount circuit consent judgment, divorcing itself of 22 theatres during the past 24 months. Bean takes over in Minot Feb. 15 and Marcus in La Crosse and Eau Clair Dec. 26.

St. Louis Exhibs Eye Tri-Dimension as Aid

St. Louis, Jan. 8.

Three-dimension pix will be the salvation of motion picture theatre owners in the judgment of Louis K. Ansell, who with his brother, Joseph, owns and operates a chain of indie houses in St. Louis and adjacent St. Louis County. Ansell said the perfection of such films may take one year or more but he firmly believes that the exhib who can weather the current poor biz cycle will cash in handsomely. The new product, Ansell said, will do for the motion picture theatre owner what sound did for the old silent films. Ansell agrees with other local exhibs that biz is from 15% to 20% below that of 1950 and, in his opinion, it may be as bad but no worse during 1952.

Inflation, television and high percentage pix are blamed by the exhibs for the sloughing off of biz. One exhib said he ran "Samson and Delilah" in three of his nabes at the same time but could not clear the nut because of the high percentage demanded. This film did fine as a first run. Loew's State is the only house here that has not hiked its admish scale except for road show films such as "Quo Vadis." The top price of 75c was boosted to 90c for "American in Paris." Fanchon & Marco hiked its price for such films as "Streetcar Named Desire," "LeRonde" and "Tales of Hoffmann." Hoffmann" was shown at a $2.40 top, the highest price for a film in many years. "Quo Vadis" was scaled from 90c to $1.50, and a reserved seat policy was adhered to for several days. Then it was dropped and an all-day grind was instituted but the scale remained the same.

Nabes and F&M and St. Louis Amusement Co. house have, during the past year, hiked admish scales 10c with a top of 50c. Exhibs have no intention of again boosting the price and are trying to figure out a way they can lower them to attract more customers.

Biz has been so bad that there are only two houses (Loew's State and F&M's Ambassador) that have daily matinees. Some of the nabes have a Saturday matinee for the juves and all dish out a Sunday matinee. Except for the Ambassador, F&M's big cinemas, Missouri, Fox and St. Louis, all located in midtown, do not open until 5 p. m. The St. Louis, a 4,000-seater, is lighted only for special films.

F&M still continues a policy of cuffo admish for children under 12 when accompanied by adults. It has discontinued virtually redeeming streetcar and bus transfers when presented at the b.o. of the bigger houses.

The films that have garnered sock grosses locally during the past year are "Quo Vadis," "American in Paris," "Across the Wide Missouri" and the others previously mentioned. All of those films were accompanied by neat ballys and large newspaper advertising campaigns.

groups, is open to question. Certainly there has been no evidence of loss of patronage for our better pictures. As for lesser pictures, there are so many reasons for their failure that it is impossible to tell whether the Communist question even enters at all. Moreover, our fears that the personalities on the Movietime tours would be heckled about Communism proved to be baseless; Communism wasn't mentioned."

COMPO memo states it is doubtful that a refutation of the charges by a pub relations campaign would increase the film audience. And if it did, it is asked, "how important would such an increase be compared to that which might be obtained by attacking other problems on our list?"

Admitting it is "callous" to view the Communist question from a straight dollar-and-cents viewpoint, COMPO memo adds, however, "If our original premises holds good that a public relations campaign should have for its purpose an increase in audiences, then that is the only light in which the Communist charges should be considered."

Hollywood scandals have probably caused some loss of patronage, it is stated. Such losses can't be retrieved, however, the memo asserts, "while actors and actresses continue to get into police court jams; and that they will continue seems inevitable."

In any event, attempt to make all Hollywoodites lily white may well eliminate their fascination for the paying customers, COMPO says.

'Glamorous Sinner'

"If we try to convince the public that all the people of Hollywood are just like the people next door," memo explains, "we will not only run the risk of being proved liars the next day, but may destroy one of the principal assets of our business, the fascination which the glamorous sinner has for the person of virtue.

"In any event, we should realize that Hollywood misbehavior cannot be removed from the public eye by a public relations campaign, for the people of Hollywood are what we have always wanted them to be; what, indeed, we have spent millions to make them—that is, they are public figures, and as such are certain to appear in the news."

COMPO adds that the impressions of misbehavior should not be dismissed as unimportant, but should be handled as part of a pub relations campaign, not a major problem. It recommends dealing with the problem via exhibs talking to local editors when their papers carry anything unfair to Hollywood.

Point on which COMPO does recommend public relations action is the belief that "pictures aren't any good anymore." Accusation of making poor pix came, it is stated, "at the very moment when a new and powerful competitor . . . entered the scene." That is television, which COMPO states is a term it uses for convenience as a symbol of all competing attractions.

COMPO, in its recommendations, treats as a single problem the "poor pix" accusation and TV competition. It is called "the major problem of all those we have listed."

TV competition is a problem that "can be solved, or at least ameliorated," via a public relations campaign, COMPO asserts. Method suggested is hammering on the fact that world-wide public financial support for the industry make it possible to employ the world's greatest entertainment talent.

No Accident

"Because the world audience assures a financial return that dwarfs even the most extravagant advertising budgets of television sponsors," brochure points out, "it is possible . . . for all companies to hire the world's best writers, best directors, best of everything. It is not accident that Hollywood has the greatest concentration of talent the world has ever seen."

To sell the idea that it is worth the trouble of leaving the living room TV set and the comforts of home to patronize a theatre, COMPO suggests its seven-point program. This consists of newspaper advertising publicity, trailers in theatres, speakers, vigilante committees, ads in Editor & Publisher (newspaper trade mag) and Movietime personality tours.

Vigilante committee idea calls for a publicity man in each exchange territory to be designated as a "sentinel" for the industry. He would forward all industry criticism to COMPO headquarters in New York. This would be answered either by letter or by a delegation of local exhibs calling on the publisher.

Expenditure of $4,000 is recommended for a full-page ad each week for a year in Editor & Publisher.

Vidpix Weed Out

growing rapidly, and in a healthy fashion, with even the motion picture studios taking cognizance of their work and their increasing importance to the Hollywood scene.

All-Union Crackdown

An all-union crackdown resulted from the folding of Trans-World Productions, a company which blazoned an announcement it would shoot TV film of all of Rupert Hughes' stories. But the company ran out of coin long before it finished its pilot.

With that, the unions, which had been fairly lenient about telepix, banded together to police the industry. The International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees established a clearing house which investigated all new companies, and required a bond from a producer before he began shooting. Screen Actors Guild and other unions and guilds followed suit, and rental studios which had been content with promises became far more cautious.

While a few fly-by-night operators still try to wedge their way into the field, it's become a rough job, what with the unions' crackdown and refusal of agencies and sponsors to do business without guarantees of financial security.

Elaborate Program

Adding to this substantial telepix picture was the entry into the field the past year of Interstate Television, a subsidiary of Monogram; Republic studios, which will distribute via its subsid, Hollywood Television Service, and United World Productions, UI subsid.

Most elaborate program was announced by Republic prexy Herbert J. Yates, who said he has allocated $1,000,000 as his initial budget on telepix production. Yates made it clear he intended being at the head of the parade in TV insofar as motion picture studios are concerned. He expects to start his program shortly.

G. Ralph Branton, former midwest theatre circuit operator and now a Monogram veepee, was put in charge of Interstate Television, the Mono subsidiary.

Branton was to kick off with a "Raffles" series, but as it was about to roll, legal reps of Samuel Goldwyn charged they had prior rights to the "Raffles" title, and result was a legal standoff which forced postponement of the telepix.

George Bowles is in charge of the UI subsid, but has not yet announced when the telepix sked would get under way. He has been supervising the writing of a series titled "Don Winslow, USA."

Probably the greatest inducement luring companies into the field was residual rights. Most producers are too realistic to expect immediate and great financial returns from their ventures, but reruns and residual rights are another matter. Looking to the future, when the FCC may grant upwards of 2,000 licenses for other channels, the producers see a vast and continuing new market for product now being filmed.

Result of this far-sighted viewpoint has been a subrosa battle between the producer and sponsor in many instances, with the producer seeking to retain all residual rights, if possible, or at least get a good chunk of the residuals. Residual rights are the most important factor in the entire picture, in the view of the average producer. Artists also are seeking participating interests in telepix.

New and stable companies are still entering the field, but those close to the picture feel that when the smoke clears 10 to 20 major vidpix companies will survive to dominate the scene.

Roxy Amus. Asks 750G In Philly Trust Suit

Philadelphia, Jan. 8.

The Roxy Amus. Co., which formerly operated the Roxy Theatre, Roxborough, has filed suit in Federal Court here against 13 majors, asking $750,000 treble damages under the Sherman antitrust act.

The complaint declares the Roxy lost $250,000 during the period of September, 1936, to November, 1944, when it ceased operations, because the defendants conspired to enforce a seven-day clearance upon them to the benefit of three Warner Bros. houses in neighboring Germantown, the Vernon, Orpheum and Colonial. The Roxy is now operating under new ownership.

Named defendants were Warner Bros. Circuit, Warner Brothers Theatres, and Stanley Co. of America, along with five major distributors and five producer-distributors.

Talmadge Beef

burg summed up his reaction with the succinct statement that "we will continue to select our performers solely on the basis of their talent." ABC-TV programming veepee Alexander (Sandy) Stronach, Jr., said that Talmadge's statement "does not take into account the majority opinion of the nation's TV audience." He declared the American public is TV's "severest and most competent critic," adding that "the most incisive criticism of TV today and in the days to come is the flick of the dial that turns off any one or group of programs." NBC-TV execs declined comment.

Talmadge's statement, appearing in a personal editorial in his political newspaper, The Statesman, objected to the intermingling of Negro and white performers on the same show as representing a "complete abolition of segregation customs in these shows which are beamed to states of the south." His beef touched off the first such racial problem for network TV, a problem which has consistently plagued the film industry via the number of local and state censor boards throughout the south.

It's believed that TV is in no danger of any such censorship, since the entire broadcasting industry operates under the laws of interstate commerce, via the Federal Communications Commission, which would supersede any local or state laws. That was proved, in fact, several years ago in Philadelphia, when the courts nixed an attempt of the Pennsylvania state board of censors to pass on film shows emanating from the TV networks in N. Y.

Talmadge, in his article, voiced objection to Negro entertainers dancing with "scantily glad white females," Negro and white children dancing together and Negroes and white talking to each other "on a purely equal social basis." The governor, however, put his stamp of approval on programs featuring Negro groups appearing together "and not mixed with white performers."

Talmadge said TV shows should not offer programs offensive to any large group in the nation. He opined: " . . . Television is just about equivalent to visiting somebody in his home." The governor suggested that southern congressmen and Dixie newspapers should use their influence to "clean up television now before the situation grows much more offensive." He added:

"Good taste alone should prevent such a situation. "But, if the television executives and producers do not have this good taste, then the great millions of people in the southern states can turn their own resentment, individually, toward the products which sponsor such shows."

As an example of what he had in mind, Gov. Talmadge singled out the Mariners, a mixed singing group on Arthur Godfrey's program.

The United Press contacted Godfrey and told him of the Talmadge criticism. Godfrey rebutted as follows:

"As long as I am on the show, the Mariners are going to stay. "The Mariners served together on a Coast Guard ship during the war. That's where I found them. We also have some colored boys fighting in Korea. I wonder if the governor knows that?"

Film Reviews

The Olympic Elk

west to make a film record of the great elk that live in the primitive area. As a nature study it comes close to the three others that preceded it in the series, lacking only the intimacy that was the great charm of the initial trio. It is a worthwhile followup.

Naturalist-photographer team of Herb and Lois Crisler spent nearly two years getting the story of the elk, from birth in the lower rain forests of the Olympic Peninsula to coming-of-age in the summer-fall grazing grounds up in the lofty peaks of the mountainous national park.

Story line that ties the film together opens with the birth of young elk, then depicts their annual trek from the lowlands up into the mountains for a summer of feeding. Film ends with the fall mating season, when the antlered stags battle it out with rivals and then lead their newly-acquired harems back to the lowlands.

There is a thrill in the shrill blast of a stag's bugling battle challenge, as there is in the fight, sometimes to the death, that occurs when the challenge is accepted. There is humor in the elation the herd experiences when the annual migration to the peaks is completed and they dance and prance in the never melting snow that covers much of the craggy area.

As interesting as the animals shown is the terrain over which they annually travel and the Crisler cameras record it in beautiful Technicolor, as well as other types of wild life, such as marmots, bear and shaggy, white mountain goats.

The True-Life Adventure film has been set to music in the Paul Smith score, that incorporates the male elk's mating bugle as a motif. Winston Hibler does the occasional narration and also scripted with James Algar and Ted Sears. Algar also did the direction. Brog.

The Vanishing Outpost

Lash La Rue in routine oats-opera; light returns for western pic.

Realart Pictures release of Ron Ormond production. Stars Lash La Rue. Directed by Ormond. Screenplay, Alexander White; camera, Ernest Miller; editor, Hugh Winn. At New York, N. Y., starting Jan. 2, '52. Running time, 58 MINS.

U.S. Marshal	Lash La Rue
Fuzzy Q. Jones	Al St. John
Walker	Riley Hill
Denton	Clarke Stevens
Outlaw Chief	Bud Osborne
Outlaw Guard	Lee Morgan
Detective	Ted Adams
His Assistant	Ray Broome
Bartender	Cliff Taylor
Matt	Archie Twitchell
Nancy Walker	Sharon Hall
Sue	Sue Hussey
Rider	Johnny Paul

Latest Lash La Rue outdoor opus has this whip-cracking cowboy figure cooperating with the oldtime Pinkerton Detective Agency to rout a band of western killers. He rides swiftly, uses his bullwhip to cripple his opponents and tackles some hard-bitten outlaws single-handedly but the film never becomes anything more than an ordinary western. Absence of marquee names will hold it down at the wickets.

Plot makes much over a "tin-can telegraph" system whereby messages are relayed to tip the outlaws about their victims or plans of attack. This merely takes up added footage and never is really comprehended by the audience. More easily grasped are numerous mad rides, fisticuffs, gun fights and the deft manipulations by La Rue of his bullwhip. La Rue finally routs the gang and claims a heavy reward.

La Rue is cast as an U. S. Marshal and measures up although not looking like an accepted western law officer type. Al St. John, vet of many silent and talking comedies, provides the slight humor as his sidekick. Sue Hussey, up from the ranks of festival queens, has the minor femme role. Bud Osborne, Riley Hill and Sharon Hall head the support. Alexander White's original screenplay is standard and seldom very exciting while Ron Ormond's direction is unoriginal. Ernest Miller has done an okay lens job. Wear.

Maria Theresia
(AUSTRIAN)

Vienna, Dec. 24.

A Sascha Film release of Paula Wessely production. Stars Paula Wessely; features Fred Liewehr, Marianne Schoenauer and Erik Frey; with Otto Tressler, Rosa Albach Retty, Rudolf Fernau and Cees Laseur. Directed by E. E. Reinert. Written by Paul H. Rameau; music, Alois Melichar; camera, Friedl Behn-Grund. At Apollo, Vienna. Running time, 90 MINS.

First pic of Paula Wessely, film star and producer, was received coldly by audience here. Although there is a fine patriotic note struck for the account of former Austria, it lacks a real story. To listen for 90-minutes to the recital that Maria Theresia of Habsburg was a rather jealous woman is tiring.

Paul H. Rameau's script lacks punch while E. E. Reinert's direction, sometimes carrying a lot of authenticity, is mere routine work. There was no "Grund" (German word for reason) to hire Behn-Grund as cameraman.

Paula Wessely deserves credit as the femme star. Among the many others giving able accounts of themselves are Otto Tressler, Cees Laseur and Rosa Albach Retty. Alois Melichar wrote a fitting score. Maas.

Ultimo Incontro
(Last Meeting)
(ITALIAN)

Genoa, Dec. 24.

Lux Film release of a Ponti-DeLaurentis production. Stars Valli, Amedeo Nazzari, Jean Pierre Aumont. Directed by Gianni Franciolini. Screenplay, Alberto Moravia, Edoardo Anton, Pietrangeli, Giorgio Pastina, G. P. Callegari, from story "La Biondina" by Marco Praga; camera, Anchise Brizzi; music, Enzo Masetti; editor, Adriana Novelli. At Grattacielo, Genoa. Running time, 92 MINS.

Lina	Alida Valli
Piero	Amedeo Nazzari
Michele	Jean Pierre Aumont
Augusto	Vittorio Sanipoli

Cut several notches above local par, though in many ways a disappointment, this pic can look for average returns in most foreign and Italian-language situations. Valli-topped name cast will help considerably on local runs and should boost its chances in the U.S.

The familiar story by Marco Praga, a turn-of-the-century shocker, has been switched to present-day Milan, and an auto-racing angle has been introduced as a lure for local sport fans. Story concerns an unfaithful wife blackmailed into prostitution who is shot and killed when she meets her own husband in a sporting house. Potentially explosive material, however, is underplayed to such a degree that the fireworks expected from such a plot, with few exceptions, fail to materialize. Soliloquizing of husband on his way to last rendezvous with the wife, after learning of her sideline occupation by accident, is overlong.

Film is nevertheless exploitable and boasts one of Valli's strongest and best performances to date. Amedeo Nazzari gives fair backing as her husband while Jean Pierre Aumont has little to do as the lover who is killed in a racing accident. Vittorio Sanipoli contributes an effectively underplayed bit as the blackmailer.

Production trimmings, camerawork, music and other values are above average. Hawk.

Gov. Dewey Plea

compliance with anti-discrimination laws.

The five-member body, created under the Ives-Quinn Act in 1945 to deal with discrimination in employment, never has been forced to take a case to court. Among the complaints it settled were two concerning alleged discrimination by two leading Times Square motion picture theatres against the hiring of Negro ushers. The Governor will tell the lawmakers that employment practices have markedly improved in 90% of the Commission's cases. The National Assn. for the Advancement of Colored People, American Jewish Congress and Citizens Union have hailed the Governor's contemplated suggestion.

Several bills, including that by Sen. Francis J. McCaffrey, of Manhattan, and Assemblyman Orlo H. Brees, of Endicott, have sought in the past to give the Commission power in the broader field which the Governor is recommending. Their measure spelled out discrimination in detail.

Another assemblyman annually sponsoring a bill to tighten the laws on discrimination has charged that some New York theatres housing hits refused to sell orchestra seats to Negroes. He has said—and film industry leaders here confirm—that motion picture theatres in New York State practice no discrimination. The legislator, from New York City, stated that whatever discrimination in such houses existed came to an end when a test case was brought more than 20 years ago.

'Blue Yonder' Sockeroo $7,500 in Mildish Mpls.

Minneapolis, Jan. 8.

Following a sharp holiday upturn, grosses show signs of settling down in their former rut again. Intermittent bad weather, icy streets and some inferior product stack up as important factors in trend reversal. Plenty of holdovers this round also hurt. "Favorite Spy," "Disant Drums" and "Westward the Women" are doing okay in second stanzas. Top newcomer is "Wild Blue Yonder."

Estimates for This Week

Century (Par) (1,600; 50-76)—"Elopement" (20th) (m.o.). Okay $6,000 in 11 days. Last week, "Unknown Man" (M-G), $3,000.

Gopher (Berger) (1,000; 50-76)—"Westward the Women" (M-G) (2d wk). Neat $4,500 after hefty $7,200 initial stanza.

Lyceum (Nederlander) (1,859; 76-90)—"Pandora Flying Dutchman" (M-G). Opened Sunday (6). This legit roadshow house plays occasional pictures between roadshows.

Lyric (Par) (1,000; 50-76)—"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep). Helped by fine exploitation and winning plenty of favor, too. Smash $7,500. Last week, "Cave Outlaws" (U), $3,500.

Radio City (Par) (4,000; 50-76)—"Favorite Spy" (Par) (2d wk). Good $5,000 in 5 days after big $16,000 first canto.

RKO-Orpheum (RKO) (2,800; 40-76)—"Magic Carpet" (Col) and "Lady and Bandit" (Col). Opened Sunday (6) and in for only 4 days, house getting back to regular Thursday opening Jan. 10. Last week, "Double Dynamite" (RKO), passable $7,000.

RKO-Pan (RKO) (1,600; 40-76)—"Destry Rides Again" (Indie) and "Daltons Rode" (Indie) (reissues). Opened Monday (7) for 3 days. Last week, "Family Secret" (Col) and "Indian Uprising" (Col), fair $5,500.

State (Par) (2,300; 50-76)—"Distant Drums" (WB) (2d wk). Fine $8,000 in 9 days after boff $12.000 first week.

World (Mann) (400; 65-$1)—"American in Paris" (M-G) (8th wk). Has never dropped under $4,000. Smash $5,500. Last week, huge $6,000.

PITTSBURGH

that stretch, ought to better $11,000. Last week, sock $20,000.

Squirrel Hill (WB) (800; 50-85)—"Lavender Hill Mob" (U) (2d wk). New art policy at Warner nabe house so far is way above fondest expectations. Sock campaign directed at class clientele paying off immediately. Will be around $4,000 this week, and holds again. Last week, sensational $5,500.

Stanley (WB) (3,800; 50-85) — "Distant Drums" (WB) (2d wk). Action picture doing fine at $9,000 in 5 or 6 extra days. Last week, lusty $21,000.

Warner (WB) (2,000; 50-85) — "On Dangerous Ground" (RKO). Should beat $7,000, nice here. Last week, "Two Tickets to Broadway" (RKO), big $15,000 in 11 days.

Picture Grosses

LOUISVILLE

"Chicago Calling" (UA). Looking for big $16,000 on nine days. Last week, "My Favorite Spy" (Par), was one of year's biggest weeks, robust $14,000, and m.o.

State (Loew's) (3,000; 45-65)—"Westward the Women" (MG) and "True Story" (Col). Fine $13,000. Last week, "Pandora Flying Dutchman" (M-G) and "Flame Stamboul" (M-G), modest $9,000.

Strand (FA) (1,200; 54-75)—"Racket" (RKO) and "Fury of Congo" (Col). Good $4,800. Last week, "Double Dynamite" (RKO) and "Overland Telegraph" (RKO), $3,500.

'SECRET' QUIET $6,500, BALTO; 'DRUMS' 8G, 2D

Baltimore, Jan. 8.

There is a general simmering down here following fairish activity of the holiday week. "The Family Secret," at the Town, and "I'll Never Forget You" at the New are new and both uneventful. Of repeaters, "The River," roadshowing at sure-seater Little, is beginning to build. "Wild Blue Yonder," still is solid in second week after sock first round at the small New Theatre.

Estimates for This Week

Century (Loew's-UA) (3,000; 20-70)—"Pandora Flying Dutchman" (M-G). Opening tomorrow (Wed.) after nine days of "Westward the Women" (M-G) hit okay $14,400.

Hippodrome (Rappaport) (2,240; 20-70)—"On Dangerous Ground" (RKO). Slim $6,000. Last week, "Let's Make It Legal" (20th) plus eight acts of vaude, nice $17,700.

Keith's (Schanberger) (2,460; 20-70)—"Weekend With Father" (U). Starts today (Tues.) after second round of "Favorite Spy" (Par) added nice $8,200 to sturdy $11,800 preem.

Little (Rappaport) (298; $1.20-$2.40)—"The River" (UA) (2d wk). Building to fine $4,000 possibility after halting beginning at $2,900.

Mayfair (Hicks) (890; 20-70)—"Wild Blue Yonder" (Rep) (2d wk). Looks solid $5,500 after $7,300 getaway.

New (Mechanic) (1,800; 20-70)—"Never Forget You" (20th). Mild $6,000. Last week, "Elopement" (20th) (2d wk), fair $6,800.

Stanley (WB) (3,280; 25-75)—"Distant Drums" (WB) (2d wk). Fine $8,000 after first at resounding $14,600.

Town (Rappaport) (1,500; 35-65)—"Family Secret" (Col). Modest $6,500. Last week, "Double Dynamite" (RKO), $5,900.

'Father' Great $12,000, Seattle; 'Dawn' Good 10G

Seattle, Jan. 8.

The new year is starting off at a fairly good clip with holiday takes dimmed some by the snow and icy roads. "Westward the Women" is nice at Music Hall while "Weekend With Father" shapes big at Liberty. Before Dawn" is rated good at Fifth Avenue. "Distant Drums" shapes big in second Orpheum week. "Ten Tall Men" also is big in second round.

Estimates for This Week

Coliseum (Evergreen) (1,829; 65-90)—"Ten Tall Men" (Col) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono) (2d wk). Big $9,000 after great $17,500.

Fifth Avenue (Evergreen) (2,366; 65-90) — "Decision Before Dawn" (20th) and "Harlem Globetrotters" (Col). Looks good $10,000. Last week, "Elopement" (20th) (2d wk-5 days), mild $6,000.

Liberty (Hamrick) (1,650; 65-90)—"Weekend With Father" (U) and "Never Can Tell" (U). Big $12,000. Holds. Last week, "New Mexico" (UA) and "Hotel Sahara" (UA), $6,000.

Music Box (Hamrick) (850; 65-90)—"I Want You" (RKO) (2d wk). Holding at good $4,000 after $6,000 last stanza.

Music Hall (Hamrick) (2,282; 65-90) — "Westward the Women" (M-G) and "Unknown Man" (M-G). Nice $12,000 or over. Last week, "Callaway" (M-G) and "Calling Drummond" (M-G) (2d wk), 5 days, $5,400.

Orpheum (Hamrick) (2,599; 65-90)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "Cage of Gold" (Indie) (2d wk). Big $9,000 or close. Last week, $13,800.

Paramount (Evergreen) (3,049; 65-90)—"Favorite Spy" (Par) and "Slaughter Trail" (U) (2d wk). Good $8,500. Last week, big $13,000.

Streetcar Strike Bops Toronto; 'Saddle' Nice $17,000; 'Hunter' 10G, 2d

Toronto, Jan. 8.

With Toronto now gripped by a city-wide street railway strike, midtown deluxer biz is off 30% to 50%. Dip has sloughed holdover sessions badly, new pix not shaping to real b.o. possibilities. For instance, "Ivory Hunter," which was smash last week after record tee-off, is down to good figure this frame. This is the Universal Command Film, "Where No Vultures Fly." Top newcomer is "Man i Saddle" nice in six spots.

Estimates for This Week

Crest, Downtown, Glendale, Mayfair, Scarboro, State (Taylor) (863; 1,059; 955; 470; 698; 694; 35-60)—"Man in Saddle" (Col) and "Sea Hornet" (Rep). Nice $17,000, chiefly via nabe theatre biz. Last week, "Magic Carpet" (Col) and "Crazy Over Horses" (Mono), $14,500.

Eglinton, Victoria (FP) (1,080; 1,140; 40-80) — "Wooden Horse" (Indie) and "Royal Journey" (NFB) (2d wk). Good $12,000. Last week, $17,000.

Imperial (FP) (3,373; 50-80)—"Favorite Spy" (Par) (2d wk). Fair $14,000. Last week, fine $18,000.

Loew's (Loew) (2,743; 40-70)—"Across Wide Missouri" (M-G) (2d wk). Fair $10,000. Last week, trim $15,000.

Nortown, University (FP) (959; 1,558; 40-80)—"Elopement" (20th) (2d wk). So-so $10,000. Last week, solid $13,000.

Odeon (Rank) (2,300; 50-90)—"Ivory Hunter" (EL) (2d wk). Good $10,000. Last week, smash $16,500.

Uptown (Loew) (2,743; 40-80)—"Flame of Araby" (U). Light $6,500. Last week, "Weekend with Father" (U), $8,000.

Shea's (FP) (2,386; 40-80)—"Golden Girl" (20th) (2d wk). Fair $10,000. Last week, big $16,000.

DENVER

with Esquire. Wow $20,000. Stays a couple of extra days. Last week, "Elopement" (20th) and "Tales Robin Hood" (Lip), $15,000.

Esquire (Fox) (742; 40-80)—"Distant Drums" (WB) and "Purple Heart Diary" (Col), also Denver. Sock $5,000. Holds 2 extra days. Last week, "Elopement" (20th) and "Tales of Robin Hood" (Lip), $3,000.

Orpheum (RKO) (2,600; 55-90)—"American in Paris" (M-G) (2d wk). Good $14,000. Stays again. Last week, smash $30,000.

Paramount (Fox) (2,200; 40-80)—"Lady Says No" (U) and "Badlands of Dakota" (Indie). Poor $7,000. Last week, "Fixed Bayonets" (20th) and "Badman's Gold" (UA), $11,000.

Tabor (Fox) (1,967; 40-80)—"Weekend With Father" (U) and "Big Night" (UA), also Aladdin, Webber. Nice $8,500. Last week, "Flame of Araby" (U) and "Her Paneled Door" (Indie), $6,500.

Webber (Fox) (750; 40-80)—"Weekend With Father" (U) and "Big Night" (UA), also Aladdin, Tabor. Big $4,500. Last week, "Flame of Araby" (U) and "Her Paneled Door" (Indie), $3,500.

"THIS IS THE SECOND TIME IN 25 YEARS THAT I HAVE FELT THE URGE TO DEVOTE OUR EDITORIAL COLUMN TO A MOTION PICTURE..."

—MANCHESTER BODDY

"Before too long, I hope, everyone will have an opportunity to see "I Want You"—a new screenplay produced by Samuel Goldwyn.

"If it were just another production, factory-made to meet the urgent requirements of the box office by catering to the passing fancy of motion picture patrons, I would leave the business of writing about it in the capable hands of the professional reviewers and critics.

"But it is a great deal more than that. It is truly a great drama...

"Thank Heaven, producer Samuel Goldwyn has allowed the situation in "I Want You" to develop as naturally and therefor as honestly as it is being developed in actual life in countless homes throughout the country every day. It is refreshingly free of propaganda and preachments.

"This, I think, is the second time in 25 years that I have felt the urge to devote our editorial column to a motion picture. But after all, when so many people are thirsty, and one discovers a clear spring right in his own yard so to say—shouldn't he tell them about it?"

Merchandise TV Pic Series Even Before Lensing

Roland Reed productions will start to lens first 13 of a series of vidpix, "Rocky Jones, Space Ranger," on Feb. 4 on the Coast. Richard Crane, former 20th-Fox player, and Crystal Reeves have been signed to seven-year pacts to star in the show.

Unusual twist is that the deal reverses the general pattern of merchandising an established show biz property. Here the merchandising angles were developed first and the tele project followed. "Space Ranger" was created by Jack Danov, former manager for Roy Rogers' merchandising operations, to cash in on the new trend for science fiction. He has already inked eight large manufacturers of boys' wear, novelties, etc., to turn out "Space Ranger" products. Concept is that the merchandise will promote the stanza.

Danov also plans a radio edition of "Jones," which will be pitched to the vidpix sponsor if one is picked up. Danov arrived in Gotham Monday (7) from the Coast.

NEGOTIATES SPECIAL PIX FOR SCREEN GEMS VIDEO

Expansion of the activities of Screen Gems, Columbia's vidpix and commercial films subsidiary, is seen resulting from the extended Coast visit of Ralph Cohn, the subsid's topper. Cohn, who makes his headquarters in New York, has been on the Coast for two weeks and is expected to remain two more. He is consolidating Screen Gems' studio setup to prepare for fullscale production.

While on the Coast, Cohn is negotiating for a group of special video films. Among these is a series for the Christophers, group which advocates the improvement of ethical standards in business dealings. Production, it's indicated, would be financed by the Christophers and presented by them.

Meanwhile, Screen Gems has announced the appointment of Milt Goodman as general sales manager of its TV films.

Plans of producer Mack McConkey are to syndicate product via branch offices of McConkey Artists Corp. in N. Y., Chicago, Kansas City, Tampa and Cleveland. Among names in briefies are Preston Foster, Eddie Dean, Henry Busse and his orch, and Sons of the Pioneers.

Rose Bowl TV

means possible to witness top sports events, they pointed out.

In a rundown of the events leading up to the ban on theatre TVing of the game, it appeared as though only a few theatres in the country had shown an interest in gaining big-screen rights, since the others were afraid of the competition from home TV. For those interested few, Nathan L. Halpern's Theatre Network TV attempted to clear rights. He reportedly received the blessings of both NBC, which televised the game for home reception, and of Gillette, which bankrolled the NBC pickup, and also received assurances that the Rose Bowl committee would okay it.

When the committee stepped in with its last-minute nix, however, all theatre operators but Corwin backed out. Since Corwin was so close to the committee, Halpern advised him to carry the ball from his end. Corwin went through with his plans because, he said, he had "never received notice not to." From all indications, no action will be taken against him by the committee.

10 Post-1942 Par Pix Leased to Par's KTLA

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Paramount-owned KTLA has leased 10 pix distributed by Paramount Pictures, and produced by indie producers Bill Pine and Bill Thomas, at coin described as "very reasonable." All of pix involved were made after 1942. They'll be shown on channel 5 for two-year period, with unlimited runs.

Most recent release in package is "Shaggy," out in 1948. Other pix going to KTLA are: "Caged Fury," Sheila Ryan, Richard Denning, Buster Crabbe; "Fear in the Night," Paul Kelly, Ann Doran; "Swamp Fire," Johnny Weissmuller, Virginia Grey, Crabbe; "Follow That Woman," William Gargan, Nancy Kelly; "Dangerous Passage," Robert Lowery, Phyllis Brook; "Take It Big," Jack Haley, Harriett Hilliard, Ozzie Nelson, Dick Lane; "Tornado," Chester Morris, Nancy Kelly, Marie McDonald; "Wrecking Crew," Richard Arlen, Chester Morris, Jean Parker, and "Wildcat," Arlen, Arlene Judge, Crabbe.

Jewish-Named Pa. Town Subject of NCCJ Film

Washington, Jan. 8.

A film called "The Aaronsburg Story" is to be one of the features of "Brotherhood Week" of the National Conference of Christians and Jews this year.

Pic, narrated by Quentin Reynolds, is the story of Aaronsburg, Pa., only community in the U. S. named for a Jew. Film, which will be used in both 35m and 16m versions, runs eight minutes, and was produced by Cineffects.

Shupert's 500G Gross on Oldies

Peerless Television, the TV film unit set up by Edward Small and George Shupert, has grossed over $500,000 on the single package of 26 feature oldies it's been offering to video stations since the company was formed 10 weeks ago. Pix, all but one of them originally produced by Small for theatrical distribution, are now on the air in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Salt Lake City, Dayton, Atlanta, Chicago, Cleveland, Philadelphia and Milwaukee.

Shupert, who's exec veepee of the company, left for the Coast yesterday (Tues.) for huddles with Small on several series of films especially produced for TV which they'll roll soon. While on the Coast, Shupert will also scout more feature product, which he plans to buy on the open market for sale to video stations. Peerless has set up Hollywood offices at the Samuel Goldwyn studios and will probably work out of the General Service lot, Shupert said the company is now negotiating for several properties on which the vidpix are to be based and revealed that one of them, which goes into production immediately, will feature original stories.

On the feature film side, Shupert said that Peerless is asking higher fees for its product than other TV film distrib. Outfit has set up a formula for the rental price in each market, which is based on set circulation, the number of competing stations and the station's time rates.

Schwimmer Sets Vidpic 'Movie Quick Quiz' Series

Chicago, Jan. 8.

Walter Schwimmer Productions has pacted with United Television Programs for national distribution of a new video telephone quiz show, "Movie Quick Quiz," patterned after Schwimmer's "Tello-Test" syndicated radio package. Tele show has already been sold to WGN-TV here and KSTP, Minneapolis.

Quiz portions are built around a series of minute films made especially for the show by Douglas Productions. Schwimmer supplies the pix, question and answers and prizes. Rather than the usual merchandise awards, U. S. Savings Bonds will be used as prizes. Package is being sold as a quarter-hour strip on a 26 week minimum.

"Tello-Test" is currently running on some 250 stations.

Johnston on TV

hearings, Johnston said, but still more must be done along that line. He asserted there was great pressure against granting of theatre channels by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and some broadcasting outfits.

Further planning will be done at a meeting of various industry groups in Washington Friday (11). Johnston asserted: "We must make a case by showing not only that we will use the channels if granted, but how we will use them and what we'll put on them."

Vidpic Series On Cong. Medalists

Plans for a series of weekly half-hour television films based on the exploits of Congressional Medal of Honor winners, with proceeds to be used by the Medal of Honor Society to set up a scholarship fund for the children of deceased winners, were unveiled this week by Jack Bissell, board chairman of Charles King Associates, indie radio-TV package firm, and Col. Lester D. Stickles, exec secretary of the Society.

Bissell, a former veepee of the Benton & Bowles agency, said two large industrial firms have already shown interest in sponsoring the project on a public service, institutional basis. Bernard Prockter, who heads his own indie packaging outfit, scripted the audition show and will serve as a consultant on the series. Society, comprising most living winners of the medal, has reserved the right to okay the sponsor.

Several other indie packagers have announced plans for a show based on Medal of Honor winners, but Col. Stickles emphasized that the King Associates package is the only one authorized by the Society.

WPTZ, PHILLY, PACTS 101 REP WESTERNS

Philadelphia, Jan. 8.

WPTZ has signed a new contract with Republic Pictures which gives the station exclusive TV showing of 101 Westerns and 26 features never before shown on television.

The contract was made to insure a fresh flow of film for WPTZ's "Frontier Playhouse," the show generally credited with blazing the way for daily cowboy pix on TV, and which is today the highest rated cross-the-board show in the city.

Under terms of the deal, WPTZ gets exclusive showing rights to such Republic stars as Johnny Mack Brown, Sunset Carson, Don Barry, Smiley Burnette, Bob Steele and Duncan Renaldo. The contract negotiated by Edward G. Murray, station's film buyer, gives WPTZ a firm commitment with the two largest producers of Western fare—a similar contract having been signed with Monogram earlier last year.

Lesser-Small

and "Our Town"—as against 26 by Small. Since Lesser never came through with his signature on a contract, the two pix never were distributed by Shupert and have since been returned to the producer. Peerless has been subsisting rather successfully on Small's group (see story in TV Films Section).

Lesser, it is understood, will go ahead with plans to set up his own tele distribution agency. It will probably be operated by or via Irving Lesser and Seymour Poe, execs of Producers Representatives, Inc. PRI supervises Lesser's TV and theatrical distribution.

Lesser, Small and Briskin at about the same time Peerless was being organized planned to join forces in producing pix for UA release. However, in that, as in the TV setup, it was soon discovered that each of the participants being a vet producer and businessman with a highly-successful background was hardly in need of the other.

As a result, they've never been able to nail down their plans, although they're perfectly friendly. Both UA and Bankers Trust, N. Y., which had tentatively agreed to provide financing, have become impatient at their failure to consummate the partnership. It now appears likely that separate deals with UA may be made by one or more of the trio.

Production Pressure

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Lesser is pulling some 20 pix which were to have been released by Peerless. It's also reported that more than 40 Cathedral Films religious pix purchased by Irving Lesser have been withdrawn. A Lesser spokesman says the withdrawal was "by mutual agreement with Small."

TV'S 'HOT ICEBOXES OF 1952'

TV's 'Good Deeds of '52'

Television is ushering in 1952 by restoring practically every major TV casualty of 1951. All the widely-kudosed personalities and attractions that felt the brunt of the video axe during the past six months, are set for a reprise in the coming weeks. Sam Levenson, Gertrude Berg's "The Goldbergs," Dave Garroway, and "Mr. I. Magination"—all lamented casualties of the past season—are returning with their own network time segments.

Garroway moves back into the bigtime sweepstakes next Monday (14) when NBC-TV inaugurates its widely-heralded early morning "Today" two-hour daily marathon.

Levenson goes into the Sunday 6:30 to 7 CBS-TV period with his own half-hour show, starting Feb. 3.

"Mr. I. Magination" initially tees off the Sunday 6:30-7 slot for CBS, but goes back to the preceding half-hour when Levenson moves in.

"Goldbergs" gets a Monday-Wednesday-Friday 7:15-7:30 p.m. slotting, as the companion piece to "Kukla, Fran & Ollie," starting Feb. 4.

Expect NCAA to Reprise TV Grid Limitations During Meet This Week

National Collegiate Athletic Assn., despite a mounting tide of squawks from the public and from television stations on its limited television football plan, is expected to vote a similar plan into effect for the 1952 season at its annual conclave in Cincinnati starting tomorrow (Thurs.). Resolution will be based on results of surveys taken by NCAA member conferences during the last season, which reportedly show the 1951 moratorium to have been successful in hiking college gate receipts over the preceding season, when there was no limitation on TV.

To date, VARIETY has learned, nine of the 29 regional conferences have voted in favor of some form of supervised TV, based on their own observations of the plan in effect during the '51 season. Most of these votes have been unanimous, and, since some of the biggest conferences are included among the nine which have adopted the resolution so far, it's predicted that the others will follow. Nine regional groups include the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference, the Big 10, Big 7, Southwest, Southern, Mountain States, Ohio Athletic Conference, Border Conference and Mountain Valley Conference.

Any vote for a continuation of the limited TV for '52 is expected to result in a new wave of beefs across the country, but it's believed the NCAA will insist the moratorium for another season go through. While there have been both hints and threats of Dept. of Justice action against the plan, on the allega-

Maugham Series Fading Off Radio

Tintair is cancelling out its "Somerset Maugham Theatre" on NBC, Saturday mornings at 11 a.m., after the Jan. 19 broadcast. A few weeks back the sponsor, Bymart, nixed the tele edition of "Maugham," which had been on alternate Mondays at 9:30-10:30 p.m. Agency is Cecil & Presbrey.

Reason for dropping the broadcasts, it's reported, is to put more accent on newspapers, using more local dealer co-op ads. "Maugham," an Ann Marlowe-John Gibbs package, was moved over from CBS radio to NBC just a few months back.

CBS Mulls Joe E. Brown Exclusive Radio Pact

Joe E. Brown may be inked to an exclusive talent pact with CBS Radio. Program veepee Lester Gottlieb confirmed this week that he is talking a deal with the comedian, but said he has no specific program format in mind at this time.

Interest in Brown as a network personality was reportedly cued by his work as summer replacement last year for Don McNeill on the latter's "Breakfast Club" show via ABC.

Dick Rubin, of MCA's radio sector, is using kinnies to sell Jan Murray—for a radio show.

WCCC Moves In Where Dailies Fear to Tread

Hartford, Jan. 8.

By seizing upon an issue that has been footballed by both major political parties and pusseyfooted by all the newspapers in the state, WCCC here has added a new chapter to the treatise, "How to Win Friends and Influence People" and at the same time pointed out the extent to which radio stations can participate in affairs of public interest.

For more than a year the 5,000 members of the State, County and Municipal Employees (composed of state employees) have been trying to get a cost of living raise. For that equivalent period the political powers had been bucking the issue down the line, until the employees had no place further to go. The newspapers, they claimed, weren't presenting their side of the issue.

Finally, the union decided to take their issue directly to the public via the radio. Getting wind of this, Paul Martin, skipper of the daytime indie, offered the employees an hour and three quarters of air time, provided all sides of

Wholesale Exodus At WKRC-TV Blamed On Web Encroachments

Cincinnati, Jan. 8.

New year personnel traffic affected publicity directors of all three Cincy radio-TV operations and included exiting of 10 talent staffers from one.

Dick Gillespie leaves Crosley's WLW and WLW-T publicity department this week to replace Lou Gallop at WKRC and WKRC-TV. Jack Sebastian left WCPO and WCPO-TV publicity direction to freelance in New York.

Departures of 10 from WKRC-TV were termed "resignations" by U. A. (Jake) Latham, general manager. In expressing regret for the wholesale exodus, Latham said it was due to "an unfortunate network situation" resulting from "CBS-TV taking over our entire morning schedule with Arthur Godfrey and other network attractions."

Latham added that WKRC-TV "is not alone in curtailing local talent is taking a beating from network expansion practically everywhere."

SPLITTING VIDEO POLITICAL HAIRS

By GEORGE ROSEN

The competitive television tangents surrounding sponsorship of the political conventions in 1952, which find NBC and Philco in one corner and CBS and Westinghouse in the other, are taking on almost as much of a dramatic wallop as the main event itself.

If the Dems and GOP could plunge into the ballot battle with even half the enthusiasm that's going into the Philco vs. Westinghouse bid for topdog supremacy, the success of the 1952 campaigns would be a foregone conclusion.

Right now the competitive network race for facilities, though strictly behind-the-scenes, intratrade maneuvering, has taken on an excitement of its own analagous to the proverbial pre-convention smoke-filled sessions of the political biggies who call the turns.

As of the moment, it looks as though Westinghouse, through its determination to save $400,000 on the convention-election TV coverage spread, is due for a rude awakening when the final returns on station availabilities are posted within the next few days.

Frozen Out

On the basis of the station lineup as it presently shapes up, it looks as if Westinghouse will be frozen out of practically all the major single TV station markets, such as St. Louis, Milwaukee, Buffalo, Kansas City, Providence, etc., and will probably wind up in only six of the 37 single station cities and towns that will be tied to the interconnected network by convention time. Thus it looks like the Westinghouse single-station area TV coverage on CBS will be restricted to Charlotte, Indianapolis, Greensboro, Kalamazoo, Binghamton, and a sharing of the Miami and Jacksonville facilities with NBC.

Just how NBC's Sheldon Hickox and his station relations boys managed to grab off the cream single station availabilities, despite the fact that CBS had jumped the gun by several days on a sponsorship deal, will probably cue some Westinghouse repercussions when the "station availability" score is tallied. It's figured that somewhere along the line the CBS boys, with several days' head start, had slipped up in pinning down the stations for Westinghouse commitments, even though it might have entailed a burning of the midnight oil. Since Westinghouse, like Philco, is sharp on the merchandising-promotion uptake, it's conceded that Westinghouse is faced with an additional budget to penetrate the

Strange Loyalties

By one of those strange quirks of affiliation, WBZ-TV, the Westinghouse-owned television station in Boston, will not be carrying the Westinghouse-sponsored political conventions, but will be plugging the rival Philco organization's coverage.

WBZ-TV is primary NBC affiliate. Westinghouse gave its business to CBS-TV and despite Philco's deal with NBC, the Boston outlet is playing ball with its network. (WBZ - TV, incidentally, has been carrying the "Philco Playhouse" via NBC-TV, while the Yankee net's WNAC-TV has been carrying Westinghouse's "Studio One" via CBS-TV).

In a bid to black out the Westinghouse coverage in its own back yard of Pittsburgh, NBC has even offered to give the DuMont network a free feed (sans commercials) of its Philco - sponsored coverage. That would permit NBC to grab off DuMont's WDTV, Pitt. DuMont hasn't made up its mind as yet.

NBC Rate Overhaul Cues Query: 'How Mad Can an Affiliate Get?'

NBC refuses to budge on its economic study reappraising the value of its radio affiliates. The three major opponents (and old NBC standbys) of the revamped AM rate structure—Clair McCullough, of Lancaster, Pa.; Richard Shafto, of Columbia, S. C., and Paul W. Morency, of Hartford—put up a last-minute battle in closed-session with NBC prexy Joseph H. McConnell. McConnell gave a flat nix to their demands that NBC hold the new economic study in abeyance pending a new survey.

As result, notice will go out on or before Jan. 15, notifying all the affiliates of their new status and importance to the network, effective as of next July 1.

Question now intriguing the trade is: Will any or all of the McCullough-Shafto-Morency trio call it quits with NBC upon expiration of their contracts? It was no secret that the three had their dander up and were fighting mad when, at the Boca Raton, Fla., convention, prexy McConnell let it be known that nothing could influence NBC to changing its mind. However, their agitation was mild compared to their reported bitterness last week when McConnell told them in no uncertain terms that the "new order" sticks—but for good.

There have been reported threats of seceding from the network—in which case NBC would undoubtedly go after the opposition stations in the respective cities. But NBC feels practically certain that the threats will remain just that and, come contract renewal time, McCullough, Shafto and Morency will again be flying the NBC colors.

Olivier-Leigh for $35

Although Sir Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh have been turning down radio and television offers, indie WNEW in N. Y. wrapped up a cuffo airing of the husband and wife team last week. Station picked up a live broadcast from the British Broadcasting Corp.' North American Service of the Olivier-Leigh team in excerpts from their "Caesar and Cleopatra" and "Antony and Cleopatra."

WNEW program director Dick Pack spotted the fact that BBC was airing the Oliviers, in a recording made during an actual performance of the "Cleopatras" in London last year, while perusing the BBC magazine. He got permission to pick up the BBC shortwave signal. Total cost to WNEW for the show was $35, the charge for RCA's services in getting the feed.

McConnell, Philco Parlay 'Neatest TV Trick of Year'

What will probably go down as the "neatest TV trick of the year," was the manner in which NBC prexy Joseph H. McConnell singlehandedly wrapped up the Philco TV sponsorship of the political conventions and election coverage, after Westinghouse had decided to throw in its lot with CBS.

Deal was arranged (and on a Sunday, at that) over the telephone between McConnell and James H. Carmine, exec veepee of the Philco Corp., and was made strictly on mutual faith and confidence somewhat reminiscent of the Ben Duffy telephone call to Florida several years back, which gave the BBD&O agency acquisition of the $10,000,000 American Tobacco account.

McConnell, who had spent some time with Carmine at the recent NBC convention in Boca Raton, Fla., put in a phone call to the Philco exec, gave him a verbal outline of the deal and its cost, and within four hours Carmine called back to clinch the pact.

WCPO's Watters Nixes Mutual MGM Pickup As Bad Business Deal

Cincinnati, Jan. 8.

Mort Watters, general manager of the Scripps-Howard AM, TV and FM WCPO stations here, has turned down the Mutual-MGM 8 to 9 p.m. weekday programs, permitting them to be carried by WMOH, Hamilton, O., 20 miles from Cincy.

Mutual, according to Watters, wanted WCPO to make available to the network six half-hours weekly at no charge which it would sell to national advertisers. "The six half hours," he said, "would utilize the MGM features. Our only compensation from Mutual is the right to sell, without payment to Mutual, six half-hours per week of MGM features. This is not a good business arrangement."

Watters went on to say that "if I didn't firmly believe that there is no nighttime radio audience left for anything except music and news, I would argue the point with Mutual." He recently cut nighttime rates for WCPO.

Ford Axing Melton At Season's End

James Melton and Ford wash up with their Thursday night NBC-TV show at the end of the current season, when Melton's contract with the auto magnate expires.

The Melton show was only recently shaved from a full hour to 30 minutes, with the initial $45,000 weekly talent-production nut, making it one of the costlier stanzas in video, also being scaled downward. Program never quite managed to get off the ground, despite several attempts to refurbish the stanza.

Agency is J. Walter Thompson.

CBS-TV RESTORING SAM LEVENSON SHOW

Comedian Sam Levenson, who's seen duty this season only as a panelist on CBS-TV's "This Is Show Business," will have his own half-hour show on the web again starting Feb. 10. Levenson will hold down the Sunday 6:30 to 7 p.m. slot. Web has not lined up a sponsor for the show to date.

In line with Levenson's return, CBS is also dropping "Out There," its science-fiction series which it has not been able to sell. Latter show is now in the 6 to 6:30 period Sundays, with "Mr. I. Magination" in from 6:30 to 7. When the new Levenson show starts, "Out There" will be axed, with "Mr. I." moving back to 6 and Levenson going at 6:30.

Levenson, incidentally, had reportedly been insisting on a later time period this season, hoping to slant his show for adults, rather than the predominantly juve audience which he attracted last year. He finally agreed, however, to accept the 6:30 to 7 slot.

Folsoms Off to Sea

CBS Skeds Oct. 1 East-to-West Moving Day for Big TV Shows

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Oct. 1 will be moving day for CBS; that is, the movement of TV shows from New York. That's the date for start of operations at the network's Television City, with four big studios "off and running," but the skein's bosses are beginning to realize that that's not near enough to accommodate all the "reservations."

Starting the hegira west will be Peter Lind Hayes and Mary Healy, due out next month. Certain to be given studio space is Ken Murray, who hasn't been too happy since he left. "Everyone who pulled stakes here for the east wants to come back," said Harry Ackerman, CBS veepee in charge of network television from this terminal.

Where to put them is a vexing problem to the Ackerman forces. Just now they're using studio A at Columbia Square, Earl Carroll's, recently leased, studio D at Don Lee, and "borrowing" space from NBC on an exchange basis. On Ackerman's blueprint for the spring are 10 shows either now cabling ready, and 10 more coming up for the autumn push. As against only two nationwide programs from Hollywood one year ago the list will comprise: Alan Young, Burns and Allen, Amos 'n' Andy, "I Love Lucy," Frank Sinatra, "Corliss Archer," "My Friend Irma," Jack Benny, Al Pearce daily strip, Ginger Rogers dramatic series.

Amos 'n' Andy resume production on the second series of 26 pictures Jan. 19 with Jim Fonda as producer and Charles Barton continuing as director. Writers will be Dave Schwartz and Bob Ross, with Joe Connolly and Bob Mosher teaming on the radio scripts. "Corliss" starts Jan. 19 as a sustainer, airing from here on Saturdays at

Eureka! CBS Sells Straight AM Deal

In one of the first straight deals for a network radio show in some time, CBS this week tagged Admiral for a new Sunday afternoon news program, which is slated to preem Feb. 17 in the 5:30 to 5:55 p.m. period. Under terms of the sale, Admiral will be picking up the tab for all time and talent costs, with CBS contributing none of the budget, as some of the webs have done in recent months in order to get sponsors.

New show will have Bob Trout, who recently rejoined CBS, as coordinator of a world news roundup. Trout, from N. Y., will interview CBS correspondents throughout the world via shortwave. Show marks his second series for the web, since he's also doing a five-minute news spot four nights weekly.

STEELES EXITING 'MUSIC'; WMCA GOES 'JUKE BOX'

Ted and Doris Steele will give up their "Mr. and Mrs. Music" show on WMCA, N. Y., end of the month.

WMCA will replace the team with a three-hour pre-noon show emphasing records among the top 30 tunes and playing down the gab. Station says that its new policy of "more music, less talk" and concentration on hit disks has paid off with a 15% boost in its Pulse ratings over a year ago, and the "jukebox" policy will be extended.

The Steeles are exiting their 9 a.m.-to-noon cross-the-board program to devote more time to their dairy farm in Bucks County, Pa. Steele, however, will continue his 2:30-5 p.m. strip on WPIX, N. Y.

The Steeles started on WMCA in November, 1947, following Andre Baruch and Bea Wain, who launched the series. They've had some dickers to do a taped show from their farm.

No Cream Team

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Wary of any Pet peeve, Fibber McGee & Molly are nixing milk blurbs for sponsorship of home games of their basketball team over KTTV. The Jim Jordans are also nixing beer blurbs.

Pet Milk sponsors Fibber & Molly and NBC, and with the possibility Jordan may be seen in some of the telecasts, they're taking no chances of offending their angel.

WFDR Skirts Axe; To Stick It Out Another Year

Continued existence of WFDR, New York FM outlet, was guaranteed for another year last week, when the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, owner of the indie, okayed a new budget incorporating a 25% cut. Reduced nut will involve dropping of seven staffers.

Last year ILGWU folded its two other FM outlets, WVUN, Chattanooga, and KFMV, Los Angeles. Last year the United Auto Workers also shuttered its WCUO, FM-er in Cleveland.

The garment workers union was considering closing down WFDR, but finally decided that the outlet could continue its public service broadcasts at the same level if the overhead was trimmed. Station will continue to air speeches and meetings on public issues, but the remote pickups will be done via tape recording rather than live, to axe costs. There will also be more emphasis on editing these airers into more compact programs. WFDR's beaming of classical music will not be affected.

One factor in ILGWU's deciding to maintain its radio activity was

Lee Carpet Musical Show Nabbed by NBC-TV

NBC-TV has grabbed off the Lee Carpet half-hour musical series. It goes into the Sunday afternoon 5:30 to 6 p. m. period on an every-other-week basis. Show will alternate with the Derby Foods-sponsored "Sky King Theatre."

Lee Carpet show will be a filmed series called "Meet the Masters," depicting the early life struggles of outstanding longhair virtuosi, such as Marian Anderson, Jascha Heifetz, etc.

Robt. L. Coe to DuMont

Robert L. Coe, former veepee and general manager of the N. Y. Daily News' WPIX, has joined DuMont's relations department in a move designed to further the net's all-important efforts to clear station time. He'll work under Elmore B. Lyford, recently named chief of the department.

Coe was also the first manager of KSD-TV, St. Louis, under George Burbach. He headed WPIX from 1947 to 1950 and has been operating since then as a management consultant.

Gallery's 'Away We Go' Stock Nix

Tom Gallery is sticking by his decision to exit the DuMont network and check in at NBC-TV as coordinator of sports deals for the web, despite attempts of DuMont execs to keep him in the family. When it was revealed that NBC had negotiated a deal with Gallery for his switchover, the DuMont high command used some persuasive arguments, including a stock participation deal, in a bid to have him stay put.

Gallery took it under advisement and last week officially resigned DuMont to join NBC. He joins the latter web this week. In his new capacity he'll move in on an administrative level in negotiating long-range deals on major sports events.

WNBT Bypasses Web On Morning Stanzas Despite Its o&o Status

NBC-TV found itself up against an unsolvable station clearance problem with its own flagship station this week when WNBT, N. Y., turned down two of the four new half-hour morning shows which preemed on the web Monday (7) in favor of continuing its own local programming.

WNBT has refused to give up its local option time for the web's "It's in the Bag," from 10:30 to 11 a.m., and the Ernie Kovacs show, from 11 to 11:30. Instead, the station will continue with "It's a Problem" at 10:30 and the Josephine McCarthy show at 11. Both local programs are sold on a participating basis. WNBT figures it will be serving its local community interests more by retaining the local programs.

Station will carry the other two network shows, the "Mel Martin Show," from 10 to 10:30, and "Dave and Charley," from 11:30 to noon. Latter period has been filled on WNBT with "Date in Manhattan," which is to be expanded into a full hour on WNBT under a new title, "Breakfast with Music," which will open the station's local programming cross-the-board at 9 a. m. WNBT will, of course, carry Dave Garroway's "Today."

Greatest Non-Show on Earth

Cecil B. DeMille, skedded to make his television bow on CBS-TV's "What's My Line?" Sunday (6), was cancelled off the show. Reason for the nix was that DeMille's guester—he was to be the "mystery celeb"—was tipped to the press, and the airer's producers, Mark Goodson and Bill Todman, felt that the lack of "mystery" would open the program to charges of phoniness. To replace the pic producer, Goodson-Todman secured Oscar Hammerstein 2d.

DeMille arrived in N. Y. Sunday (6) and will make some radio and tele appearances to plug his new pix, "The Greatest Show on Earth," which preems at Radio City Music Hall tomorrow (Thurs.).

The Paramount producer-director has been barred by the American Federation of Radio Artists for 11 years from performing with AFRA members. The ban was instituted after DeMille refused to pay a one-dollar AFRA political assessment to the Democratic party's campaign funds in the 1940 Presidential race and was upheld by several courts.

AFRA and Television Authority take the position that it is okay for DeMille to appear before the mikes and cameras, provided he is merely an interviewee and not a performer. Couple of years back he made the rounds for his "Unconquered."

In Gotham Monday (7) DeMille said that he has the right under the Taft-Hartley Law to perform on commercial shows for compensation (as he previously did on "Lux Radio Theatre"), but that "so far no one has asked me to."

The radio union told Par that while it had no objections to his doing interviews as a private citizen, in some cities he might find individual AFRA members not willing to work with him. It's reported that in Ohio, where DeMille testified before the state legislature and scored AFRA, some union members have strong feeling against DeMille.

DeMille was announced as a guest on tomorrow (Thurs.) "Betty Crocker" show on ABC-TV. However, he withdrew due to "too many commitments."

FCC Preps ABC-UPT Tiein Hearings; May Set Pattern on Antitrust Issues

Washington, Jan. 8.

Stage is set for commencement next Tuesday (15) of the important hearings before the Federal Communications Commission on the proposed ABC-UPT merger and Paramount anti-trust issues. Proceedings will be held before Examiner Leo Resnick, with Frederick Ford as Commission counsel.

Aside from determining whether control of ABC shall pass into new hands, the proceedings will likely set the pattern for Commission policy on eligibility of motion picture anti-trust violators to enter the television field. They will also seek to show whether conflict in interests would result if picture producers or theatres are allowed to own TV stations or networks.

In addition, the proceedings are expected to settle the long-standing question of whether Paramount's 28% interest in DuMont constitutes control. Until this issue is decided, DuMont will be unable to push its TV applications in both Cleveland and Cincinnati, since the network and Paramount together now own four TV stations, one less than the limit allowed to be held by the same interests. Also involved is Par's application for TV in San Francisco.

Commission action on the AB-PT merger will determine whether CBS acquires a third owned-and-operated TV station, WBKB in Chicago, for which it has agreed to pay $6,000,000, contingent on approval of the merger. The station, now held by United Paramount, would have to be sold, since ABC already owns a TV station (WENR-TV) in Chicago.

Par-DuMont Issues First

Of the various matters which have been consolidated in the hearings, the anti-trust issues are considered by far the most important, if not determinative to all the others. One member of the Com-

Protest Edwards Axing

Dallas, Jan. 8.

The Texas State Federation of Labor is protesting the dropping of the newscasts of Frank Edwards, from the municipally operated WRR, local Mutual affiliate.

Edwards newscasts are sponsored by the American Federation of Labor. No reason was given for the cancellation. The labor group will file complaint with the FCC.

CBS Breaches Chi Logjam on Video Daytime Entries

Chicago, Jan. 8.

With several new daytime ventures already scheduled or close to finalization, CBS-TV is finding itself in the best shape it's been for some time as far as a Chicago outlet is concerned. Due to a combination of factors the web is now able to assure bankrollers of daytime shows Windy City coverage to a much larger degree than prevailed heretofore.

It's been no secret that Columbia had been handicapped in several instances in selling sunlight shows because it had no claim on daytime hours on WBKB, its Chicago affiliate. Although the indie the past two seasons has carried some afternoon CBS shows, the slotting has been at the station's determination and in some cases the web offerings have been carried only via kinescope.

The logjam first was breached when CBS entered into a pact with WGN-TV whereby it would carry the daytime shows WBKB

Albert's $1,500,000 In 7 Years as Coast Video Sub for Jarvis

Hollywood, Jan. 8.

Eddie Albert bowed in yesterday (Mon.) as KLAC-TV's replacement for Al Jarvis, who moved to KECA-TV in a seven-year deal guaranteeing him $2,000 weekly.

Albert, a newcomer to live TV in L. A., has been inked to a seven-year pact at a reported $3,000 a week by Don Fedderson, general manager of KLAC-TV. He'll occupy the "Hollywood on Television" program daily from 12:30 p. m. to 5:30 p. m.

Albert will get weekly guarantee

ABC's $1,500,000 Automotive Take

Increased use of ABC's radio and tele webs by automotive bankrollers in the second half of 1951 has brought the chain gross billings of $1,500,000. Some of the coin comes from the motor outfits using saturation campaigns, but the bulk is from full-cycle sponsorship.
